NEW KINCARDINESHIRE.

How False Hopes Arose—The Responsibility of the Elements—The Kindness of the People—The Progress that has been Made—A Cheerful View of the Future.

NEW STONEHAVEN, May 26.

So great an interest and so kindly in its nature has been taken by many citizens of St. John, in the formation and settlement of the Scotch colony here, that now when the difficulties incidental from a severe winter and a late spring seem to be surmounted, it is pleasing and only right to acknowledge their existence with the addition that they are brushed out of the way. The immigrant party were all acquainted before leaving home with the lateness of the season in the British Islands; many of them had heard or read of the severity of winter on the American continent, and chiefly in the Western States; but the subject had been entirely overlooked in their preparations. We knew that the day on which we travelled by rail to Glasgow—the 28th April—was clear, fair and sultry in the east and centre of Scotland, stormy in the farther north and west, and a day of killing frost to bud and blossom, and of heavy snow in the south of England and London. We sailed on the evening of the 25th from Glasgow, and on the morning of the 26th from the Clyde for a thousand miles into and through a cutting wind, chiefly from the north; next, for six to seven hundred miles, through cold and stormy winds, chiefly from the west. Our course then laid us through a similar extent of bitterly cold north-west and westerly winds that came over the ice, for which seamen kept a sharp look out; and the remainder of our voyage was made through a low temperature, with little wind. We enjoyed these pleasant days until we steamed into the hospitality and kindness of St. John, which a self-denying part of our number evaded by going up the river to their destination within a few hours of their arrival, and in forty-eight hours afterwards the largest and last division left your city. Even to the uninitiated it was clear that the river was rising, and had risen much in these two days, and that we had to steam 250 miles against what the Scotch are accustomed to call "snaw bree," as opposed to other kinds or qualities of floods. The power and volume of the stream increased as we proceeded, until our landing place here was reached in 54 hours after our departure from St. John; 46 hours after our precursors set their feet upon the soil, and knew the wants of our position: but we are out of the region of telegraphs, and so far as I have learned of regular posts, and they could not have warned us at earliest until after we were in Fredericton, where we could not remain. They could have informed us that the extent of roads, and the number of clearances and houses arranged for were not completed from the depth of snow still remaining in a few sheltered localities, and from its existence on the ground for a month past the average and a depth greater than the average of seasons. The facts might have occurred to us as probabilities before we left Scotland and on any subsequent day; but other matters required attention on the sea, and these probabilities of weather were overlooked. The Government considered the propriety of advising the women and children to remain in St. John, and thought of making some provision for their accommodation in the city, but the disadvantages were more than equivalent to these inconveniences of the position which would be surmounted in two, or at the furthest, three weeks. Arrangements were made by the Surveyor General, the Hon. B. Stevenson, with the old residents in the neighborhood for accommodation and labour, and every possible effort permitted by the condition of the country has been made to furnish clearances and houses and roads. All the immigrants employed on the roads have been paid a dollar per day. Where the clearances on lots were only partially executed or not commenced the owners of the lots have been paid to complete them, and where the log houses were not ready for their future inhabitants those men who could build them have been paid for the work. The accommodation for the women and children has been much more overcrowded than it is desirable, but not so great as I have seen in the habitual life of large cities. Temporary homes for some families were found in eight or ten tents, a shelter disliked by some of their inmates and liked by others. All these difficulties are in process of daily reduction. A number of the houses have been inhabited by their future owners since their arrival; a number more for eight or nine days and others for shorter periods; the timber is cleared from a few acres around some homes; and ere another week passes away the new settlement will have commenced its career of ordinary labor and I believe of success. Among so many persons differences of opinion will exist, but the great majority of our settlers expect to make good farms out of their lots with no greater labor or outlay than is necessary in favorable circumstances. These men are at their work and they must be looked up in order to get at their views.

Since our arrival the weather has been favorable. Our experience amounts to ten days for the majority and twelve for the minority and as many nights. Days clear and warm nights, clear with frosts, sufficient on two evenings to leave thick ice on the pools; yet, until to-day, when we have had rain from the East, the days and nights have been dry, fitting the brush for burning, the soil for road-making. Day by day progress has been made in the three preliminaries to well-doing, houses, roads, cleared soil. The doubts and fears of any crop being sown and reaped in the present year have been renewed. During our short residence the older inhabitants have been kind and obliging to the new-comers in every respect. To the energy of the Commissioner General the immigrants are deeply indebted, not only in his own department but in arrangements made for those among us who were willing to accept or who required employment. Delays arise from causes that no person could have prevented. They have been vexatious but not disastrous; have been partially met and partially overcome; will be fully met and fully overcome; and for this prospect, to the patience, perseverence and guidance of the gentleman named, we stand indebted. They have secured success in a scheme where unconsidered, unsuspected obstacles intervened, and although those obstacles unquestionably existed, neither Captain W. Brown, the originator of the scheme, nor the Government with whom his arrangements were made, could be in any measure responsible. Captain Brown is an experienced and skilful seaman, but he can neither command the elements on land or sea. Your Government is or should be powerful for many purposes, but one of these is not the regulation of snow-storms. They committed certain duties to contractors, but the latter cannot be prudently held responsible for the weather which they can neither make nor unmake. My own conviction is that the settlement land is good, and the men who are to work it are quite competent to do all for it that can be accomplished by labour and skill.

DANISH SETTLERS.

The new company of Danes for the settlement on the river above Tobique passed New Stonehaven at 1 p. m. on the 23d all well; and they seemed to be men good for the work before them.
