WENTWORTH, Or, The Professor's Daughter.

One sign of weakness was that she had completely given John up. That for which she would have fought to the death, had she been strong and well, she now remounced without one effort to retain it. It never occurred to her to make any inquiries about him. A month, more than a month ago, he had told her he would leave England in a week. What was the use of making inquiries which could have as result only one bitter reality? She shrank from it—she felt as though the anxiety of knowing all the circumstances and details of his departure would kill her. Had she been herself, she would have insisted on knowing everything, she would have inquired minutely into every circumstance; now she only felt that the joy of life was gone. She put off writing to Susan. With the cowardice of weakness she dared not inflict on herself a pain which she knew would be intolerable. Better keep out of sight, she argued. She had ruined two lives—his and her own; let her creep away and be forgotten.

She did her best to conceal her trouble. With her friends she made great efforts to be bright and cheerful. But sometimes she forgot that she was not alone, and sat brooding silently in her chair, or rose and paced the room, her hands behind her, her head now sunk on her breast, now held erect, as, over and over again, she recalled all her outer aud inner life during the past year.

One evening she spoke. She and Mrs. Burland were alone. Mrs. Burland had just been singing, and by some odd chance had picked up "Carrissima." She sang it through and those who knew her voice do not need to be told that she sang it exquisitely. Turning round at the end to make some remark to Diana, she saw that she lay upon the couch in an agony of weeping. Now, through all this trouble, since the time when she had told her she had been ill two weeks, "Toinette had never seen Diana weep. It was not easy to her to shed tears; with her they were the expression of the most poignant anguish which sorrow can inflict. In this case she augured good from them. At last Diana she said. "Something may be done yet. I cannot believe that, even though you did not write he would leave England without making at least one attempt to see you, especially when he had promised to call here. We can at least find out if he did that. I will go and ask Sullivan now."

She left the room for a few minutes, and then returned, saying,
"Sullivan says no one of that name has called. Perhaps his leaving England has been delayed. Things connected with the Government are always unpunctual."

"I dare not think so," said Diana, ahaking her head. "If it were delayed at all, it would scarcely be for so long, and if I once let myself think so, and then were disponited, I could not bear it. Besides, he said he might not have time to call."

"That was before he knew what the obstacle was, and that it might be removed. If Mr. Garthwaite is the man I take him to be, he would never go away for years, leaving everything in this state of darking on the stacle was, and that it might be removed. If Mr. Garthwaite is the man I take him to be, he would never go away for years, leaving everything in this state of darking on the stacle was, and that it might be removed. If Mr. Garthwaite is the man I take him to be, he would never go away for years, leaving everything in this state of darking on the stacle was, and that it might be removed. If Mr. Garthwaite is the man I take him to be, he would never be content to leave things in this way. I am thankful you told me. You must let Richard and me act for you; I promise we will do nothing without your knowledge and approval."

Diana agreed, and promised to write to Susan the next day, but it was rendered unnecessary.

M. Ungerer expresses the opinion that flowers and the perfume distilled from them have a salutary influence on the constitution, and, indeed, may be regarded as a therapeutic agency of high value. He says that residence in a perfumed atmosphere forms a protection from pulmonary affections and arrests the development of phthisis; thus, in the town of La Grasse, where the making of perfumes is so largely carried on, phthis is rare, owing to the odorous vapors exhaled from the numerous distilleries.
