CHAPTER XVIII.

WHICH EXPLAINS THE CAUSE OF LILLIAS GIBSON'S GRIEF.

Poor Lillias. That white face, that stony look of hers, he comprehended not. He had not the slightest conception of the cold icy hand that laid its clutch on her heart—the weight of misery that was dragging her down to the depths of despair. Living himself in a world where self-interest and material advantage were the sole governing motives, he was ignorant of, and therefore could not believe in or estimate, any different rule of guidance. It need not be wondered at, then, that he had no comprehension of the state of mind into which his daughter had been plunged.

Terrible was the crisis which had come—dreadful was the explosion that was about to burst forth. There resided in the soul of Lillias a strength of resistance to wrong, of adherence to right, opposition to undue and unjustifiable authority, which her father knew not of—which she did not herself hitherto suspect, for circumstances had never arisen to elicit it. They had arisen now, and she felt it rousing itself in her bosom to meet them.

"Father!" she said in a tone of unnatural calmness, "did it not occur to you that such an arrangement might be disagreeable to me?"

"No, it never did," he answered. "How could an impossibility occur to me?"

"An impossibility!"

"Certainly. I knew it was impossible that a marriage so splendid and advantageous would be disagreeable to you, nor is it in the nature of things that it should."

"Perhaps so," she observed, "were it a settled point that I regarded it from your point of view."

"From what other point of view can you regard it?" he returned, with an impatience in his tone.

She slowly shook her head—"You may not understand it," she said, "but there is another point of view, and from that such a marriage assumes a very different character."

"I don't understand that, and I have no wish to understand it," he rejoined, still more impatiently. "Noneed for you and I going in search of insane points of view. We have sense enough, I reckon, to know what our advantage is, and to seize it."

"But yet," said Lillias, and her voice faltered as she spoke, for she felt the moment of outburst had come—"but yet, father, we may think differently as to what our advantage is."

"It is not what me may, or what we might, but what we do," he snappishly rejoined. "And as we must have only one idea in regard to this matter, you had better set about the needful preparations. Your stepmother is ready to give you all assistance. I don't know precisely what time Mr. Ralston may be inclined to give you, but I rather think he is anxious that the marriage should take place very soon. It is quite necessary, at any rate, that no time should be lost on your part, and you had better go at once and consult with Mrs. Gibson."

"Father, stay," burst out Lillias, with sudden vehemence, for he had risen, and was moving from the room. Her abrupt impetuosity arrested his steps, and he turned and gazed on her with silent astonishment.

"I must speak out, and speak plainly," said Lillias, pale but determined. "This proposal I cannot listen to—I cannot marry Mr. Ralston."

Fully a minute did her father stand gazing at her silently and fixedly; then he stepped back, his eye glaring, his lips pressed together, and a terrible expression on his face.

"Lillias Gibson," he said, "these words can only be the utterance of a momentary madness. Their import you have realized, and 'tis as well. You must already repent having spoken them. I shall consider them unsaid. Shall I send your stepmother up, or shall you seek her in the lower room? She is waiting there expecting you."

"No, father," replied Lillias, very calmly, but all the more firmly. "She need not come to me, and I shall not seek her on this subject. I cannot, and I will not marry Mr. Ralston."

"You cannot and you will not marry Mr. Ralston," repeated her father, with deliberate and awful emphasis. "Was that what you said, and are you ready to repeat it? Now, pause—pause and consider."

"I do repeat it," answered Lillias, without a moment's hesitation.

He slowly seated himself in the chair he had already occupied, and pointing to her former seat, he said—

"Sit down."

Lillias silently obeyed.
