AN ARMY PORTIA.

By Charles King, U. S. Army.

AUTHOR OF "THE COLONEL'S DAUGHTER," "THE DESERTER," "FROM THE RANKS," "DUNRAVEN RANCH," "TWO SOLDIERS," ETC.

"Surely they cannot believe such an outrageous tissue of lies," burst out Mrs. Wharton, vehemently. "Surely the moment our side of the story is heard the public will see the difference."

"Our side, my dear madam, is never heard. The newspaper has the public ear. Scandal spreads world-wide; truth never reaches half as far. Hearn has only one recourse—grin and bear it, and pray God nothing worse may follow."

"What worse can follow, I should like to know?" asked Lee, indignantly.

"What worse? Why, man, you don't suppose a Chicago paper sends an emissary thousand miles to work up only one scene for a sensation? Look for the next day's issue, and the next. Wait till the letters demanding explanation begin coming in from department, division and army headquarters. Fiat justitia, ruat cœlum, will be the Palladium's cry; Parturiunt montes, nascitur ridiculus mus, the outcome. But the same, my friends and fellow-citizens, we won't get through this row without the most of kind of a court-martial—Ah, the folly of the commanding officer! Whom do we want?"

As a word was spoken, and every eye was fixed upon the trim figure of the approaching soldier, who entered the gate and, halting respectfully a few yards away from the foot of the steps, saluted:

"The colonel's compliments to the officer of the day, and desires that Private Welsh, now in the guard-house, be sent to the office immediately."

"Aha!" said Kenyon, as the soldier turned away. "Already somebody's been tickling the colonel with a telegram. He's hardly had time to read the papers. Now he will hear Welsh's story; and when Welsh has sufficiently blackened the character of his commanding officer, Hearn will be afforded a chance—Hearn, my boy, my hearty sympathies are with you. By all means go and prosper in your profession, and when you come to live as I do—Martin, you and I have a moment to spare, come over to my quarters with me; I want to talk this thing over with you—Good afternoon, Mrs. Graves. Good afternoon, Mrs. Graves. A happy thought occurs to me. What was Cambronne is report to have said at Waterloo?—The Guard dies, but never surrenders.' Here's a more modern epigram for you: The Press lies, but never retracts."

CHAPTER VIII.

With all his soldierly qualifications, Colonel Morris, like most of his sex, had certain defects of character. He was a tireless worker as a regimental commander, and had done a great deal to bring up the "one" of the Eleventh, which had suffered lately during the reign of old Riggs, his predecessor. He had won a good name as a young officer in the war days, and had borne himself well in the more trying and hazardous campaign of the far frontier. But Morris, both during the war and since, had been staff duty that had brought him into official and political circles in Washington; and learned there the lesson that an ounce of influence is worth a pound of pure record, that in the most matters affecting army legislation it was the men who were the farthest away from the army whose opinions Congress sought; that in all appointments to the staff departments personal and professional excellence might plead in vain unless backed by Senators by the score; and that while judicious use the gifts that God had put in way in the shape of the public press might result in the gradual hearing of a monument of popular esteem, a single unguarded word or petulant expression would tumble the whole fabric about his ears. He had seen the highest names in legislative, financial, and social circles dragged in the dust; the head of the House of Representatives dethroned; a President monarch execrated; a gallant soldier, maimed in battle, ridiculed. In combined ceaseless assault the press had overwhelmed the record of years. Morris had faced death in a dozen fields without flinch, but he trembled in the presence of a reporter.

Nervous, irritable, and unstrung, he called his officers about him on the following day. Guard-mounting was still in progess the band was playing sweetly on the grassy parade; the ringing voice of the soldierly young adjutant swung the column around in its jaunty march in review. One after another the troop and company officers came quietly in, bade their flushed commander a courteous good-morning, and took their seats. He was pacing the floor, tugging at his mustache, another telegram in his hand.

"Where's Dr. Ingersoll?" he asked, suddenly stopping in his walk.

"Here, colonel," said the post surgeon, stepping within the office from the brick pavement outside. "I was waiting a moment to see the steward, to give some directions as to Brent's case."

"Ah, yes. He's better, I believe. Now, I see you have marked Welsh for duty, and the man tells me he couldn't sleep all night because of pains and chills."

"Welsh is as well as I am, Colonel Morris or if ill has only himself to blame. He knows as well as I do that he has no business to go to the store and drink when under treatment and taking medicine. It is my firm conviction, sir, that that man is simply trying to shirk."

"Well, well, Dr. Ingersoll, it is a matter in which we cannot be too careful. You haven't the faintest conception, sir, to what this most unfortunate affair may lead. It is infinitely better that we should be imposed upon by a shirk than that the public should get to look upon us as this man's persecutors. The Palladium that came yesterday was bad enough, in all conscience, but here's another telegram from department head-quarters demanding immediate investigation and report upon the allegations contained in the second day's issue of the series. How many are there to be in heaven's name?—Mr. Hearn, have you submitted your explanation?" said the colonel, turning abruptly upon the young lieutenant, who was sitting in pained silence by Captain Lane.

"It is in the hands of the adjutant, sir," answered Lane, rising.

"I have not seen it—I have not seen it. I hope you have been full and explicit, Mr. Hearn."

The lieutenant's pale face flushed with sudden sense of indigation:

"I have never yet been accused of any attempt at concealment of my actions, Colonel Morris. Gentlemen present who have known me nearly six years will tell you that."

"I'm not accusing you of anything, Mr. Hearn. Pray keep your temper, sir. But you do not seem to appreciate in the least the very trying and unpleasent position in which you have, however unwittingly, placed every officer at this post, especially me, on whom the burden of the responsibility must fall. If I had known four days ago that you had used violence—or at least force—in ejecting that soldier from the barroom, I should certainly have discountenanced his further punishment. This sort of thing cannot be tolerated, Mr. Hearn—And, gentlemen, I say it to you one and all, this sort of thing cannot be allowed. It gives the press an opportunity to criticise our methods of discipline. It makes a matyr of the man in the eyes of the public, and we can't stand it. I have felt compelled to release him from the confinement and to direct the quashing of the charges against him."

Hair Magic

Is a good name of Dr. Dorenwend's German preparation for the hair. It really works like magic. All who have used it pronounce it to be unequaled for remedying the lost vitality of the hair roots, restoring gray hair, removing dandruff, etc. Just try it. It is first-class. All druggists sell it

If a thing has to be done, do it promptly. The longer one waits thinking about it, and dreading it, the worse it will be; besides which life is much more pleasant to the person who promptly performs his duty.

A man's wife should always be the same especially to her husband; but if she is weak and nervous and uses Carter's Iron Pills, she cannot be, for they will make her "feel like a different person," at least so they all say, and their husbands say so, too.

"Are you acquainted with this?" asked Banks, as he displayed an unpaid note to its maker. "No," replied Kyting, "I never met it."

Carter's Little Liver Pills must not be confounded with common Cathartic or Purgative Pills, as they are entirely unlike them in every respect. One trial will prove their superiority.

Thompson—I can't see why you find it so hard to meet your bills? Dedway—I don't; I find it hard to dodge them.

Editorial Evidence.

A LONG CHASE AFTER LOVERS.

From Germany to London, Thence to India, China and Washington.

From the Globe-Democrat.

TACOMA, March 3.—Last July Fredda Strahler, a very pretty and accomplished young German girl, and an heir to a fortune of $500,000, while in Berlin, became acquainted with Chris Hoffman, a young German, who was employed as a priuter on a Boston paper, and fell desperately in love with him. The girl was engaged to be married at the time to a wealthy German student, but she determined not to marry him, but wed the man of her choice. Her guardian seriously objected, but she was obdurate. She secured possession of several valuable negotiable papers and a large amount of jewelry, which she disposed of, and by some means managed to elude detection and leave the country accompanied by her lover. The twain went to London, thence to India.

When the fact of her flight was discovered by her guardian there commenced a chase against time almost rivaling in excitement George Francis Train's journey. An uncle of the girl and the abandoned lover followed the pair from London to India, China and America. The couple left San Francisco about two weeks ago and came to the Sound country. They registered at an up-town hotel in Tacoma under an assumed name, as man and wife. From there they moved to a house on E street. They considered themselves safe from pursuit, and were about to take out a marriage license, preparatory to a wedding at an early date. The irate uncle and the disappointed lover arrived in San Francisco a few days ago, got track of the runaways, and immediately came to the city, where they located the wayward couple, but after all they were doomed to disappointment. Fredda and her gallant acted upon the defensive, and the uncle was unceremoniously thrown down stairs as a result of their attack upon their united forces. He sought an attorney, but was informed the law could not be appealed to to compel the girl to return home. He pleaded with her, arguing that riches and nobility were hers if she would only forsake her printer and return to her fatherland. His pleadings were of no avail, and in the face of a bewailing uncle and a remonstrating, deserted lover, the couple took the train for Portland, leaving them standing at the Pacific avenue depot, sadly thinking over their long and fruitless chase.

The uncle says that the Strahler family is exceedingly wealthy, and the girl will be disinherited and lose a large portion of her valuable estate for her foolish act.
