POULTRY.—In order to have fine fowls, it is necessary to choose a good breed, and have a proper care taken of them. A hen-house should be large and high; and should be frequently cleaned out, or the vermin of fowls will increase greatly—but hens must not be disturbed while sitting; for if frightened, they sometimes forsake their nests. Wormwood and rue should be planted plentifully about their houses; boil some of the former, and sprinkle it about the floor, which should be of smooth earth not paved. The best age for setting a hen is from two to five years; and you should remark which hens make the best brood-
