GERMANY ACCEPTS ALLIED DEMANDS

Proceeds To Carry Out Fulfilment of Allied Military Negotiations.

SPLENDID OUTLOOK

By EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER.
By Radio to The Advertiser and the Chicago Daily News. Copyright.

Berlin, Nov. 6.—Despite the news from Paris that the allies are still not satisfied with what the Germans accomplished in the way of fulfilment of allied military demands, this correspondent is able to say that the negotiations are actually proceeding with the best outlook for a satisfactory solution.

The question of security police already is on the way to solution, the Germans accepting the allied demands for demilitarization of this body. The same is true of the question of German patriotic organizations, whose relations with the government will soon be officially regulated in a satisfactory manner.

The third question, reorganization of the German general staff and transformation of General Seeckt from something less belligerent in name than "army leader" to a new position, perhaps as chief of staff, now is getting the most serious consideration. The writer believes that wihin a few weeks all difficulties will be eliminated and the evacuation of Cologne can proceed.

NO REDUCTION IN TAX ON GAS OR LICENSE FEE

Minister of Public Works States Impossible Due To Highway Expenditures.

Special to The Advertiser.

Toronto, Nov. 6.—There will be no reduction in the present provincial gasoline tax of 3 cents a gallon next year, Hon. George S. Henry, minister of public works, stated today.

"Will there be any reduction in the motor license fee?" the minister was asked.

"Such a possibility has not even been considered," Mr. Henry replied.

"We are spending a lot of money on Ontario highways, revenue has to be raised to meet it," he added.

Faced with the prospect of a deficit of $5,000,000, the government is more concerned with finding new sources of revenue than reduction of existing taxes. Mr. Henry has announced that an annual expenditure of $25,000,000 will be required to keep pace with the good roads program laid down, and the gasoline tax has so far this year furnished only about 8 per cent of this amount.

Since it was first applied early in May it has yielded some two million dollars. It is hoped that next year it may bring three million dollars into the coffers of the government.

Murder Attempt Mystifies Police

Shot Fired Through Window Pane Injures Mrs. T. Churby.

Canadian Press Despatch.

Windsor, Nov. 6.—Ford City police are scouring the district for clues to the identity of an unknown individual who pressed a revolver against the window pane and fired a shot which lodged in the jaw of Mrs. Tony Churby, 231 Cadillac street. Dr. J. P. Morgan, Ford City physician, ordered her to Hotel Dieu immediately, where she is in a critical condition hospital authorities state. Mystery surrounds the shooting, as the culprit left no traces. Mrs. Churby was sitting quietly in the dining-room of her home when the shot rang out, smashing the window and lodging in her jaw. She was with her children at the time, and a boarder was in his room upstairs. From powder marks on the glass it is evident that the revolver was pressed close to the pane before the shot was fired.

SPINDRIFT

An Adventure of the Great Lakes

By HAROLD TITUS

INSTALMENT 31.

When Haines backed the North Star from the dock Janet Needham, travelling bag beside her, sat behind him on the locker—the locker which contained the steel box taken last night from the place where it had remained hidden for years on Little Summer.

The girl's eyes held on the man with loathing, with animosity, and that expression did not change until, glancing through the window, she saw the Wanderer sliding past them to her berth. Then Janet Needham smiled in relief, for soon, now her father and her lover would know of her plight.

So concerned was she with that sensation of relief, almost of release from the present difficulty, that she did not notice the direction they were taking until, at full speed ahead, the tug swept past the dock toward which her father's tug was slowly making.

She sprang up then, and grasped the spokes of the wheel.

"What's this? Where are you going?" she cried.

In the faint light from the binnacle she saw Haines smiling down at her, cruelly and in triumph.

"I said we were going to Escanaba," he answered, and chuckled.

"You said that, but we're not"—glancing at the compass as if to reassure herself.

"Yes, east! I told you we'd go to Escanaba because I don't trust you. I love you, my dear, but I wouldn't give you a chance to slip away at this stage of the game."

She shook the wheel, struggled to turn it over.

"None of that!" He released the spoke with one hand and shoved her away from him. "You've made trouble enough without running us out of the channel."

Janet was blazing.

"You contemptible liar! You low —— You—— Oh a woman hasn't words for a man like you!"

But with the wrath in her voice now was a tremor of real fright, and she drew back into the shadows, trying to collect her wits, trying to meet this duplicity with the same calmness that she had met his infamous proposal to trade herself for the safety of John and her father. It was difficult, that struggle. She was alone with Haines, now, she was bound for she knew not where. In Escanaba she would have felt safe; on the lake, headed for some unnamed destination, she had only her bodily strength and the resourcefulness of her mind to fall back upon for protection.

She watched Haines' face as he watched his compass. He was still smiling and she saw his shoulders move in a sharp shrug as though he cast all responsibility, all regard for his word, all mercy from him.

"No, it's likely a woman hasn't words for a man she happens not to like," he said easily. "Never mind; you'll find them. It isn't going to be so bad. I'm not so rotten as you think I am. I'm just doing what any other man would do in the fix I was in: taking you away to where you can think this thing all over and come to your senses."

"Just where are you taking me?"

He went on, as though he had not heard:

"I didn't trust you a minute this afternoon. I watched your house after I left to see what you'd do. You couldn't have slipped out without my seeing you. I bumped into the foolish Hopps and thought for a minute they were going to give me something else to think about, but I fooled 'em!" He laughed. "I fooled 'em as I fooled you!"

"Oh—words! If I had words for you!"

"I'm sorry for you. I know what it is not to have names to call people! I know"—leaning toward her, his teeth showing in the darkness. "For months I've been without words for your pet murderer and for you! I've sweat and gone without sleep nights trying to think up words, but now I don't have to. I have you, my dear, and with you I don't need—"

He had put out a hand to draw her to him, but she struck at it savagely.

"Don't touch me!"

The contempt in her voice stung him and the smile died in his face.

"I'm master of this tug it happens. Everybody aboard will do as I say. I tried to kiss you back there in your house. You promised it to me tonight. Well, it's night, isn't it? It's night now!"

She tried to open the door and slip out as he released the wheel for an instant and grabbed for her, but she was not quick enough. He dragged her roughly to him, imprisoning her with one arm while the other went back to hold the tug on its course.

"We'll have our little kiss now, eh? Our first kiss?"

The man smiled as she struggled helplessly in the clasp of his one arm, which at once imprisoned both hers, and drew her to him. She strained to hold her head far backward, but that was as hopeless as her striving to release her arms. Haines knew that she was conscious of this helplessness, too, and a laugh rumbled in his chest.

"Just one—now," he said. "Just one little kiss!"

But his words and his laugh struck something new in the girl, sent a new sort of fire flashing into her eyes. Her face suddenly snapped close to his; her head ducked, twisted, raked upward, and she was free, staggering back to the locker as Haines swore and touched his cheek with careful fingertips where the protruding point of the one hatpin in Janet's little turban had scratched him deeply.

"You cat!"

"Try it again!" Janet panted from the corner where she cowered. "Try it again, Val Haines!"

She had the hatpin in her hand now, close in her tightly doubled fist, and her blue eyes blazed with cold fire.

"When the time comes, I'll try it."

"The time will never come!"

He laughed again.

"Sure, aren't you? Who's going to come in here to help you? Blackman's the only other aboard, and I'm ready for him if he'd want to throw in with you!" He tapped his hip significantly.

For an interval neither spoke. The tug was rising and falling over the short seas of the channel, which grew larger as they approached the lake. The wind tore and shrieked about the pilot house, and now and then a slap of spindrift showered the narrow windows.

"Perhaps you think you're the only one in this affair who's tried trickery," she said, coldly.

"No, I don't. I suppose you left word for your father."

"I did. Of course I did"—with something of surprise.

"Don't think I didn't expect it."

"And he'll be after us. He'll be after us by now. He'll run you down, Val Haines, and he'll make you pay more dearly for this than you have ever paid in your life!"

At that the man laughed again, though he once more raised fingers to his scratched and bleeding cheek.

"And I got ready for that."

"By what?"

"Guess, my dear! Guess! You saw your old man's tug dock when we left. Look back, through the window yonder, and tell me if you see a light."

After a moment Janet rose and looked out astern.

"See them?"

She did not answer.

"Of course not. They won't be along, my dear; they'll get your message but they won't come. Trust your murdering lover for that! It's a poor sort to depend on—a man like that!"

For a lengthy interval after that no word was spoken. Haines looked back once, through the after window in the pilot house, but nothing other than the close blackness of night rewarded him. He was out of sight of the village lights. The lights of no tug showed in pursuit. He smiled to himself. His plan was working as smoothly as butter! The sheriff had arrived, or would arrive before Ezra and his wheelsman could determine what had happened to Janet.

Suddenly the sharp seas of the channel gave to longer swells. The tug left off her slightly staggering progress and commenced to rise and fall regularly. The height of the climbs increased, the plunge downward into troughs became more pronounced. They were clearing Point Detour and its lee; they were entering Lake Michigan, and the gale was roaring down upon them from the Straits of Mackinac, piling up seas that ran for nearly a hundred miles without obstruction.

Haines took out his watch and hung it close to the compass box, making mental note of the time. He changed his course, taking those ever-increasing seas on his starboard bow, making for the Straits.

Outside he could see vague patches of white where roaring rollers broke on the shoal water which the channel threaded, but shortly these points of relief in the darkness became smaller, less numerous, and the climb and plunge of the tug even greater. They were out in it, for sure, by then.

The North Star shuddered as the full speed of her engine drove her into the seas and the tons of water caught by the curved housing over her bows battered and roared as it sought to bear her down. Once, as she balanced on the crest of a comber, the screw was thrown free of water, and for a few revolutions of the engine the tug vibrated alarmingly.

At that Haines reached for the electric button which connected him with the engine-room, pushed it, and the pulse of the ship left off its feverish beat. They proceeded at half speed, easing the strain on machinery and hull

"No use to crowd this thing," he muttered. Then, turning to Janet: "We've lots of time. We may need the tug a long, long time, so we'll spare her. Of course if you'll throw that stubborn streak in you overboard it'll be easoer and quicker, but if not——" He shrugged.

"That will be another thing against you: running away with the United's property," the girl reminded him.

"A devil of a lot I care! I'd run away with the moon for you, if I could get my hands on it. Besides, where we're going there'll be none to know."

"Just where is that, then?"

"It all depends on you. If you're reasonable it may be Mackinaw. There are preachers there; there's a telegraph office. You, the preacher, and I can say the necessary things. Then a telegram will go to United, telling 'em where the tug is, and you and I'll need her no more.

"Or it might be Georgian Bay and Canada. Who knows? It all depends on you. Over on that Ontario side there are places where nobody'd ever find us, where no ship goes except in summer. Perhaps we'll winter there, you and I. No one can tell, except you! Blackman thinks we're going to Manistique, but what he don't know won't hurt him!"

"Oh, you'll pay 'or this!" the girl moaned. "You'll pay, Val Haines!"

"Who'll I pay?" he taunted.

She clung to the hatpin and watched him as any cornered quarry would watch a relentless enemy, but she would not reply, would ask no more questions, she resolved, not even when the man looked out astern again and, assured that nothing except a waste of water might have been seen had the skies lighted, turned back to his wheel with a satisfied laugh.

JAIL BREAKERS FOUND GUILTY AT WINNIPEG

Trio Who Figured in Daring Break Remanded For Sentence.

Canadian Press Despatch.

Winnipeg, Man., Nov. 6.—John Stanton, Alex Shupeniuk and George Labodiuk, were this afternoon found guilty on charges of escaping from legal custody and assaulting. They were remanded for sentence.

The trio, who figured in a daring break from the provincial jail here with two other convicts on October 6th last, elected trial by jury, when arraigned on a charge of jail breaking.

Stanton and Shupeniuk are listed on the present assize docket to appear for trial on charges of murder. Labodiuk is awaiting trial for alleged theft.

"Dock" Blake, known as the "King of Fakirs," and A. MacKenzie, who escaped with the trio, have not yet been apprehended.

John Stanton is a former St. Marys man, and is well known in London.

"I know exactly what is the matter with you, Jack. You have lost confidence.

"YOU were getting along fine until you had that nervous breakdown, but since then you have been worried and anxious.

"Now you have got discouraged and down-hearted, and it is no wonder you cannot make sales.

"The salesman must have lots of energy and vigor as well as confidence in himself and what he has to sell.

"But you cannot have confidence in anything so long as your nerves are weak and you spend the nights worrying instead of getting good, refreshing sleep.

"Take my advice, boy, and go straight to the drug store and get half a dozen boxes of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food. Then make up your mind that while you are using this you will get out into the fresh air all you can and forget to worry.

"Now, you may feel pessimistic after all the treatments you have been taking, but I know what I am talking about.

"My nerves were in a worse condition than yours ever were. I could scarcely get a wink of sleep, and did not care whether I got anything to eat or not.

"Besides, I got so irritable and down-hearted that nothing seemed to go right.

"The experience that I had enables me to sympathize with you now, and also to say that I am certain that Dr. Chase's Nerve Food will help you.

"It is entirely different to most medicines used for the nerves, because instead of merely stimulating the tired nerves to over-exertion, it nourishes them back to health and vigor.

Now, Jack, you must give the Nerve Food a trial, and I know you will consider me your best friend for telling you about it."

Here is an interesting letter from another business man who had a similar experience with Dr. Chase's Nerve Food:

Mr. W. J. Wilson, Grocer, Perth, Ont., writes: "In fitting up this building for a grocery business I worked very hard, and after putting in my stock I continued plugging away, good and hard, too. I commenced to feel myself going down—my weight went from 180 pounds down to 154 pounds. My appetite began to fail, and, of course, upon retiring I could not get a good night's rest. Sometimes after going to sleep my nerves would twitch, and I would waken up with a start, and then lie awake for hours. I remembered having used Dr. Chase's Nerve Food before, so I started in again, and took a good treatment, using about half a dozen boxes. I soon felt my appetite returning, I could sleep well, and commenced gaining in weight, until I felt like a new man. From the benefits I have received from the use of Dr. Chase's Nerve Food I cannot speak too highly of it."
