THIRTY MURDERS A DAY IN THE UNITED STATES

Appalling Total Has Aroused Public Sentiment—Court Procedure Blamed

In New York There Were 119 Murders Last Year—In London Total Was 19

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—Recent crimes of violence, including the conspiracy resulting in Herman Rosenthal's death and the atrocious murders of two little girls, Julia Connors and Mary Barbuto, have aroused the American Prison Association, which is preparing pronouncement against the courts.

"In New York city last year there were 119 cases of homicide, while in London, with a far greater population, there were only nineteen," says Judge De Courcey, of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, who is chairman of the American Prison Association's Committee on Criminal Procedure. Then he adds: "In the United States punishment for crime is slow and uncertain; in England it is swift and certain."

These recent crimes in New York city, which have stirred the country and caused comment in European newspapers, will be the subject of a special report by the Prison Association, advance sheets of which indicate that criminal procedure in the courts is to blame for the prevalence of such outlawry.

Blame Laid to Courts

"Then thousand homicide crimes are committed in the United States each year," says the head of the New York State Reformatory, at Elmira, who is a leading criminologist active in the Prison Association. "One hundred and eighteen homicide crimes were committed for the same time in London, and London is four times the size of Chicago.

"Homicidal crime in the United States has increased 450 per cent. since 1889. Thereof, the ratio of convictions is less than ten per cent. The same ratio for Germany is ninety-five per cent. Homicidal crime in the United States exceeds the total of any ten civilized nations outside of Russia."

From these and other statistics being compiled, and by Judge De Courcey's significant comparison with England, it is apparent to criminologists that the Prison Association intends to show that the courts are largely to blame for the prevalence of crime.

Thirty Murders a Day.

Nearly thirty persons are murdered each day in the United States, excluding Alaska and the island dependencies. Not one murderer in four in the United States is brought to trial, according to the association's statistics, and not one in seventy-five of those brought to trial receives a death sentence.

One commentator on these figures encies. Not one murderer in four in track betting ring by declaring:

"If you commit a murder it is better than a three to one shot that you will never be brought to trial. If you lose that bet it is better than a ten to one shot that you will never be sentenced to the penitentiary, and it is better than an eighty to one shot that you will never be hanged or electrocuted."

That is, it is better than an eighty to one shot that the slayers of Herman Rosenthal and the brute who killed Mary Barbuto will never be electrocuted for their crimes. Julia Connor's murderer killed himself. They have more than eighty chances in their favor to escape the death penalty, against one that they will be adequately punished according to law.

Increase of 900 Murders.

Judge De Courcey's report shows that there were nearly nine hundred more murders in the United States last year than in the previous year, yet but one in eighty-six was punished with death, as against one of seventy-four for the previous year.

This shows, as only figures can show, that violent crimes have increased alarmingly, while the notorious laxity of the police and the courts has become even more lax. Thus increasing the ratio of the effect of crime upon the people.

For each million of the population in 1906 there were 118 homicides in the United States; in Italy less than 15, in Canada less than 13, in Great Britain less than 9, and in Germany less than 5 homicides for every million of the people.

For each million of the population in 1906 there were 118 homicides in the United States; in Italy less than 15, in Canada less than 13, in Great Britain less than 9, and in Germany less than 5 homicides for every million of the population.

Of the nineteen persons who committed murder in London last year five committed suicide before they were arrested. All of the others except four were arrested and either convicted and executed or were sent to insane asylums, excepting one, who committed suicide while in prison awaiting trial.

The American Prison Association will call attention to a comparison of the figures in London with the figures of New York city, where 119 murders were committed in the same time.

That the excessive use of strong liquors is the primary cause for the violent crimes in this country is disproven by the association. The use of liquors in this country is not considered an alarming vice, and figures are submitted to substantiate this.

Less Strong Drink Here.

"There is certainly less strong drink including in this term whisky, gin, brandy and rum, consumed in St. Louis or Chicago than in any city of half their size in Great Britain," the report continues. "Let the traveller compare Liverpool and Glasgow with St. Louis or Chicago in this respect. With vastly more drunkenness in Liverpool and Glasgow there are fewer murders there because in England punishment is swift and certain, while in St. Louis it is slow and uncertain.

"An unsettled state of society is a cause for the prevalence of crime. Between the years 1849 and 1860 the most heterogeneous population that any spot on the face of the earth could present was to be found in the Territory of California. In the eager search for gold men of every nation and from every clime formed a society as rude as it was ephemeral Counts were quickly found to be a necessity, but they were scarcely established before they were corrupted, and the worst elements at once dictated and defied their decrees. Deaths by violence began to exceed in number those by disease or accident.

"In 1851, the people, long suffering and slow to move, at last arose in their might and grappled with the problem. It is the same problem we have today—how to prevent the increase of crime. Its solution was the Vigilance Committee, whose justice was unrelenting and unpurchasable, whose code new no technicalities, whose decrees were not appealable and whose swiftness of execution has known no parallel in judicial history.

"During the reign of this extraordinary tribunal crimes against the person were reduced to a minimum. The transition period was not ended, society remained as mixed and uncertain in 1852 as before 1851, but before 1851 punishment for crime was very slow and uncertain, while in 1852 it was very prompt and certain.

"By and by the vigor of the organization languished with the object of its formation apparently accomplished and it came to an end from a sheer lack of anything to do. The ordinary counts of law, with their forms and technicalities, asserted themselves, and while society became more settled crime multiplied."

HOT WATER KILLS MAN IN A BATH TUB

Horace Cumber, Immigrant, Dies in Regina After Taking a Bath

Regina, Sept. 13.—Horace Cumber, 36 years old, who arrived here last Friday, was found dead in the bath tub in a little room off the shower baths of the Y. M. C. A. shortly after ten o'clock this morning. Coroner W. A. Thomson has been called and will probably hold an examination this afternoon.

Came Here Friday

Horace Cumber came to Regina last Thursday evening with a chum from Quebec en route from Liverpool, England. Both were carpenters by trade, and were attracted by news that carpenters were in great demand. The friends is working here, having secured a job last Monday, but Cumber lost his kit of tools, worth, it is said, $150, somewhere along the route, and could find no work to do.

They were staying at the Immigration Hall, and last night were with a friend they had met during the trip here. E. W. Chapman, himself a stranger, met them on the boat and later in Regina, and last night made an engagement with Cumber to take him to the Y. M. C. A. baths. They met at the post office shortly after nine o'clock, and went directly to the Y. M. C. A. building, where Cumber was shown the shower baths.

Cumber, however, decided against the showers, and went into the little room off the showers where there was a tub, locked the door and proceeded to fill it with hot water. Mr. Chapman returned to the reading room of the Y. M. C. A., and read until about ten o'clock, then thinking his acquaintance had been a sufficient time in the bath, went down, as he said, "to pull him out." The man had apparently left, but the door of the little room was closed and he commented upon the fact to Engineer McDonald, who was standing nearby.

The two men found the door fastened, and the engineer raised himself above the partition of the room and looked over. He saw the body of the man entirely submerged in the hot water of the tub, and the two men then smashed the door open and pulled the body of Cumber out. A physician was hurriedly called, and within a few minutes Dr. Kells was on hand, but life was extinct and could not be revived.

While the loss of the kit of tools had weighed upon the deceased's mind to some extent, it is not believed that he had become despondent over the situation, as it was expected that the tools would be recovered soon. It is said rather that he probably got into a tub of water that was too hot for him, and a great lassitude probably came over him as he lay in the hot water. He fell asleep and his head dropped into the water and he was drowned.
