Obituary.

SISTER MARY ROSENA.

In the quiet Convent of Alverno, Clinton, Iowa, Sister Mary Rosena, daughter of Mr. Thos. and the late Margaret English of this city passed away at 6.10 Friday, May 19th, after an illness dating since Dec. Sister Mary Rosena was 23 years old and entered the "Order of St. Francis" seven years ago, when quite young. She leaves a father, one sister, three brothers and numerous relatives. Sister Rosena taught one year at Rochelle, Ill., three years at Fonda, Iowa; and on her fourth year took ill and had to be removed to Marcomb Hospital conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis, after which she returned to Mt. Alverno, where her pure soul got its eternal reward. She died as she wished, like St. Therese "The little Flower of Jesus." Her death is a shock to all from which recovery is long in coming, as it came unexpectedly. Funeral services were held at Mt. Alverno Chapel, after Requem High Mass was celebrated by Rev. Jas. A. Murray, assisted by Rev. Fr. Kissana and students of Mt. St. Claire College marched to attend the ceremony. The interment was made at Mt. St. Claire Cemetery. May her soul rest in peace.

Who's Who?

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN—LOOK WHO'S HERE.
BILLY CLIFTON,
Comedian.

Billy Clifton refutes the traditional belief that Scotsmen have no sense of humour, for William was born in Edinburgh. While still in his teens he came to America and went on the stage under his father's direction. His first essay was in "Rob Roy." Later he went into vaudeville and after considerable experience in that line graduated into the big productions. He played for two years in "The Pink Lady," 4 years in "Oh! Oh! Delphine," and also in Hammerstein's "High Jinks" and Dipple's "Lilac Domino," appearing in the New Amsterdam, Lyric, Gaiety, and Knickerbocker Theatres in New York. Next year he is billed for a long engagement with the great producers Klaw & Erlanger. He was taking a holiday when Dr. Howlett happened along and captured him for the Manhattan Musical Comedy Company. All will agree that the Doctor made a big strike when he secured Mr. Clifton's services.

He will be glad to make your better acquaintance at the Casino.

The Inca's Ransom.

The news that Sir Rider Haggard has recently presented to the British Museum a thick gold ring, known as the "Inca" ring," lends additional interest to the following story, for a Buenos Aires correspondent, of the Inca's treasure.

Somewhere in the Argentine Province of Jujuy, in a walled-up tunnel in a mountain of the Inner Andes, lies a king's ransom consisting of more than fifty million dollars in gold—at least it should be there if history and legend are to be trusted.

That it is believed to be there is evident from the fact that almost every year some expedition sets out from Buenos Aires in search of the treasure.

One such expedition, headed by a United States mining engineer, has recently returned, all the more impressed by the circumstances of its failure to reach the gold that the enormous wealth actually does exist.

History and legend relating to this treasure agree fairly closely.

When the Spaniards under Pizarro invaded Peru they took prisoner the Inca King Atahualpa. He offered to buy his liberty, and told his captors that he would fill the room in which he was confined with gold and silver to the height to which the tallest soldier could reach with his sword point.

Atahualpa did what he promised, but he was not released.

Huge as was the amount of gold and silver thus received for the intended ransom, the Spaniards still held the Inca prisoner.

Atahualpa promised more treasure, and word was sent throughout the kingdom to bring in every bit of precious metal in order that the cupidity of the conquistadores might be satisfied and the sacred person of the Inca —"Son of the Sun"—might be free. Atahualpa was burned at the stake on August 29, 1533.

How the Treasure Was Concealed.

Legend has it that when Atahualpa died, a vast caravan of llamas was en route from the Argentine side of the Andes to Cuzco with every ounce of gold the Indians could scrape up.

Spies from Cuzco met the caravan, reported the death of Atahualpa, and the ransom was then taken to the Cerro (mountain) Granadas and there walled up in a tunnel, where it has since remained.

Underlying the legend there is at least some consonance with accepted facts of history.

The territory all round Mount Granadas is known to be gold-bearing and there are ancient mines and Inca workings. Gold is to be found almost everywhere but its profitable working to-day under modern conditions is problematical.

The Indians of the district are the direct descendants of the ancient Inca tribes, and among them the legend of the buried treasure receives full credence.

On the crumbling walls of an old Jesuit mission-house near the pueblo of Tres Cruces are Indian paintings of flocks of heavily laden llamas heading toward a mountain.

It is doubtful whether the exact location of the tunnel is known. However, it is claimed that an old Frenchman has actually located it in the face of a precipitous cliff, 1,200 ft. high, on the mountain side.

Several ex penditions have gone out in search of the treasure, but none has yet found the tunnel or even scaled the cliff. These who believe that the gold exists and that the legend is true doubt whether the treasure chamber itself will ever be found.

The costumes worn by the ladies who attended last evening's performance of "The Magic Melody" were the subject of much complimentary comment by the male members of the audience. The fine weather afforded an opportunity which the ladies took full advantage of and the exquisite toilettes and gorgeous costumes were a delight to the eye. The opera cloak was again much in evidence.
