NO CASE AGAINST THREE OF THE MEN IN INDIANAPOLIS TRIAL

Indianapolis, Oct. 1—On motion of the government, the cases against J. W. Ryan of Peoria, Ills.; Andrew J. Kavanaugh of Springfield, Ills. and Patrick H. Ryan, of Chicago, in the labor trial were dismissed. The government announced it had no evidence against them to warrant their trial.

All the men had been identified with the iron workers union.

THE MICROSCOPE.

The story of the discovery of the telescope, how it was bound up with that wonderful emancipation of the human spirit from the thraldom of medieval ignorance and the hatred of scientific light, has been told us by many learned men; but I venture to think that the discovery of the microscope, which has never yet had its historian or poet, was one fraught with many more beneficent results for humanity. By its scrutiny the invisible but actual sources of most of the scourges of mankind have been discovered; and it would seem that it is in its power and not in that of fleets or armies that we must look for the physical salvation of the sons of men. Man may redeem himself from death, not by sweeping the heavens with the space-annihilating telescope, but by peering into the dust of the earth with the space-creating microscope.—Dr. Fraser Harris in Science.

A recent riot at the Federal building Los Angeles, will be reproduced at the trial of those arrested, by motion picture films, and shown to the jury on a screen. It will be the first time in the history of jurisprudence that such evidence will have been introduced. While the riot was at its height, a moving picture company, with the newest model machine, had an operator on the scene, and his films show the entire actions of those persons who are charged with having caused the disturbance

(Exchange).

The British workingman was lounging at the street corner, with a cigarette tucked into the corner of his mouth.

Up to him lurched another of his kind.

"Here, mate," said the newcomer, "got a cigarette paper about yer?"

"Yus," said the first, and handed over a grimy slip of paper.

"Got any tobacco?" was the next remark of the newcomer.

"Yus," replied the first again, but he was not so eager in handing over his tobacco box and did not hurry matters.

The newcomer rolled a cigarette, stuck it into his mouth and then asked:—"Got a match, mate?"

The other eyed him up and down, and then down and up again.

"You 'aven't anything for smokin' but the 'abit, 'ave yer?" he drawled indignantly.

PLENTY OF EVIDENCE.

"I wonder," said Slithers, stopping his car at the roadside and addressing an old man working in the fields, "if I can get any gasoline around here?"

"I reckon you kin," replied the old man, straightening up and leaning on his hoe. "Ye kin get it in yer system, anyhow. Them cars ahead o' ye seems to have left a few ton of it behind 'em, jedgin' by the condition of the atmosphere."

Forty-two parcels, each containing a dozen queen bees, were mailed at the Riverside, Cal., postoffice last week. The bees are being sent to apiaries in Japan. They were raised by a Texas man who has recently established an apiary in West Riverside solely for Japanese custom. He ships the bees in a small pine block hollowed out sufficiently to accommodate 12 bees and enough food to last through the journey. The food is a quantity of powdered sugar and honey. An opening at one end, where the honey is stored, is sealed with a piece of pasteboard, and when this is removed at the close of the journey the bees literally eat their way out of their prisons.

GEORGE McARTHUR'S HOUSE AT RIVERSIDE BURNED TO GROUND

Cause of Outbreak Unknown—House Was Partially Insured

George McArthur's comfortable summer residence at Riverside, Kings county, was destroyed by fire about noon today. Mr. McArthur had not moved into the city yet and the family was in the house at the time the fire broke out, but its origin is something of a mystery. The house was purchased only this summer and the loss is but partially covered by insurance which is carried with the Commercial Union Insurance Co.

The fire enveloped the building so rapidly that there was time to save only a portion of the furniture. As there was no fire fighting apparatus available the flames had sway until the building was completely destroyed.

TOO AFFECTIONATE.

He has just returned from his summer holiday, and was tell ing a friend of his all about it.

"Yes," he was saying airily, "I've been over to France. I had a fine time, and—I must tell you—I saw a duel."

"Oh!" said his friend scornfully. "One of those duels, eh? I don't suppose anybody was hurt very much! Those French duels are stupid affairs."

"You're quite wrong!" replied the other. "One of the combatants was seriously injured. He had a rib broken."

"Rib broken! What, with one of those little toy rapiers?"

"Rapiers?" asked the man who had come from France. "Who said rapiers? The brave man's rib was broken in the embrace with his opponent when the duel was over!"

VIEWS OF KING EDWARD UPON HOME RULE BILL

Some Excerpts From Book Of An Ex-English Diplomat

CHURCHILL AND PARNELL

Political Matters of Those Days Recalled at Time of Interest—Writer Once Spent Term in Prison For Irish Cau e

(Times Special Correspondence.)

Dublin, Sept. 21—No more topical book has been published for many a year than "The Land War in Ireland," by Wilfred Scawen Blunt, which has just been issued in London on the eve of the culmination of the great Ulster bluff and almost coincident with the promulgation of Winston Churchill's scheme for the setting up of a dozen or more local parliaments in the three kingdoms.

It is intensely topical because it deals with the betrayal of Parnell and the Home Rule party of his day by Winston's father, Lord Randolph Churchill, and because many Irishmen and Englishmen, too, believe that Winston's scheme, which is declared by men of all parties to be impracticable is an elaborate red herring drawn across the path of home rule, and is intended to pave the way either for the indefinite postponement of home rule by the British Liberals, or for Winston's reversion to the Tory party from which he came.

Blunt is one of the most picturesque characters in English public life. He is now seventy-two years old, and his whole life has been spent in attacking somebody, usually the government of the day in England. He is the representative of an old English Catholic family, a great landowner, and a cousin of George Wyndham, one of the leaders of the English Tories. He began life in the diplomatic service, but as his temperament was anything but diplomatic he soon retired and devoted himself to the more congenial task of championing the "oppressed nationalities." At different times he has appeared as the champion of Ireland, India, Greece, Egypt, and Macedonia, and he actually spent two months inside an Irish jail in 1886.

This was for persisting in holding a home rule meeting which Lord Londonderry, then the viceroy, had proclaimed, and according to his account he rather enjoyed the experience. He did not like the plank bed, but he positively revelled in oakum picking and would secrete a bit of rope to amuse himself in his cell after the regular day's task was done. One of the best stories in the book is about a warder named Denby who sympathized with him, and did all he could to make his prison life endurable. This man said to Blunt one day:—

"We are obliged to distinguish between case and case, and it is not often we have a gentleman like you here, but when we do we know how to consider him. Why, sir, it was only last year we had just such another case as your own, a gentleman from Dublin who had had a misfortune like yours—he had signed another gentleman's name thinking it was his own, and he was here with us for some months. How was he to be sweeping out his cell? We could not let him do it any more than I can you; a case, sir, just like yours—just like yours."

In Parnell's Time

There are a good many revelations in the book about the inside workings of English politics in Parnell's time, and in particular those about Lord Randolph Churchill's position are interesting.

He declares that Lord Randolph was all for a Tory-Nationalist alliance and the passage of a home rule bill and tried hard to carry his party with him. Then, however, Gladstone came round and announced his home rule programme and Churchill wrote to Blunt:—

"If you want home rule you must go to Mr. Gladstone. We cannot touch it."

"It was a 'secret de polichinelle,'" says Blunt, "that Randolph and Salisbury and Carnarvon had intended a home rule bill if they could have secured a majority."

Quoting from his diary under the date of July 14, 1886, Blunt writes:—

"It is bad for Randolph. Only six months ago he, too, was for home rule, a parliament at Dublin and all. He has sacrificed his true opinion for the sake of keeping his place in the cabinet."

Another entry about the same date which he quotes is: "Called on Justin McCarthy who gave me a list of English M. P's favorable to home rule. He told me that Randolph had excused himself to him for his volte-face by saying he had done all he could for the Nationalists, but now that he had failed to carry his party with him he was obliged to do all he could against them."

Lord Randolph's diagnosis of the feeling in Ireland in 1886, as reported by Blunt, is decidedly interesting.

"Out of 4,800,000 Irish," Churchill said "there are perhaps 2,000,000 who go in heart and soul for home rule, 2,000,000 who are indifferent, and 800,000 who are opposed to it."

This was at the time the coercion bill was before the house and Churchill said:

"If the present bill does not do there is nothing else but home rule. There is no middle course and home rule it will be."

One of Blunt's glaring "indiscretions" relates to the attitude of the late King Edward, then, of course, Prince of Wales. Here it is:—

"Called on Lady C., who has seen the Prince of Wales lately. She gave him my message about the loyalty of the Irish to the crown, and he seems to have been pleased, and says that home rule is certain to come in Ireland, and he has even quarreled with the queen on the subject.

"Her Majesty is a violent partisan on the other side, principally on Protestant religious grounds. It was she who suggested that a certain general should resign his commission and head the Orangemen in her name. Lady C. heard this also two days ago from the Duke of Cambridge, and there is no doubt whatever that the general has really declared his intention to do it, in spite of half denials. Another had himself told her that he meant to have a regular massacre of Irish if it came to a war."

It is only fair to the late king, however, to say that when this story was brought to his notice in a slightly different form some time before his death, he strenuously denied it. It was always understood that King Edward hoped to see the Irish become the most loyal of his subjects after the grant of home rule, but it was his guiding principle of life not to interfere in domestic politics. It is possible, however, that he may have remonstrated with his mother for departing from this rule and encouraging the vaporings of those who talked in 1866 much as Sir Edward Carson and Lord Londonderry are talking now.

WONDERS OF THE BOOMERANG

When Handled By Expert Seems Like Thing Bewitched

Boomerangs are undoubtedly one of the most curious and interesting and most remarkable weapons in the world, considering their crudeness. The tales that have been told about the feats that can be performed with them by an expert are not myths, by any means.

An Englishman who has been investigating the subject in Australia and who has reported his results and made exhibition throws for King George, says that by selecting a boomerang of suitable shape and by knowing the knack of giving it just the right twist the natives of Queensland and New South Wales can make them do things so startling that they seem bewitched.

The boomerangs are usually made from a limb or root of a tree that has the proper crook, or sometimes they are made by heating a green stick in the fire and then bending it. They are worked to the desired shape by scraping with flint instruments and smoothing with bits of glass. They are usually made rounding on one side and flattish on the other. One form of boomerang used in war has a hook at one end.

When this instrument is thrown at an enemy he puts up his own boomerang to ward off the blow. This action, says the Pathfinder, causes the hook to catch on his own boomerang and brings the hooked weapon sideways in such a way that it deals him a hard blow on the side of the head almost in spite of anything he can do to parry it.

Making the boomerang perform a figure eight in the air is comparatively a common feat and all sorts of complicated figures are produced, including a double eight. The test of a sure thrower is to make the stick come back obediently to his feet after engaging in these flights, so he will only have to stoop to pick it up.

One very useful throw which is often used by the natives in hunting wild fowl and other small animals consists in standing behind some barrier which cuts off the view and then hurling the instrument in a direction away from the game, so that it then turns in its flight and goes straight among them, where it performs a number of gryations and is pretty sure to cause considerable carnage.

Amateurs have often tried to learn the trick of throwing a boomerang, but it takes long practice to do much with it. There are a number of boomerangs from Australia and the Pacific Islands in the government collections at Washington, and several scientists have succeeded in throwing them in such a way at least as to make everyone within half a mile fearful of being hit. They are a rather ticklish instrument to fool with, for unless a person is acquainted with their ways they are liable to turn in the air and give some one a rap when least expected.

It is impossible to make the boomerang work in a high wind, though a little breeze is necessary, as in kite flying. You throw across the wind; that is, if the wind is from the west you throw either to the north or south, according to whether the boomerang is flattened on one side or the other. There is no absolutely standard shape for a boomerang, as many people think. In fact, many different shapes are used, according to conditions.
