Facts About The Sturgeon

The sturgeon is called a roal fish, but few people are aware of the reason of this. It is not because of its beautiful, glistening armour of shining scales or the strange tasting roe that is made into caviare, but because, according to an act of Edward II, which seems to be still in force, all sturgeon belonged to the crown.

The act in part is as follows: "The king shall have Wrack of the sea throughout the realm. Whales or great sturgeons taken in the sea or elsewhere in the realm belong to the crown, except in certain places privileged by the King."

The largest species of the sturgeon is the great Huso, which inhabits the rivers and inland seas of Russia. It is sometimes as much as 24 feet long, while the smallest is the Steriet, only about three feet long. Sturgeon seek their food in the mud at he bottom of the rivers, plowing this up with their long snouts, which are protected with broad plates and have curious worm-like "feelers" a little way behind, and on the under side

The work of these feelers is to examine the treasures turned up by the snout, and it is from their habit of stirring the mud that sturgeons most likely gained their name. This comes from the German word "storen," which means to "poke up," or stir.

Very bad grease spots can be removed by soaking them in benzine and then placing them between double layers of blotting-paper and pressing with a medium hot iron.

It is not what you give, but the way you give it that makes the gift.
