All ways find releaked after the money has been taken?"

Mr. Brent is silent; his sharp eyes are bent on the floor; he is in deep thought. "Who are the occupants of your house, sir?" the detective at length asks. "Two old and trusted servants, whose honesty lies beyond the shadow of a doubt, and Richard, my son."

"Ah!—yes!" is what Mr. Brent says. "Have you visitors often?"

"No, sir," replies the old banker; "that is, I mean, very seldom since my wife died."

Mr. Brent coughed behind his hand, and then said:

Well, yes, I guess I can clear it up a little—at least, I'll try. Can't do any more, ch?'

So Mr. Brent, the detective, took his departure, promising to come again in the evening.

Ten o'clock at night.

The detective had arrived at the banker's residence an hour before, and both were together in the latter's bed chamber, as we draw up the curtain on this, a second some of our little drams.

There was a night lamp in the room, but it was turned low, and at the side of the table where it stood were seated Mr. Colton and the detective.

The room of the banker was situated in the reading room, where the safe stood, from which the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the banker's gold had so mysteries and some of the car was intended advised him to return to his palace at Gatschins. Mr. Brent coughed behind his hand, and then said:

"Could you call up your two servants, air?"

"Certsinly," and the banker put his hand on the bell-cord.

Mr. Brent stapped him quickly.

"Excuse me, Mr. Colton," he said, "but call them up on some excuse. Don't let them know our business, sir?"

Mr. Colton nodded his head and pulled the bell cord.

The summons was answered by the old man who had shown Mr. Brent in.

"Any letters, John, to-lay?" the banker asked, while the detective eyed the man closely.

His wife, an old gray-haired woman, now made her appearance.

"Mrs. Thompson, you'll have mutton to-day for dinner, won't you?"

"If that's your what, of course, sir," respectfully answered Mrs. Thompson, and a moment after she left the room, wondering is see own mind why that gentleman with her master stared at her so.

"That's an honest woman," was Mr. Brent's conclusion.

the detective asked.

"I don't think I shall. If I sin't in your way, I don't mind sitting up, too. Something tells me that we shall make a discovery to-night."

The front door below opened now, and a man's footstep was heard ascending the stair-case and wa king across the corridor, then opening a door, entered a room and closed the door.

"That's your son coming in?" Mr. Brent asks in a low voice.

"Yes," the banker responds, in as Brant asks in a low voice.

"Yes," the banker responds, in an equally low voice; "he attends lectures in the city university twice a week—ah, Mr. Brent, he is a most studious and learned young man."

Eleven o'clock, and the banker and detective are still waiting for the burglar.

You could hear a pin drop in the house at this time; even the street outside seemed sleeping.

Mr. Colton, the banker, is dozing in his easy chair.

Mr. Brent, the detective, has never closed his eyes, nor has he any notion of deing so.

He sits there in his chair for the collection of the released.

Berlin, Jan. 29.—In the Prussian lands to-day during a discussion on the spirit monopoly bill Prince Biamarck declared that if the spirit monopoly was refused, the government would be forced to impose an enormous license upon dealers. Referring to his remarks relative to the reichstag in the landtag yesterday in the discussion on the subject of the expulsion of the Poles, he declared the government did not instead either a coup d'etat or the dissolution of the releasag.

He sits there in his chair facing the partly open door of the reading-room, wherein is the banker's safe, and his eyes—his sharp, owl like eyes—are fixed on that door, and he ison the alert te catch the faintest sound.

For another hour they watch, and twelve strikes at last.

Ten minutes after Mr. Brent's ears catch a strange sound, and he rises quietly strides across the reom and reaches the door of the reading room.

A lamp also burns on the mantel of this room, and it is also turned down quite low, leaving the crack of the door, beholds the cak door of the banker's reading room epon, and a white robed form enter, with a small night lamp in his hand.

The banker at this instant awakes, and seeing where the detective is, walks cautiously toward him.

The detective turns, puts up his finger to invoke silence, and the banker coming up, he points into the reading.
