Rippling Rhymes

THE VALID REASON.

The men who deal in salted mines once found in me an easy mark; they sought me, by my trees and vines, and left my wallet stripped and stark. And agents for the works of Pope, of Scott and Moore and Bertha Clay, were wont to hand me flim-flam dope, and bear my hard-earned roll away. And people often passed the hat, to build a home for gifted dames; I lacked the nerve to cry out "Scat!" I felt for all their threadbare games. The agents still are running loose, they seek my cottage every day; but now I have a good excuse, and shoo them from my door away. I say to them, "In normal times I'd buy your junk and make no roar; you know I always spilled the dimes right cheerfully in days of yore. I'd gladly buy a ton of books, and I'd go in for mining stocks, but I must use my changes, gadzooks, to help the Red Cross cause along. I'd gayly buy your duplex lamps, your patent substitute for lard, but every month I buy thrift stamps, and paste them on a printed card. I hate to turn you down like sin, I'd like to gladden all your days, but I must help the Allies win with all that I can raise." No odds how aired the agents feet, they do not paw the ground or swear there is no come-back to my spiel; it stops all argument right there.
