becomes desolate, and that agriculture has ceased; how quickly then would the town be depopulated. Imagine now the reverse—the country flourishing, but the town burnt down. Even if we had not frequent examples to teach us, common sense would teach us that the same necessity that first originated the accumulation of individuals still continues; and accordingly we continually see that when calamities like these assail flourishing towns, the loss is immediately repaired, and almost invariably with greater splendor and magnificence. It is evident that it is for the convenience of the adjoining and surrounding country that towns are built; and if our country people would when they come to town take a view of the wharves, stores, and so forth, and consider them as erected for their convenience, in the same way as they do a mill or a blacksmith's shop near their own homes, it would go very far to do away with this feeling of jealousy which is too often indulged in. We began with talking about a Market house. Now for whose benefit is this species of building principally erected, or rather, who will reap the greatest advantages from it?—We will try and answer this question by asking another. Why is it that several of our merchants are putting new fronts to their shops, making the entrance to them easy, and affording every facility for customers to inspect their goods? In order, of course, that they may attract buyers and get rid of their stock as quickly as possible. Now what is a market house but a shop? The only difference is, that there are a hundred, or two perhaps of shopkeepers, occupying the same building, and five hundred or a thousand customers in the shop at one time, all hurry and bustle to get served. If the shop be large and well laid out, properly ventilated, kept cool and airy in summer and warm and comfortable in winter, it will be the means of attracting a greater number of the wealthier portion of the community who would not otherwise think even of entering it. And who would benefit by their presence? Unquestionably the sellers;—and who are they? The inhabitants of the country,—the raisers of the producers. Suppose also that every facility were provided for displaying the goods exposed for sale to the greatest possible advantage,—that the sellers of meat occupied one portion, the flour and meal merchants another, the vendors of poultry a third, of miscellaneous wares a fourth, and so on. Imagine too a place set apart for live stock, for carts or sleds laden with hay, wood, potatoes, &c. Try and conceive—for to those used to the present market house it will be a stretch of imagination—that the avenues to this large shop are neat, clean and free from obstructions of all sorts,—so that every lady might come with her cook maid or man servant and make her market with perfect ease and comfort to herself; would not all this combine to facilitate and encourage trade among the public shopkeepers, at much as plate glass windows and easy entrances do the private ones? If it would, why should not that part of the public who are the sellers, and who will derive the greatest benefit, contribute to the expense of the erection? This part of the subject will require a separate article, which we will ere long furnish. In the mean time, we request our country readers to take what we have here written for their especial benefit into their serious consideration.

The Subscriber continues to issue Policies against Fire, at reasonable rates of Premium.

All losses that may be sustained, are paid with liberality and promptitude, by the Agent, without reference to the Company, in London. In cases of fraud, suspicion, or requiring explanation, the subscriber then asks for instructions, from the Board of Directors Quinquennial participation of profits will be declared next year. It may be remembered that one of the assured in this Town, was paid, in 1849, the handsome sum of £41 8s. 10d. Cy., as his return of premiums paid, for the then preceding five years.

Whenever reservoirs for water are made in the Town; or Pumps are erected at the Wharves; to be used in cases of Fire, the Company have authorised the Subscriber to contribute liberal donations for such useful purposes.

The Agent has received instructions by the last Mail, to inform applicants for Life Insurance, that in future, NO CHARGE FOR STAMP DUTY WILL BE MADE. The Company will pay such charge out of its own funds.

All blanks and informations wanted, will be cheerfully furnished, by making application to
