To Search For Hidden Jewels

Mariners Set Out to Seek the Sapphires of an Ancient King.

Men have heeded the call of lost sapphires, and the little 80-ton schooner Casco, that carried Robert Louis Stevenson to the islands of romance, poked her nose through the Golden Gate, recently and headed for the frozen Northland, says a story from San Francisco.

For several days Captain C. S. Oliver and thirty husky seafaring men, who believe in a certain chart, had been storing provisions in the hold of the Casco. They said they were sailing to the Arctic for codfish, but——

Three men could navigate the Casco on a fishing expedition, if it circled the globe. Old salts along the water front shook their heads and went to Pier 40 and smoked their pipes, and one man of the crew of the Casco told the story.

When centuries ago, when China was young, there was a great war. The most powerful king led his armies to battle and vanquished all the other armies. Then he died.

The king had been noted for his fondness of sapphires. His subjects, worshipping his memory, made annual pilgrimages to his tomb, and each deposited at the burial place one or two sapphires. That insured the pilgrim's speedy entry into the happy hereafter.

Centuries passed, as is their wont. A natural disaster swept away the tomb, and nothing remained except the legend. Then the glacier that had covered the tomb wore away, and an adventurer that traveled the North found the treasure.

The man carried away all the sapphires he could carry. He planned to return for the rest, but he died too soon.

The men of the Casco have a map, they say, that directs them to a spot beyond the beyond, far north in Northern Siberia, where lie heaps and heaps of sapphires that the worshippers laid at the tomb of the "Great One."

Each of the thirty men of the crew has subscribed one-thirtieth of the expenses of the expedition, and the Casco, that once sailed the sunny seas of the South, will venture to the North in search of codfish and untold wealth.
