ON BEING TAUNTED ON ACCOUNT OF YOUTH

SIR,—The atrocious crime of being a young man, which the honourable gentleman has, with such spirit and decency, charged upon me, I shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny, but content myself with wishing that I may be one of those whose follies may cease with their youth, and not of that number who are ignorant in spite of experience. Whether youth can be imputed to any man as a reproach, I will not, sir, assume the province of determining; but surely age may become justly contemptible, if the opportunities which it brings have passed away without improvement, and vice appears to prevail when the passions have subsided. The wretch who, after having seen the consequences of a thousand errors, continues still to blunder, and whose age has only added obstinacy to stupidity, is surely the object either of abhorrence or contempt, and deserves not that his gray hairs should secure him from insult. Much more, sir, is he to be abhorred, who as he has advanced in age, has receded from virtue, and become more wicked with less temptation; who prostitutes himself for money which he cannot enjoy, and spends the remains of his life in the ruin of his country. But youth, sir, is not my only crime; I have been accused of acting a theatrical part. A theatrical part may either imply some peculiarities of gesture, or a dissimulation of my real sentiments, and an adoption of the opinions and language of another man.

In the first sense, sir, the charge is too trifling to be confuted, and deserves only to be mentioned that it may be despised. I am at liberty, like every other man, to use my own language; and though, perhaps, I may have some ambition, yet, to please this gentleman, I shall not lay myself under any restraint, nor very solicitously copy his dicton or his mien, however matured by age, or modelled by experience. But if any man shall, by charging me with theatrical behaviour, imply that I utter any sentiment but my own, I shall treat him as a calumniator and a villain; nor shall any protection shelter him from the treatment he deserves. I shall, on such an occasion, without scruple, trample upon all those forms with which wealth and dignity entrench themselves; nor shall anything but age restrain my resentment; age, which always brings one privilege, that of being insolent and supercilious, without punishment. But with regard, sir, to those whom I have offended, I am of opinion that if I had acted a borrowed part, I should have avoided their censure; the heat that offended them is the ardour of conviction, and that zeal for the service of my country which neither hope nor fear shall influence me to suppress. I will not sit unconcerned while my liberty is invaded, nor look in silence upon public robbery. I will exert my endeavours, at whatever hazard, to repel the aggressor and drag the thief to justice, whoever may protect him in his villany, and whoever may partake of his plunder.

From the Speeches of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham. (Born November 15, 1708; died May 11, 1778.)

NAPOLEON ON WARS

MR. Herbert Vivian has been examining the books in Napoleon's library at Elba, and has picked out for the edification of the readers of the Times some passages which Napoleon had marked. The book which seems to have attracted Napoleon most was the Essai général de Tactique by Guibert, the young Colonel of whom Voltaire recklessly said that he did not know whether he would be a Corneille or a Turenne. Napoleon marked one passage in which Guibert said that Ministers in modern States worked without unity in independent Departments. The kind of peace such politicians would make is described as follows, and bears Napoleon's mark of agreement:—

"What can be the issue of our wars today? . . . Victor and vanquished become about equally exhausted. The total of the public debt increases. Credit falls. Money is scarce. The navies find no more sailors; the armies no more soldiers. Ministers on both sides feel that it is time to negotiate. Peace is made. A few colonies or provinces change masters. Often the source of dispute is not closed and each of the belligerents remains seated among his ruins, busy paying his debts and sharpening his sword."

The warning against the kind of peace we must not have is worth remembering.—The Spectator.

BETTER FOREST PROTECTION FOR N. B.

The New Brunswick Government is preparing plans for the reorganization of the whole forest protection system. That the provincial forest possessions of over 18,000 square miles merit the most modern and effective safeguards against fire goes without saying. The notion that forests can be left to take care of themselves has been abandoned by nearly every government on earth having authority over timber lands. Once the responsibility for forest protection is admitted, it behooves a government to build up the most economical and up-to-date patrol service. The maintenance of New Brunswick's forest industries depends absolutely upon the elimination of destructive fires. In 1912, before the slump in the lumber trade was under way, New Brunswick produced nearly $7,500,000 of lumber, shingles, pulp wood and lath, not counting fire wood, fence posts, etc. The New Brunswick Government receives an average of about $500,000 a year from forest operations and thousands of workmen owe their living to the same source. A very substantial part of the business of our merchants and manufacturers is accounted for by the annual wood harvest.

To those who wonder if New Brunswick can be freed from serious forest fires, it may be pointed out that a private association of Quebec Province, the St. Maurice Forest Protective Association, patrolling two-thirds as much territory as the whole forest area of New Brunswick, have reduced forest fires to an extent hitherto regarded as impossible. This was accomplished by good organization, close inspection of rangers, and authority to regulate the clearing fires of settlers. New Brunswick has done much already in the way of forest protection, and can enjoy similar immunity by taking similar measures. Lacking them, no Government can hope to preserve invaluable timber assets against the ravages of fire.—Canadian Forestry Journal for October.

DR. GEORGE R. PARKIN, C. M. G., ON THE BRITISH EMPIRE

ON April 18 last Sir Henry Wilson, K. C. M. G. Secretary of the Royal Colonial Institute, read a paper at the Institute on "The Integration of the Empire," Dr. George R. Parkin being in the chair. The paper and the discussion which follow it appear in the United Empire magazine for October, and we regret that we have no space to print it in full. Dr. Parkin in introducing the speaker said:

As you know, everybody is thinking about the Empire in these days. We have never in the history of the British Empire had to face such big problems as are before us to-day—such complicated questions that require the best opinions of the best men drawn from every part of that quarter of the world which the British Empire now practically covers. We need not be a bit afraid of dozens of meetings like this, in which we are trying to clear our minds and form our convictions about what is best for the Empire, and the best means by which we can work out the great destiny in store for us. It is particularly necessary even at this time of great difficulty that we should understand whence we came and whither we are going. In Sir Harry Wilson we have the good luck to have a Secretary who has himself been a great student of Empire matters, and who served the Empire in important ways at one of the most critical periods.

After the reading of the paper and the discussion which followed it, Dr. Parkin moved a vote of thanks in the following terms:

I now move a hearty vote of thanks to Sir Henry Wilson for his interesting, able, and instructive paper. I entirely agree with the last speaker that we are not going to accomplish this business easily, and that no burst of enthusiasm or patriotism will accomplish it. No great federation was ever accomplished without the most intense effort and after a long process of education. But I want to point out this encouraging fact—no nation in the course of human history has ever had the range of experience in working out federations that the Anglo-Saxons have. In 1776 they had to solve the problem of federating the American Continent. The difficulties were immense. Anybody who has read Fiske's book knows the critical period came after the war of the American Revolution had been fought out. When I first met Mr. Wise in Australia at the time I went out to discuss the question of Imperial Federation (I think he will admit his views have enormously changed and expanded since those days), one-half of the people of Australia would have treated with contempt the idea that you could unite states so separate in interest and in some ways in sentiment. We have accomplished this by people of our own race in the United States, Canada, Australia, and in still more difficult circumstances in South Africa, so that when we do face the problem we shall have an extraordinary range of experience to fall back upon. We shall have to slay one great enemy or take some means to weaken his power before we can accomplish this task. I mean the power of party spirit in our political system. The only way in which that convention can have any fair hope of achieving its purpose is to make men of both parties come and take their part in it. If you were to-day to call together a conference of the controlling Governments only, every politician remaining behind would be lying in wait to trip up his fellows who came over here. You must call up the men of all political parties and let them fight out the principles on which they will be free to stand when they go back to face their constituents. If you call together the statesmen of all parties, I believe you will thereby eliminate the poison of a system which in the past has brought us very close to the edge of political destruction, and that you will then have some fair and reasonable basis on which to proceed. Major-Gen. Hutton is a soldier; naturally he thinks defence—the soldier's work—is the one thing that has hammered and will hammer the Empire together. I am willing to admit there is great force in what he says. If on the other hand you study the Empire and its outlying and central parts, I think you will agree that you can imagine no closer connexion that can exist than between the great producing areas in the outlying parts and the consuming and manufacturing centres in the heart of the Empire. Moreover, we say we are a practical people, but after all we are an immensely sentimental people. I have roamed round the Empire a great deal, and have often felt that apart from trade and defence and vast material interests, there is after all an amazing bond in the sentiment of the Empire. Out in those distant parts you will find men who bring up children and grandchildren to talk of this country as home, and here in the Motherland, which has watched the growth of these great new nations in the spirit of the mother in Virgil who looks with pride on the growing up of her splendid daughters, a sentiment has grown up of amazing affection, love, and sympathy towards these new colonies. With all that material to work upon let us not be discouraged. We are facing a great trial. If there is one thing to my mind more true than anything else, it is that we are coming out of this conflict a greater nation than before, but a nation that is going to provoke envy in the world, unless we keep our heads level and our purpose high and true, and give convincing evidence to the world that we are going to use our strength for the good of the world and not merely for our own selfish gratification.

In returning thanks Sir Henry Wilson asked the meeting to give a vote of thanks to his dear old friend Dr. Parkin for taking the chair. They had worked together in the cause of Imperial Federation for thirty years, and during that time his respect and affection, and he might say love, for Dr. Parkin had grown continuously.

"Do you intend to take any steps to contradict the people who misrepresent you?" "No," replied Senator Sorghum. "When you contradict something you run the risk of bringing the matter to the attention of a whole lot of people who never would have heard about it if you had kept still."—Washington Star.

THE DISTANT GUNS

NEGLIGENTLY the cart-track descends into the valley;
The drench of the rain has passed, and the clover breathes;
Scents are abroad: in the valley a mist whitens
Along the hidden river, where the evening smiles.
The trees are asleep, the shadows are longer and longer,
Melting blue in the tender twilight; above,
In a pallor, barred with lilac and ashen cloud,
Delicate as a spirit the young moon brightens;
And distantly a bell intones the hour of peace,
Where roofs of the village, gray and red, cluster
In leafy dimness. Peace, old as the world!
The crickets, shrilling in the high, wet grass,
And gnats clouding upon the frail wild roses,
Murmur of you: but hark! like a shudder in the air,
Ominous and alien, knocking on the farther hills
As with airy hammers, the ghosts of terrible sound—
Guns! From afar they are knocking on human hearts
Everywhere over the silent evening country,
Knocking with fear and dark presentiment. Only
The moon's beauty, where no life nor joy is,
Brightening softly and seeing nothing, has peace.

LAURENCE BINYON, in The Spectator.
