THE HOLLOW RUBY.

CHAPTER I.

Meryon awoke with the issue of an interesting dream in doubt. Terah had admitted that she loved him; the prince had seemed indisposed to hear reason; but just then the purple and gold heraldic heron which formed the central device of his highness' state banner detached itself from the surounding embroidery and flew viciously at Meryon's head. He heard Terah's voice raised in warning, and saw two black mountains at the verge of a desolate plain, sundered from each other by a rugged defile. The sun was setting behind the mountains—and he awoke.

He yawned and glanced at the long silver chain by which a lamp of pierced brass depended from the ceiling. A ray of light from the east window rested on it—by which token he knew it was about nine o'clock.

The room in which he lay was beautiful and—as the bedchamber of a modern young American—singular.

Lofty and of good size, it was rather narrow for its length. Polished marbles of tender hues paved the floor, the central part of which was depressed several inches below the ends, and in a basin in this depression leaped and fell the slender jet of a fountain. A high dado glowed with oriental tiles colored like fading sunsets, and the walls above were hung with tapestries stained as with crushed roses and violets. Higher still was a border of dark brown wood exquisitely carved, and above this was the four windows, a foot higher by four times that width. Silks of mellow tone draped the ceiling.

Along three sides of the south end of the chamber extended a broad divan, part of which served Meryon as a bed. Here and there about this dim, lovely room stood vases of wrought bronze and fine porcelain. Within reach of his arm was a triple gong on a carved wood stand, with a hammer hanging by a silken cord. Meryon struck stwice upon this graceful instrument, and three soft notes of an octave's interval tinged on the air. As they subsided the portiere was pushed open, and a graceful figure entered, bearing a tray with coffee, cakes and cigarettes.

Had the figure been fully draped, you would have taken it for that of a girl, so refined and beautiful were the aquiline features and the shaggy cloud of soot-black, fine spun hair, which fell on the shoulders. But the supple body naked from the waste up, was that of a boy of twelve or fourteen, tawny as fine bronze. Girt round his lions was a skirt of dark blue gossamer stuff, with silver lines running through it and a silver fringe, and about his neck a double necklace of delicate silver links hung half way down his breast. Black as night were the great eyes which met Meryon's blue ones, and radiant the smiles of greeting that revealed the flashing teeth.

The ensuing dialogue, though carried on in an oriental tongue, shall for the sake of uniformity be here given in the English equivalent.

"The top of the morning to you, Ebal, my beauty!" said the American. "You're a sight for sore eyes! Did anyone ever tell you that you look surprisingly like the divine Princess Terah—God bless her! Maybe an artist who has painted your portrait as often as I have could see it in your present rig; but put on one of her dresses and anyone would know it. The funny thing is that neither she nor you resemble the prince; but Terah's mother, if she were asked * * * however, there's no fathoming the mystery's of oriental—diplomacy."

"Honored lord!" murmured the boy, in a tone of half frightened remonstrance, but smiling still. He knelt and placed the tray upon the divan beside his master. Then taking a cigarette from the enameled box on the tray he put it daintly between his lips and lit it at the silver spirit lamp. Having inhaled a single whiff of fragrant smoke, he handed it to Meryon with a charming obeisance and he accepted it with the complacency of one who knows his ease and likes it.

"I don't know whether this is most like Aladdin's palace or a glorified Turkish bath," said he to himself; and then to Ebal: "What news have you brought me, you rascal? What of the rose who makes cabbages of all other roses—the star that makes a brass kettle of the sun? Have you brought me nothing from her.?"

Now, Ebal thought Meryon a wonderful and worshiping being, but as a born oriental he was frightened at the audacity of his passion for the young princess. From a fold of his girdle he took a small rosebud, such as grew on the gardens of Saadi or Omar, and presented it to the other as if it were a fragile explosive.

"I know nothing myself mighty lord—but Senuah said I was to give this to you and to say that the lion must beware of the pitfall which the hunter digs in his path. That means Hatipha, the head eunuch—how I hate the old beast!" he added lowering his voice to a whisper.

Meryon laughed. "That's all right, my lad," said he, taking the rosebud and kissing it. "Don't you be scared I'm looking out for you; and I'm wiser than a thousand such old mules as Hatipha. I talk openly to you because I love you, and Senuah is our confident because she's your sister and the princess favorite maid—and there's no one to take her place. But I can hold my tongue when I see fit. And when the time comes"—here he bestowed upon the youth a wink of great significence, "I'll take you along with us to America and make your fortune. Well now, be off, my beauty, and leave me to drink my coffee and meditate!"

"But I may help my lord to dress later?" asked Ebal, reluctantly retiring from the fascinating presence.

"When I'm ready I'll hit the gong. There — Allah—II—Allah Bismiliah! Clear out!"

As Ebal vanished with a smile and a sigh, Meryon fell upon the bud with amorous rapture. It fared badly, as buds are apt to do, in the cause of love. After smelling and kissing it till it looked as if ruined by premature dissipation the lover ended by devouring it, petals, calix and all, as if by incorborating it with his bodily substance to mystically bind to his own the soul of his beloved. Then he drank his coffee and took counsel with himself.

He was an American artist in search of the beautiful, whose devotion to his art was proved by his possessing a fortune that made him more than independent of the world. He had brought good letters of introduction to the prince of this little kingdom, and had confirmed his welcome by painting a capital full-length portrait of his host. Great favor was his; a suite of rooms in the palace, and servants for his exclusive behoof. The prince was not only at all times accessible to him without ceremony, but could not get enough of his society. During his two months' sojourn he had made a lot of valuable studies, in many of which Ebal, in all poses and costumes, or with no costume save his own beyish beauty, was the centre of interest. This was all very well.

But alas for insatiable human nature and malicious fate! One day (owing to a concatentation of accidents which cannot here be detailed) he met face to face and unpremeditatedly the only daughter of the prince, Terah the beautiful. It was all up with him in a moment; and her oriental fancy seems to have been no less captivated by the fresh complexion, handsome features and red hair of the accidental stranger. They loved each other at the first intention, as surgeons say, just as young people used to do in the golden prime of the good Haroun Alraschid. Ah! Romance lingers in this old world yet, and we shall see!

Meryon had the tact to cover his face with his hands, and the presence of mind to look through his fingers. The princess replaced her veil not so hastily as to prevent a quick, artist glance from catching a rapturous impression of her dusky grace and glorious eyes. Fat old Hatipha, with pendent cheeks flapping, bustled up in vast perturbation and whipped the princess out of the infidel's sight as fast as he could. But Senuah, following, threw over her shoulder an arch glance which in America would have passed for a wink of sympathetic intelligence. Mischief was afoot

Then followed intrigue. One afternoon the back part of the booth of Musreddin, the jewel-merchant, contained a new apprentice, with huge turban and voluminous drapery, whose blue eyes wandered from his work as Terah entered, and never left her face during the half hour she chaffered with the jeweler over the price of the ring—which, on the other hand, she would never have looked at twice, had she not been stealing a thousand glances at the back part of the shop! Again, from a meshrebie-screened window (chartered for the purpose,) who glowered invisible and impassioned while Terah, her divine countenance not ten inches from his, debated interminably with Senuah as to whether they should turn to the right and visit the confectioner, or to the left to the silk mercer's; while Hatipha, the unsuspicious, stood in the shadow hardby, with mind at ease because, forsooth the street was empty. Empty!—and all the while Terah's soft finger tips were being kissed ravenously through the lattice-work, and, when at last the debate with Senuah came to an end, folded themselves about a love-note designed in the most gloriously extravagant terms! No name was signed to that note, but perhaps the princess didn't know whom it came from, and didn't thenceforth wear it in her bosom until—paradoxical as it may seem—it got worn out, and means had to be devised to furnish her with another!

Yes, here in the heart of the guarded orient, and under the shadow as it were of the bowstring, was this love affair carried on, until this very morning of the rosebud. How was it to end? Ah, how indeed!

"No doubt," Meryon said to himself, "eloping with an oriental princess under the noses of her father and the head eunich isn't the easiest thing in the world—I never said it was! But a bonanza like that is worth a risk. The boldest way is the best; bribe Musreddin again; wait with the horses at the back door in the alley; she comes in to buy a new ring; frightful row in the street at the front between two camel-drivers; Hatipha mounts guard at the front door; Terah slips into a rear room and a suit of boy's cloths and so out at the back, mounts, and we're off! Give us ten minutes' start, and 'they'll have fleet steads that fellow,' quoth young Lochinvar! That's the programme. Sorry to play such a game on the poor old prince, but that is the fault of the oriental system—and oh, my soul! what an armful of heaven she is."

He caught up a pillow and vicariously pressed Terah to his heart. Like other lovers he was sometimes constrained to wreak himself on his imagination.

"I quite pity Hatipha, too," he said when he came to himself, "but in the bright lexicon of my youth there's no such word as getting bested by any tumble-down, earringed, dew-lapped, pot-bellied old nondescript like that—I guess not! I'll go down and interview Musreddin as quick as I can get my clothes on."

He reached for the gong, but ere he could strike it the curtains parted and in sprang Ebal, evidently in a fright.
