Londoners and Their Hobbies

Howard Hartry's Garden Is a Riot of Loveliness

President of Horticultural Society Makes Interesting Experiments.

Who should have a lovelier garden than the president of the London Horticultural Society? The president happens to be Howard F. Hartry, and perhaps no prettier spot could be found in the city than Mr. Hartry's garden on Belgrave avenue. Mr. Hartry has made a hobby of growing flowers ever since he was a small boy. Indeed the love for flowers and horticulture was inbred in him, his father, William Hartry of Seaford, having one of the finest gardens in that part of the country.

The front garden at Mr. Hartry's home, a delightful lawn with trees and shrubs, gives but a faint idea of the beautiful gardens at the rear. Just a step in through the bridal wreath bushes, along a fence fringed with vines, and the real gardens come into view—a wealth of perennial bloom. Not a straight row meets the eye, but curve upon curve, as peonies hob nob with gladioli and marigolds nod their heads close to the plants. Everything is in groups, and arranged as flowers might grow in the woods, not in conventional beds.

Begonias in Bloom. Just now the begonias are making the biggest show, with their brilliant scarlet colorings, and in all the lovely double varieties. Hardy cypripediums are showing buds, and the gladioli will soon be a riot of bloom. Climbing up a clothes-line pole, a gorgeous trumpet vine, adds its beauty to the scene and one would never suspect the existence of a clothes-line pole.

Giving height to the display are splendid fruit trees and lilac bushes, while asparagus shows its feathery leaves near the fence. Mr. Hartry plants his vegetables with a view to their beauty in the garden. They are part of it, just as the flowers are part of it.

But simple beauty in a garden does not content Mr. Hartry. He is an investigator too. And here and there among his plants are those which are being grown for experimental purposes. He wants to get something which other people haven't got, something which he can call his very own. And so in one spot there is the young iris bed, the little plants coming up from seed, and there are the small peony plants, which are also the product of seed, sown by Mr. Hartry, and from which he expects something very fine.

Likes To Experiment. "Of course nothing unusual may result," says Mr. Hartry. "And then it may just happen that I shall get a plant which will be something very rare and beautiful. It is largely a matter of chance, but I like to experiment."

"Gardening is one of the most contagious diseases in the world," says Mr. Hartry. "A man starts growing a few geraniums and then becomes interested in cultivating annuals and keeps on adding and adding to his garden until it has grown enormous. He begins to discover that there are different varieties of the plants he is growing and he wants to experiment with them. He starts to put in perennials of all kinds, and first thing he knows his gardening space is so crowded that he cannot put in another thing. Then he wants to specialize, and probably roots up his whole stock, discards everything, but one or two varieties and cultivates them exclusively."

Plans It On Paper. Mr. Hartry plans his garden on paper before he starts to plant. And he advises all other gardeners to do the same thing. If they would secure the best results in the way of arrangement. The winter is the best time for making garden plans, he says. Seeds should be ordered long before they are to be planted.

Mr. Hartry claims that gardening is the most interesting and beneficial of hobbies. "It takes you outdoors in spite of yourself," he says. "And there is something healthful even in the turning over of the earth. One of the troubles in this country is that there is no school for the study of horticulture. Several London men interested in the subject are now negotiating with the government to get such a school started in connection with Western Ontario University, and their efforts be successful London will be a big horticultural center in the province."
