THE TURF

NANCY HANKS.

Nancy Hanks, 2.04, "Our Nancy," as the great daughter of Happy Medium is commonly called among horsemen, is the one and only queen of the turf to gain success as a matron. From Lady Suffolk down the trotting queens have failed to produce speed when retired to the harem, with the single exception of Nancy.

When the late J. Malsolm Forbes purchased the then fastest of trotters her turf days were practically over, and many considered the price paid, around $40,000, an extravagrant one. The press was full of stories of the failure of the former champion mares to make good when put to breeding.

The deep thinking horsemen were, however, of the opinion that Mr. Forbes had bought wisely, for there was an individuality about Nancy Hanks which bespoke of the ideal brood mare.

This she has proved to be, for she has given the turf Admiral Dewey, 2.04¾; Lord Roberts, 2.07¼; Markala, 2.18¼, and Vanitaza, 2.29½, whose dam, Princess of Manaco, was the result of breeding Nancy to the thoroughbreed imported Meddler.

The premier stallion at Forbes' farm when Nancy Hanks arrived there was the $125,000 Arion, 2.07¾, and she was bred to him in 1894, but failed to get with foal. She was bred to him again the following year and in April, 1896, dropped a filly which is registered as Narion.

The filly filly is the only one of Nancy's foals which has not acted as if possessed of extreme speed. She was trained some, but as she never gave promise of being able to beat 2.20 in her colthood days Mr. Forbes would not allow her to be given a record or trained when aged. She was bred to Bingen and produced Vice Commodore, who has worked miles around 2.15, and is to be raced in the grand circuit next season.

MR. FORBES FELT REPAID.

The queen was barren in 1897. In 1898 she gave birth to a colt by Bingen now known as Admiral Dewey. The Admiral was a sensation from the day he first wore a harness and as a 2-year-old could outbrush any aged trotter or pacer at Readville. As a 3-year-old he raced to a record of 2.14¼, which so pleased Mr. Forbes that he said he was well repaid for the money and time he had given for and to his horses.

A desire to make speed too rapidly broke Dewey down and robed the turf of a two-minute trotter. Last year with hardly preparation enough to go in 2.12 Dewey was marked in 2.04¾.

Nancy's foal of 1899 was the filly Princess of Monaco by the running horse Meddler. Bred to Peter the Great the Princess produced Vanitza, who this summer as a 2-year-old trotted to a mark of 2.29¾.

Lord Roberts, 2.07¼, by Arion, was the 1900 foal of Nancy. She was then bred to Peter the Great and Markala, 2.18¼, is the result. In the four following years she produced to Bingen and in 1905 was sent to Ohio to be bred to John A. McKerron.

She now has a filly at her side by the king of matinee trotters. She is believed to be in foal to Cochato, 2.11¼, the son of Todd, who also belongs to her owner, J. M. Jhnson. Her foal of 1904 is a stallion and has been named Malcolm Forbes. He is destined if all goes well to head the stud at Johnson farm.

Nancy Hanks was foaled 20 years ago, bue one can hardly believe it to see her in a paddock at the foot of the great Blue Hill. She bears her age lightly and gives every appearance of being equal to raising several more colts. As always she is a grand-looking mare with all the ear-marks of greatness.

MISERY.

Miss Butterworth strolled to a seat and sat down. She felt weak; she seemed to see that young wife, sick, overwhelmed, struggling with her great fear, sink under this crushing blow, with no woman near her capable of affording the least sympathy. The father did not impress her as being the man to hold up her fainting head or ease her bruised heart. He had an icy look under his polished exterior which repelled this keen-eyed spinster, and as she remembered the coldness of his ways, she felt herself seized by an irresistible impulse to be near this young creature when the blow fell, if only to ease the tension of her own heartstrings, which at that moment ached keenly over the part she had felt herself obliged to play in this matter.

But when she rose to look for Mr. Gryce, she found him gone; and upon searching the piazza for the other two gentlemen, she saw them just vanishing round the corner in the direction of a small smoking-room. As she could not follow them, she went upstairs, and, meeting a maid in the upper hall, asked for Mrs. Adams. She was told that Mrs. Adams was sick, but was shown the door of her room, which was at the end of a long hall. As all the halls terminated in a window under which a sofa was to be found, she felt that circumstances were in her favor, and took her seat upon the sofa in a state of great complacency. Instantly a sweet voice was heard through the open transom of the door behind which her thoughts were already concentrated.

"Where is Tom? Oh, where is Tom? Why does he leave me? I'm afraid of what he may be tempted to do or say down on those great piazzas alone."

"Mr. Poindexter is with him," answered a voice, measured, but kind, and your father persuaded him to go down to have a smoke."

"I must get up; indeed I must get up. Oh! the camphor—the——"

There was a bustle; this poor young wife had evidently fainted again.

Miss Butterworth cast very miserable glances at the door.

Meanwhile in that small and retired smoking-room a terrible scene was in progress. The two gentlemen had lit their cigars and were sitting in certain forced attitudes that evinced their non-enjoyment of the weed each had taken out of compliance to the other, when an old man, strangely serious, strangely at home, yet as strangely a guest of the house like themselves, came in, and shut the door behind him.

"Gentlemen," he at once announced, "I am Detective Gryce of the New York police, and I am here—and I see that one of you at least knows why I am here."

One? Both of them! This was evident in a moment. No denial, no subterfuge was possible. At the first word uttered in the strange, authoritative tone which old detectives acquire after years of such experiences, the young man sank down in sudden collapse, while his companion, without yielding so entirely to his emotions, showed that he was not insensible to the blow which, in one moment, had brought destruction to all their hopes.

When Mr. Gryce say himself so completely understood, he no longer hesitated over his duty. Directing his full attention to Mr. Adams, he said, this time with some feeling, for the misery of this young man had impressed him:

"You are wanted in New York by Coroner D——, whose business it is to hold an inquest over the remains of Mr. Felix Adams, of whose astonishing death you are undoubtedly informed. As you and your wife were seen leaving that gentleman's house a few minutes before he expired, you are naturally regarded as valuable witnesses in determining whether his death was one of suicide or murder."

It was an accusation, or so nearly one, that Mr. Gryce was not at all surprised to behold the dark flush of shame displace the livid terror which but an instant before had made the man before him look like one of those lost spirits we sometimes imagine as flitting across the open mouth of hell. But he said nothing, seemingly had no power to do so, and his father-in-law was about to make some effort to turn aside this blow when a voice in the hall outside was heard inquiring for Mr. Adams, saying that his wife had fainted again and required his help.

The young husband started, cast a look full of despair at Mr. Poindexter, and thrusting his hand against the door as if to hold it shut, sank on his knees before Mr. Gryce, saying:

"She knows! She suspects! Her nature is so sensitive."

This he managed to utter in gasps as the detective bent compassionately over him. "Don't, don't disturb her! She is an angel, a saint from heaven. Let me bear the blame—he was my brother—let me go with you, but leave her in ignorance——"

Mr. Gryce, with a vivid sense of justice, laid his hand on the young man's arm.

"Say nothing," he enjoined. "My memory is good, and I would rather hear nothing from your lips. As for your wife, my warrant does in no way include her; and if you promise to come with me quietly, I will even let you bid her adieu, so that you do it in my presence."

The change which passed over the young man's face at these significant words was of a nature to surprise Mr. Gryce. Rising slowly, he took his stand by Mr. Poindexter, who, true to his inflexible nature, had scarcely moved in limb and feature since Mr. Gryce came in.

"What have you against me?" he demanded. And there was a surprising ring to his voice, as if courage had come with the necessity of the moment. "Of what am I accused? I want you to tell me, I had rather you would tell me in so many words. I cannot leave in peace until you do."

Mr. Poindexter made a movement at this, and cast a half-suspicious, half-warning glance at his son-in-law. But the young man took no notice of his interference. He kept his eye on the detective, who quietly took out his warrant.

At this instant the door shook.

"Lock it!" was the hoarse command of the accused man. "Don't let any one pass that door, even if it is to bring the tidings of my wife's death."

Mr. Gryce reach out his hand, and turned the key in the lock. Young Adams opened the paper which he had taken from the detective's hand, and while his blood-shot eyes vainly sought to master the few lines there written, Mr. Poindexter attracted the attention of Mr. Gryce, and, fixing him with his eye, formed his lips with three soundless words:

"For murder? Him?"

The detective's bow and a very long-drawn sigh from his son-in-law answered him simultaneously. With a curious lift of his upper lip, which showed his teeth somewhat unpleasantly for a moment, he drew back a step, and sank into his previous immobility.

"I am indebted to you," declared the young man. "Now I know where I stand. I am quite ready to go with you and stand trial, if such be deemed necessary by the officials in New York. You," he cried, turning with almost an air of command to the old gentleman beside him, "will watch over Eva. Not word uttered in the strange, authoritative tone which old detectives acquire after years of such experiences, the young man sank down in sudden collapse, while his companion, without yielding so entirely to his emotions, showed that he was not insensible to the blow which, in one moment, had brought destruction to all their hopes.

When Mr. Gryce say himself so completely understood, he no longer hesitated over his duty. Directing his full attention to Mr. Adams, he said, this time with some feeling, for the misery of this young man had impressed him:

Of the second year students all will again be taking the classes with the exception of Earle Logan who leaves shortly for the west and Harold Robinson. John D. Howe reported to the police the following boys for willfully breaking a number of panes of glass in the windows of the Howe Furniture Factory at the foot of Union street on Friday last: Charles McLaughlin, 98 Brussels street; Robert Clayton, Richmond street; Herbert Monahan, 43 Peters street; Dinkey Moore, City Road. Dr. Kenney is now attending to Mr. Belyea's injuries which will take about three weeks to heal. It had been planned to send Belyea to compete at the United States or Canadian ice championships this winter. He has shown remarkable speed and it is hoped his injuries will not prevent him from becoming a competitor. Mr. Black was badly bruised about the head and also injured one of his legs.

The Boston train was about two hours late in arriving last night, and as a result more than a dozen passengers bound for eastern points missed the Nova Scotia train. The passengers collected together in the depot, declaring that they intended to stay there for the night. Their spokesman, or rather spokeswoman, was a Cape Breton lady, who was most emphatic in her denunciation of the treatment which they had received, saying that in New York, Boston, Portland, or any other small town they would be allowed to remain in the depot. Officer Howell was called in, and the Nova Scotia party, which included a number of women, were turned out. Although asserting that they had no money, they later found shelter at various hotels.

THREE WELL FITTING GIRDLES.

6772.—There is nothing so antagonistic to a good appearance as a badly fitting girdle, and to purchase satisfactory ones which are within reach of the average purse is not always possible. For this reason many make their girdles, and the success of these depends largely upon the style and pattern. A girdle in three styles of outline is given here, all easily made and fitting snugly about the waist. Silk, velvet or the skirt material may be used for their development of which ⅝ yards 36-inches wide are needed for the medium size.
