A FATEFUL... ....DIAMOND

"No, dear," he at length returned, "I have reasons for thinking that such a proceeding would not be best. I will not stop to tell you now how I happen to be confined here; there will not be time for that if you must go in half an hour; but, of course, you know that when I disappeared a large amount of money disappeared with me."

"Yes."

"What does the world believe about it? Do people think that I absconded with it?" Louis asked, anxiously.

"Some do," Margaret was forced to admit," but those who know you best believe that there was foul play, and that your father had some hand in it."

"The foulest in the world, though they are mistaken as to its author," Louis said, his face growing dark and stern. "But never mind that now," he went on; "what I wanted to tell you was, I believe that money is concealed somewhere in this building."

"In the safe," interrupted Margaret, eagerly.

"Oh, no, it never would have done to have put it inside this coop with me; the wretch was too cunning for that, for he could not get at it without coming in contact with me. But I am confident from his movements when he comes here, that it is not very far off, and, Margaret, if people believe that I have been the thief, I can never show my face until I am able to restore it to the company."

"But perhaps you can never do that," said the young girl, anxiously.

"I must, the money was in my keeping. I am responsible for it," said Louis, with decision.

"Let me go for papa," Margaret pleaded, "he can at least have Arthur arrested, and he could be made to confess the whole plot."

"I am afraid that cannot be easily done, for he is made of pretty resolute stuff, as I can truthfully bear witness. I have an idea, however, that by using a little strategy, I can accomplish what I wish, and when I appear in the world again I can restore the treasure that was in my keeping."

Margaret looked greatly distressed.

"Louis, I cannot bear the thought of your remaining here another hour; you have suffered enough already—you are very thin and haggard," she said, gazing wistfully into his face.

"I know it, dear," he said, smiling; "but I am no longer destitute of hope and I shall soon build up again. Now listen to what I have to propose, for much still depends upon you. The first thing I have to do is to get outside of this wretched cage."

"Yes, but how?" Margaret asked.

"It will be comparatively easy now," he answered; "you have keys to this building, and can come and go at your pleasure?'

"Yes."

"I am crazy to know how you obtained them—but never mind that now. I am going to tell you, though," he said, smiling, "to go home like a good girl and sleep to night the sleep of the just. Tomorrow go to some hardware shop and purchase a thin file and saw, suitable for cutting iron; and tomorroy evening at this time, bring them to me, together with some black beeswax."

"Oh, you are going to cut out some of these bars!" said Margaret, begining to comprehend his plan.

"Yes; and as it may take me some time to do it, I shall need the wax to hold them in place until I have room enough to get out, so as to avoid suspicion of my scheme if Aspinwall should come in upon me before I am through. Once give me an outlet from this place, and I can take my own time to search for the money. You shall come to me every day to cheer me with the sight of your dear face, and to learn how I am progressing. Let me once discover where that treasure is concealed, then you shall notify Mr. Houghton; he can inform the police, who will, of course, immediately arrest Aspinwall, and my vindication will be complete. On the other hand, if he should have the slightest suspicion that my place of concealment had been discovered, he would decamp with his ill-gotten gains before anyone could move in the matter, and those forty thousand dollars would be lost forever.

"I had expected that he would adopt extreme measures before this. I am confident, however, that he does not want to stain his hands with blood; he doubtless hopes to find some other way of disposing of me, but I believe he will let well enough alone for the present. No one, he believes, suspects that I am here; no one has an idea that he had anything to do with the robbery, so until he begins to think of leaving Paris, I believe he will keep me a prisoner in this place. One thing, however, puzzles me," Louis continued, looking perplexed, "and that is how he came to know that there was such a large sum of money in my safe. No one besides myself and the cashier knew anything about it until I mentioned it to you that evening."

"That was how he discovered it," Margaret said, eagerly; and then she gave her reasons for believing that Arthur was concealed behind the curtains in the parlor on the night of his disappearance.

"It wasn't the money alone that made him follow me, I am sure," Louis replied, when she concluded; "it was a deeper scheme than that."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes, Margaret, he has loved you for years, and he has been my mortal foe ever since he knew that we loved each other. Of course, he heard all our plans that night, and it must have made him desperate, while my speaking of the money gave him the very opportunity he desired. He meant to make it appear that I had absconded with it, thus getting rid of me, disgracing me forever in your sight and the world's, and giving him a chance to win you for himself by and by."

"I think so, too," Margaret replied, though a bright flush stained her cheek at the acknowledgment, "and I fear such a belief would have prevailed—that is, that you had taken the money and fled—if papa had not explained to the detectives that you could have no object in so doing, since we were engaged, and it would ruin all our prospects, and you would forfeit more than treble the amount by such an act. Consequently they settled upon that other theory—that your father had something to do with it, and there has been foul play."

"They have been diligently looking for him, I suppose?" Louis asked.

"Yes; but as they are without a description of him, it is not strange that they have failed to find him."

"I imagine he is frightened, and keeps himself securely concealed," said Louis. "I only hope he has taken my advice and returned to America. It was a bold and cunning scheme, though, on the part of Aspinwall.

"Tell me about it, Louis," Margaret pleaded.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Louis looked at his watch again.

There were a little more than ten minutes before her hour would expire—time enough for a brief outline of the occurrences of that eventful night, he thought.

"When I left you," he began, "I hastened toward my office, as I told you I intended to do, but I had not a thought of being followed, nor that anyone could suspect whither I was bound. I reached it, unlocked the outer door and passed into the building, I did not relock the door on the inside, because I did not intend to remain more than a minute or two, just long enough to assure myself that everything was all right. That was a mistake, and fatal to me. I should have locked it at once upon entering.

"The building was, of course, very dark. I could see nothing, but I knew every step, and passed across the vestibule to my own office door. As I was inserting the key in its lock I thought a heard a slight noise behind me. I paused to listen, and was sure I heard someone trying to repress labored breathing. The next instant I felt a stunning blow on the back of my head and fell to the floor senseless.

"When I came to myself again, I was bound hand and foot, a gag in my mouth, and a handkerchief tied tightly over it. My office door was open, and I saw Aspinwall down on his knees before the safe. He had robbed me of my keys, entered the office, opened the safe, and was in the act of taking the money from it by the light of a taper match, which went out while I looked. Presently he came out, shutting and locking the office door after him.

"He bent over me and listened. I thought best to feign unconsciousness still, thinking perhaps he might not be quite so much on his guard if he believed I had not recovered my senses, and I could thus learn more about his movements. So I held my breath and did not stir. After a moment he passed me and went out at the street door, locking that also after him.

THEY NEVER KNEW FAILURE.—Careful observation of the effects of Parmelee's Vegetable Pills has shown that they act immediately on the diseased organs of the system and stimulate them to healthy action. There may be cases in which the disease has been long seated and does not easily yield to medicine, but even in such cases these Pills have been known to bring relief when all other so-called remedies have failed. These assertions can be substantiated by many who have used the Pills, and medical men speak highly of their qualities.

VANDERBILT FOREST

A Hundred Thousand Acres Fenced In—A Great Game Preserve.

Mr. George Vanderbilt has in North Carolina an immense estate. Part of it is made up of the Pisgah forest, which includes 100,000 acres which cost Mr. Vanderbilt $250,000. He has bought it in great or small tracts as rapidly as possible, and now his rangers are the only denizens. There are five of them, all picked men of the mountains, of fine physique, good riders and dead shots. One of them comes to meet the pilgrims and looks at their permit, which is a very important piece of paper. This forester, whose name is Kearns, is a type of the rangers, good-humored, tall and strong, well mounted, with repeating rifle slung at his back, saddle bags and poncho. To him these mountain wilds are like an open book, and upon him and his associates a great and incessant responsibility devolves. They must keep open the roads and the trails, see that the boundary fence, three hundred miles in length, is all right; keep out poachers, look after the game and the trout, and always be on the alert for timber stealers. The poachers would come from near and far to catch the trout, or rather to kill them by exploding dynamite cartridges in the deep pools, where the big fellows lurk; or to kill the deer, the grouse (or pheasants, as they are known popularly), or the wild turkeys. At an incredible distance the trained ear of the ranger will hear the explosion of dynamite, and he tracks the offender unerringly, even into other counties, and once into Tennessee.

There are 265 miles of trail in this forest, the trails leading alongside each trout stream. There are seventy miles of road passable for wagons. Trail and road are always kept in readiness against Mr. Vanderbilt's coming. He is, as the rangers say, "liable to come any time." There are miles of shooting paths, the latter fifteen feet in width and cut out right and left from the roads. When deer are driven they must cross these paths, and by means of the latter alone can the hunter see them in time to get a shot.

The absence of noises other than those made by the streams is one of the most noticed things. Rarely is a note of a bird heard, and more seldom still is any feathered thing seen. So perfect and so dense is the cover that the deer can lie unseen only a few feet away. Numerous as the turkeys are, only one was flushed, and only a few pheasants were seen. The sharp footmarks of the deer are constantly visible in the trails, and along side the streams are the footprints of the wildcat. High overhead the golden eagle is seen soaring, and Ranger Kearns shows a mounted specimen which he killed with a revolver as it sat in a treetop eighty yards away.

Though Mr. Vanderblit is not a sportsman, but a student, yet, as stated, all things are kept ready for him. His pleasure is the pleasure of others. On his last visit he only caught one trout, nor did he fire a gun. His wife was with him. She is a good horsewoman, and rode a pony up and down the steepest trails. Under protection native trout are rapidly restocking the streams without artificial propagation. In some of the streams rainbow trout from California have been placed, but these are not so satisfactory a fish. They rapidly lose their rich colors, and have to be quickly eaten to be palatable, while the trout of the locality, properly dressed, keep well. In the old days, before there was protection, there were caught in two days in this very forest 1,650 trout, and most of this needless slaughter was pure waste.

At Baltimore Mr. Vanderbilt has an arboretum, one of the largest in the world, and the pioneer in the United States. This was formerly under the direction of Gifford Pinchot, who is at present head forester of the United States; it is now under the direction of Dr. Schneck as forester. In this arboretum more than three hundred thousand trees and shrubs have been planted. Pisgah forest is the complement of the arboretum, and in these wild woods Dr. Schneck has a lodge where he spends much of each summer with his class. In the latter are often youths of wealth and high social position, who wish to study forestry—a study which the United States sorely needs, since so many millions are daily devoting themselves to the task of forest destruction and so few to conservation.

A WONDERFUL MACHINE.

Horace L. Short, of Brighton, England, has invented a megaphone through which a sneeze can be heard five miles and a shout twice as far unless the man who sneezes is a neighborhood nuisance. In it the sound of a man's shoeless feet on a stair at 1:30 o'clock in the morning would waken a policeman half a mile away. The machine is an ordinary phonograph with a trumpet about four feet long. Inside this trumpet is a mechanism resembling a steam whisle. The phonograph cylinder is of silver marked by a sapphire needle, and when this needle has traveled over the cylinder a second time the sound waves pour out of the trumpet in a way to eclipse a steam siren.

Experiments have been made at Devil's Dyke, near Brighton. The machine was placed on the roof of the shops at that place and made to repeat a number of sentences. Ten miles away every word was intelligible. With a favoring wind an unknown message was sent from the machine and taken down in shorthand twelve miles away. Over water the sounds will carry even further.

Its adaptability is almost limitless in some directions. On a lighthouse or lightship its use would displace foghorns and detonators. On shipboard, in time of wreck or in thick fogs, messages could be sent and warnings and advice given.

It Dazzles the World

No discovery in medicine has ever created one quarter of the excitement that has been caused by Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption. Its severest tests have been on hopeless victims of Consumption, Pneumonia, Hemorrhage, Pleurisy and Bronchitis, thousands of whom it has restored to perfect health. For Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Croup, Hay Fever, Hoarseness and Whooping Cough it is the quickest, surest cure in the world. It is sold by W. T. Strong & Co., who guarantee satisfaction or refund the money. Large bottles 50c and $1. Trial bottles free.

Flying fish will cover as much as 150 yards at a single flight.

CANNOT BE BEAT.—Mr. D. Steinbach, Zurich, writes: "I have used Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil in my family for a number of years, and I can safely say that it cannot be beat for the cure of croup, fresh cuts and sprains. My little boy has had attacks of croup several times, and one dose of Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil was sufficient for a perfect cure. I take great pleasure in recommending it as a family medicine, and I would not be without a bottle in my house."
