HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE

BY MAY CHRISTIE

Copyright, 1920, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate

XVII.—Alice Hears the News

I ran lightly after Mary Higgins, and together we ascended the staircase in the wake of Mr. Anstruther.

Arrived at his wife's room, he tapped upon the door.

There was no answer.

He turned the handle, all to no avail. The door was locked.

"She's asleep," he said, turning mechanically towards me, and ignoring Mary Higgins.

The latter tittered unpleasantly.

"Oh, but you must wake her up and tell her of the burglary. Dear Mr. Anstruther, Alice would never forgive you if she missed all the fun and excitement. Who knows"—here she tittered again—"who knows but the burglar himself may be hiding in that room."

Alice's husband ignored the spinster's idiocy. He turned and strode into his own room, and we could hear him try the communicating door which led into the apartment of his wife.

It, too, was locked.

He came out again into the passage. He looked intensely worried.

"I can't make Alice hear. Helene, d'you think she's ill?"

"Why, no, you silly man. She's probably asleep." Inwardly I thought nothing of the sort. But I wanted to allay his fears. I rapped smartly on the door. "Alice, where art thou?" I cflanted, with a gaiety I was far from feeling.

Still no answer.

"Oh, something must have happened to her." Poor Mr. Anstruther's genial face went white. He put an immense shoulder up against the framework of the door and prepared to heave it open. "We must get to her somehow."

By sheer physical force I dragged him back. We had surely had enough scenes tonight, without a further one.

"Don't be absurd!" My voice was sharp. "I'll soon wake her!" I stooped down to the keyhole and cried:

"Alice! For the love of Mike, open this door, or your big, foolish husband says he'll smash it down!"

In the silence that followed this decisive plea, there was a faint snorting sound, as though fair Alice were but newly awaking from sound slumbers.

"Is that you, Helene?"

Footsteps crossed the floor, the door was opened, and there in the aperture stood Alice, fully dressed.

Her husband—blank amazement on his face
