Odds and Ends.

—Aytoun, the well-known and popular Scotch poet, said that "Locksley Hall" could only have been written by a man who had been jilted.

—A sewing-machine agent was recently attacked by a fierce catamount. Strange as it may appear, the catamount escaped without buying one of the machines.

—Maker of musical instruments, cheerfully rubbing his hands—"There, thank goodness, the base fiddle is finished at last." After a pause—"Ach Himmel, if I haven't gone and left the glue pot inside."

—"I saw a capital thing in that last pamphlet of yours," said O'Connell to a conceited scribbler. "Indeed," rejoined the delighted perpetrator, with a beaming smile; "what was it?" "A pound of butter."

—A western woman applied to a doctor for a prescription for her husband's rheumatism. "Get that prepared," said the medical man, "and rub it well into your husband's back. If it does him any good let me know; I've got a touch of rheumatism myself."

—Little Nell—"Mamma, what is colour blind?" Mamma—"Inability to tell one colour from another, dear." Little Nell—"Then I dess the man that made my g'ography is colour blind." Mamma—"And why, pet?" Little Nell—"'Tause he's got Greenland painted yellow."

Juniper's Wife.

[Edward Irenmus Stevenson in Good Cheer.]

"I say it again, I think that when a man is as old as you and as well-to-do he ought to have a wife," repeated young Parson Frank stoutly.

Ebenezer dropped the axe. "Look-a-here, Master Frank. Don't St. Paul give a kind of gineral order that men folks are better single? Hain't I had the hull superintenderin' t' this big farm for your ma while you've been off to your commentaries and Hebrew? Come now! Be reasonable. Besides, the Kitterys hain't never been marryers—hain't troubled none of your cloth much."

"There's your brother Juniper—" interrupted the young man pertinaciously.

"Yes—there's Juniper, an' a pretty time he had tyin' himself up. Humph! Not but that he done well enough—very well, in fact, when he'd accomplished it."

The young man's ears itched at once.

"Tell me about that, Ebenezer," he said artfully. "I never heard how Juniper came to be married."

Ebenezer began his narrative with a pretense at chopping while it proceeded. From this he took to balancing the axe on its head; from that to sitting down opposite the reverend Frank and carving a letter of the alphabet absent-mindedly on a bit of pine.

"You see, Master Frank, Juniper was not of the same disposition as me and brother Dan. He was the best lookin' of the three; straight an' supple, an' with a sparkle in his eye that he hain't lost yet. The girls to our village—it was when we was all livin' at the homestead, with father and mother—all liked him; an' twas' recipherated. First, Juniper was goin' to singin'-school with Katey Parker, an' then 'twas all over the place that he an' Liberty Ann Myers was engaged. Next, 'twas Gineral Jo Bank's eldest daughter—I disremember her name—an' before we'd fa'rly began plagu'in him on the subject o' Gineral Jo's daughter, he was attentive to Mimy Bunce. Brother Dan an' sister Lize an' me finally paid no heed to the town gossip, but quietly went our ways and let June go his'n. We was satisfied that he was merely nibblin' here and experimentin' there; didn't mean to settle down on anybody yet awhile.

"Now down to the lower end of the village lived Widow Amanda Gayler an' her three daughters—well, three handsomer, cleverer, livelier gals never grew. Everybody liked 'em. Before long, Juniper was a frequent caller there. He rode out with Anna, the eldest; or he'd come to church with Jenny, the second; or he'd be heard of over to a dance at the Corners with Ruth, the youngest. The three sisters were wonderful fond of each other—an' fond of a little quiet mischief together, too. I don't think they kept any secrets from one another. It didn't occur to me, Master Frank, for some time that brother Juniper really wanted to marry one o' these girls—an' couldn't make up his mind which he wanted. But that was just the state he was in. You see he'd grown up with 'em all three an' been so intimate with 'em, even while he'd been keeping up his attentions to half-a-dozen other girls, that no one of 'em had apparently ever made a deeper impression on him than the other. They was all alike so friendly an' so kind an' so full of fun. When he came to settle down to goin' to their house more than elsewhere, he was better pleased with 'em than ever; but whether 'twas Anna or Jenny or Ruth?—that was the p'int poor June was a-wrestling with internally, for weeks an' weeks. That fall his uncle, Jared Kittery, died an' left him the Stone farm; an' brother said that he'd really ought to pick out a wife and settle down.

"One night I found it out. He let me understand, very sheepishly, just how he felt. 'You see, Brother Ebenezer,' he said, 'I am terribly perplexed, an' suppose I should find after I was married that I'd made a mistake.'"

"'Well, June,' says I, 'I don't see that you're likely to get far enough on to make a mistake. A man who don't know his own mind had better draw lots for a partner.' I spoke rather contemptuous, I dare say.

"Brother Juniper jumped up from his chair by the table with a sort of angry sparkle in his eye; but he gave a short laugh, 'Not a bad notion, Eben,' said he. I sat by the table, occasionally sayin' a word here an' there with reference to the three girls; how Anna was so well educated an' Jenny such a first-rate housekeeper an' Ruth such a pretty, sensible sort of a young female—all more to tease June a little than anything else. All at once June jumped up. He had three pieces o' paper in his hand. Blest if he hadn't written on one of them 'Anna,' on another 'Jane,' an' 'Ruth' on the last! 'There,' says he, shakin' 'em together in my hat, 'much obliged to you for your good advice, Brother Ben. I'm going to draw for one of those girls. Whichever name I get—she's the one I'm goin' to ask to be Mrs. Juniper Kittery before Sabberday.'

"I laughed, takin' the hull matter as a foolish joke. 'All right,' says I, 'I'll hold the hat.' So I did. June shut his eyes and jammed in his fist. 'Read it out!' says I to him. 'Anna,' he answers, rather slowly an' as if not so astonishin'ly happyfied. He tossed away the paper and said no more. Thinks me, 'June has got some sort of an' in'nard preference for one 'o them sisters, after all; and he don't know it, but it isn't for 'Anna.'

"I never thought seriously of that caper we two had out that evenin', until Saturday night, when just as I was closin' up the house, last one to go to bed, in steps June.

"'I've done it, Eben,' says he, with a sing'lar sober face.

"'June!' says I; 'not Anna-d.'

"'Yes,' he answers 'I've Anna-d; not Jenny-d nor Ruth-d. Don't you recollect last Monday evenin'? That settled it. I've abided by that piece o' paper. She said she'd have me. It's done; an' I'm glad.'

"'Well,' said I, 'I give you joy, June; though I may say your way o' clearin' up your doubts ain't to my taste for common usage. Anna's a fine girl.'

"'But that ain't all, brother Eben,' he went on. 'Anna's got an amazin' queer notion o' gettin married. 'Tseems she's been a readin' some novels or stories and so forth; an' I guess they've made her fanciful. She thinks that it'd be grand fun to surprise our folks along with her ma an' the other two girls, by us two bein' married on the sly, the night before Thanksgivin'—an' then comin' home and tellin' 'em. I don't see any fun in that—not a bit! I think it looks rather foolish. But Anna—I declare I don't know what's got into her!—she will hold to it! The long and short of it is that—' 'You've promised to do it,' says I.

"'Yes,' he answers. 'I suppose it'll make a stir; but that can't be helped. I've promised. None of her folks nor ours must know anything about our engagement yet. On Thanksgivin' evenin' I'm to call for Anna with the sleigh. I want you to come along too, Eben. We'll go straight down to Battle Hill, to Parson Latham's, an' have the knot tied. Then we'll come back an' let it out to the widow an' Jenny an' Ruth. After that the hull crowd of us will pile down here, an' have the pleasure of seein' father an' mother an' everybody here open their eyes. That's Anna's idea. As I said, I don't specially admire it, but still I give in to it.'

"Thinks me, Master Frank, there's some game here that clever girl's up to! Mebbe—an' mebbe not. But I told Juniper I'd go with him on Thanksgivin' night. 'You two can sit in the back seat and I'll drive,' I said. June laughed. 'See here, June,' I says a moment later just as we went up the stairs, 'I hope that you'll never let Anna know how it was that you picked her out from her sisters.'

"June blushed an' stammered something like 'Cert'inly not—it would have come out this way in any case'—an' went into his room. 'H'm,' I thought, 'I'm not so sure of that. I must give you a good talk to-morrow.'

"When I tried to talk, however, June wouldn't hear to me. 'He knew what he was doing'—so he persisted. Anna was the girl who would make him just the wife he wanted; an' the Stone farm was all ready for 'em to move in right away.' He had 'rather taken a fancy, he remembered, to Ruth at one time, but that hadn't amounted to anything.' I said no more, but I kept up quite a-thinkin.'

"The night before Thanksgivin' of that year was as clear as a bell. There was three feet 'o snow all over the country. At 7 o'clock June an' I drove to the Gaylers' door. Almost before I got the horses still, a figure all tightly wrapped up slipped out the gate. Poor Anna! She seemed terrible nervous as June helped her into the seat by him.

"'Oh, June,' I heard her say, 'I almost wish I'd never thought o' this silly plan.'

"June did almost all the talkin' while we spun down the street and out on the Battle Hill turnpike. Anna sat with his arm half round her, and seemin' for the first time to realize that she was takin' an important step in life.

"I hardly looked at 'em after Anna was in her seat by June. The horses was in a complete gale. I had to give them my hull attention. It required whip an' reins an' everything else to make 'em behave. The parsonage at Battle Hill is only two-miles-an'-a-half from our village. We fairly flew over the road Then, just before we passed the big gates that led to Squire Loftus's place, Dollar gave a lunge. That set Prince a-goin'. Before I could help it, they wheeled sharp, overset the sleigh, an' ran themselves up to their shoulders in a snow-bank. There they stood. We, meanwhile, were pickin' ourselves up as best we could.

"In the name of goodness!—' I heard Juniper shout in a voice that frightened me half to death. I scrambled up and looked at the other two. It was bright moonlight. There stood Brother Juniper. In front of us was the person who'd come with us in the sleigh—Ruth Gayler.

"Before either of us could say a word she burst right out a-cryin'. Then followed the queerest, the most mixed-up and generally surprisin' explanation of what had took place an' how it had come about, that ever I expect to hear in all my mortal life. Most of the time Juniper just stood there, pale and bewildered. I put the best part of the bad questions there was to ask, holding the horses' heads. It must have looked a curious picture.

"Our hired help and Lucretia Tabb, who'd been dressmakin' at the Gaylers' for a couple o' weeks, off an' on, was great friends. That night when Brother June had drawn that lot—we'd ought both to have been ashamed of ourselves for such foolishness—our Almira'd overheard the hull affair. She told Lucretia Tabb. And what does Lucretia do but tell Anna; an' Anna told her sisters.

"At first, Anna was pretty well put out at Brother June. Then when she an' Jenny an' Ruth talked it over, they couldn't but laugh and call it all a real joke on June. Then they put their heads together directly, to find out a way to punish June for coming to one of them with an offer under such circumstances. That was why Anna'd contrived the stolen wedding.

"When they first planned it out, Ruth (who had plenty of mischief in her) was perfectly willin' to undertake the part arranged for her—she to meet brother June, instead of Anna, in the dark. That'd be easy; the girls had all much of a height, figger and voice. When we'd reached Parson Latham's steps, she was to pull of her veils and make a low bow to poor June an' say, 'Mr. Juniper Kittery, I've brought my sister's compliments an' she hopes that the next time you ask a girl to marry you, you'll know whether you love her or whether any of her sisters mightn't do just as well—especially, she hopes that you won't toss up for her.' Then she was to hold out the identical piece of paper with 'Anna' written on it. (Almira pounced on it, while she was sweeping, the day after 'twas written.) An', last of all, Ruth calculated to say, 'Come, June; a joke's a joke. We don't bear no malice, not even sister Ann. You mustn't. Just drive me back home.'

"But, you see, Master Frank, Ruth had liked brother June more than she thought, an' all the week the idea of actin' such a part even to oblige Anna and have some sport, galled her the worse. She couldn't bear to think of it. She begged Anna and Jenny to let her off an' Jenny to play the part of Anna herself. But, no; they insisted on her keepin' to her promise. So, between her bein' so mortified and so afraid o' hurtin' brother's feelin's too keenly, she was pretty well onnerved when Anna and Jenny pushed her out of the door to run to the sleigh. Then, too, there was me. June hadn't happened to say a word about calculatin' on my goin' to Parson Latham's with 'em Ruth felt worse than ever.

"'Oh, June,' she said, with her long golden hair all fallin' down on her shoulders an' her voice choked with cryin', 'will you, will you forgive me? Please do, dear June, I'm so ashamed of myself. Whatever shall I do, to show you how sorry I am?'

"June didn't answer for a minute. His eyes were flashin' an' his teeth set. I could see that Anna Gayler was out of his books forever. But what I couldn't see was goin' on, jest in that identical space o' time. Brother June was findin' out his own heart at last! He looked at Ruth an' remembered what good true friends him an' her'd been during all their pranks and capers. He was discoverin' what a beautiful face she had (for she was the handsomest of the three), an' how she felt at havin' helped in mortifyin' him. She was a good, true girl, was Ruth, under all her mischief.

"Ruth," says brother, coming up closer to her an' holding out his hand, 'don't say no more; please don't. It's I who ought to beg pardon of Anna, and all of you. I do it—'specially of you, Ruth. I know now that I haven't cared half so much for Anna as—as I have—for somebody else. What a blind fool a man can be, if he only tries! Ruth, I came down this road to-night to get married to a woman I thought I loved. Please don't be angry, or think me a weathercock as I've seemed to be. I want to go back an' tell Anna and your folks an' mine an' all the village that I've married the girl I love. There's the difference."

"Ruth Gayler started back from Brother June. I could see how white her face had grown in the clear light. 'June, she says sharply—'I—I don't understand.'

As she spoke she tried to draw away her hand, and June went on quickly, 'But I do, an' I must make you see it.'

"I quietly turned away, under a pretense o' the horses bein' restless. I was dumbfounded. June and she stood there, with me a little way off. They talked an' talked. I would catch June's voice now an' then an' not her's at all. I knew now that she loved brother; an' that, whatever he said, she'd have to fight against herself, or June would carry any point he chose—the han'some, persuadin', shamefaced fellow.

"All at once he turned round and called out with a laugh that rang over the fields 'Hurrah, brother Eben! I've won my wife.' An' he came over to the sleigh, half leadin', half liftin' Ruth Gayler in his arms, with her a-laughin' and tryin' to make him keep still and goodness knows what all. I j'ined in with all the fun, an' we had a real frolic. But it ended in our goin' straight to Parson Latham's door an' gettin' out and Brother Juniper an' Ruth Gayler blushin' and tremblin', bein' married then an' there before my eyes, an' my drivin' home to the Gaylers' in my best style.

"You can imagine how the village was stirred up when next day part o' the story got out. Only part; for all the widow's folks kept Anna's share in it still as a mouse; an' so did June an' me. Everybody was pantin' to know 'why in the world them two young folks'd been married in that queer, sudden way. Nobody outside us two families ever found out. As for Anna, she was just as delighted as any woman could be. She'd suspected how Ruth felt and June too, all along an' had hoped that after this joke was all over, brother might think some day seriously o' Ruth. But, of course she'd no notion of so sudden a wind-up of the thing, in just the way she wished. As for Ruth—why, she made June the best an' lovin'est wife in the world an' he's been as happy with her as the day is long, at the farm."
