Sweet as a Rose.

And he would have had this reception and opportunity, but that the astute major had prepared and schooled Flossie; had, indeed, supplied her with a part which no one in London could play more perfectly.

What was he to do? He did what any other man, unless he were made of iron would have done; he spoke to her pleasantly, and though he did not kiss her—which, be sure, Flossie noticed—he put his arm in hers and allowed her to remain in his embrace, as it were, for the space of a minute or two.

Let those blame him who will; he was weak, if you like, but not disloyal to the trusting heart that loved him so dearly down in Woldshire; for even as he looked down at the curly head and the blue eyes, the vision of Paula's beautiful, pure face crossed before his eyes, and made him feel remorseful and weak and altogether base.

"Well, Flossie," he said, unloosening her arms and leading her to the sofa.

"Well, Rick," she retorted mimicking his tone, but quite pleasantly, and with a smile in her eyes, though her heart was beating with suppressed passion and anxiety. "Is that all you have to say to me after being away so long? And where have you been?"

"Down in the country," he replied, looking at the carpet, and wondering that he had never noticed how artificial her voice was and how forced her attitudes.

Poor Flossie! It was hard upon her, after all. Until his eyes had been opened by that mischief-maker, Love, he had thought her nearly perfect, and had been quite content to take her voice and her attitudes as they were.

"In the country! So I should think," she retorted. "You look awfully well; quite brown. Why, your hands are like a nigger's, sir."

He looked at them for the sake of doing something and looking somewhere.

"Yes, it has been hot," he said.

"And have you enjoyed yourself, Rick?" she inquired pleasantly. "Had a good time, fishing and all that?"

"Yes," he said, and as the remembrance of the "good time" and all it meant for him came across him, his heart smote him.

"I wrote several times," she went on. "I wanted to see you awfully bad. I've had such a cold, Rick, though I don't suppose you care, as you haven't even asked me how I am!" with a little, plaintive laugh.

He looked at her and saw that she was paler than when he had left, and that round her brilliant eyes—soft enough now, though—there were slight rings, telling of that "little cough" which troubled her at times, and this didn't make him any the more comfortable.

"I am very sorry, Flossie," he said; "it is the east wind and coming out of the theater." Then a sudden inspiration fell on him.

"Flossie," he said, "I don't think you are at all well. You have had that cough some time now. How would it be if you went away for a trip to the south?"

She knew what he meant; he wanted to send her away, but though her heart gave a passionate throb of indignation, she still smiled.

"What, leave the work! Just as we are in full swing? What would Manders, the manager, say? It would stop the piece, and we've just started on a long run."

"Never mind the piece," he said. "Manders could get someone else."

She rose and dropped him a curtsey, laughing.

"Thank you for a very nice compliment. Get someone else! I would have you know that there is only one Flossie Hamilton, Sir Herrick Powis! Get someone else!" and she sank down again, laughing.

He smiled, but rather gravely.

"Of course, they could not get anyone to fill your place adequately, I know that, Miss Vanity, but they could find someone to make shift with you until you came back."

"Perhaps," she assented. "But you—could you come now, Rick?" she added inocently.

He started and looked down at the carpet. It was cruel work! If he had only written!

"I?" he said quietly. "No I don't think I could go, Flossie."

"Then don't think of it," she said, with tearful decision. "I shouldn't think of going without you, I should be miserable. Don't say any more about it. Besides, it is all nonsense, I shall get rid of this cough directly. It's the drafts, and we've spoken about them."

"You had better go," he said, and his voice sounded cold and harsh in his anxiety and earnestness.

But though every tone was noticed by her, she still strove with herself and acted her part, which was to be patient and cheerful and smiling and to quite ignore that there was anything wrong.

"Well, I shall see," she said; then she jumped up. "I am so glad you have come in now, for I was just going for a drive, and was wishing you were here to go with me; it is slow with Weston. I'll order the Victoria. Will you have some wine, Rick, dear, or wait for tea when we come back?"

"No, no wine," he said hurriedly, "and I don't think I can go with you this afternoon, Flossie."

"Oh, but you must," she retorted, laughing softly. "Why, look what ages you have been away; and I have had to drive by myself with only Weston all the time. You must go. Don't be unkind, Rick."

"I don't want to be unkind, my child," he said, almost sadly; he pitied her so; "but I'm engaged——" he stopped short, the words were so fearfully appropriate. "I want to see about some harness."

"Then we'll drive to the saddler's," she said quietly. "I've made up my mind that you shall come, and you know how dreadfully disappointed I shall be if you don't. Do come, Rick?" and she went behind him and put her tiny hands upon his shoulders.

It was more than he could bear. He felt that he was acting like a brute, rather than a man.

"Very well," he said rising. "We will go to the saddler's."

After all it was not so bad as going to the park, where everyone would see them. Perhaps, too, while they were out he could hit upon some way of breaking it to her.

Oh, good resolutions, where have you all flown to?

"I sha'n't be a minute or two," she said, flitting out of the room. "Look over the new songs; there are one or two good ones there, and there's the prince's last portrait, he gave it to me the other night. I felt so lonely that I asked a few of them to supper."

Sir Herrick paced the room, his arms folded, a dark shadow on his face. These chains held him so tightly, and were not so easily knocked off.

He walked to the piano and looked at the songs absently, stared at the portrait, which stood on a cabinet beside one of himself, and amidst numerous ones of Flossie in ladies' ordinary attire; you would not find in any room of the house one of her in theatrical costume.

"When I'm at the theater, I'm an actress; when I'm at home I'm a lady, like anyone else," she used to say.

COLLEGIATE HOLDS CROSS-COUNTRY RUN

John Gilmore Breaks School Record in Senior Event by Two Minutes.

The fourth annual 'cross-country run of the Collegiate Institute took place Monday night and both in point of entries and the time made by the contestants was by far the most successful.

This year the race counts in the championship of the school, which will be decided on Friday at the annual field day.

The race was run over a five-mile course, extending from the school to the asylum grounds, by way of Oxford street.

The record for seniors was broken by two minutes, John Gilmore, son of Mr. James Gilmore, ex-M.P., winning the event in 38½ minutes. William McFarland was second with 38 minutes and 32 seconds, and Albert James third, with 38 minutes and 45 seconds.

The junior event went to A. Kingsmill, who made the distance in 41½ minutes, with H. Thompson second in 41¾ minutes, and D. Aiken third in 43 minutes.

Dr. Downing acted as starter, and Messrs. McCutcheon and McCready as whippers-in.

RACING IN CALIFORNIA.

New York, Oct. 5.—T. H. Williams, president of the California Jockey Club, is in New York for a stay of two weeks, during which time he will endeavor to interest horsemen in racing in San Francisco. Mr. Williams stopped at Chicago on his way east and says that the prospects for a big California delegation from the middle west are excellent. He has not been in New York long enough to get an expression of opinion, but hopes for a liberal representation from this section.

Racing will begin at Oakland on Nov. 12, and the stakes, which will be duly announced later, will close on Oct. 24. There will be racing at both Oakland and Ingleside tracks during the winter, but Oakland will be given the preference in deference to the wishes of the horsemen. Mr. Williams promises a very attractive programme, which will include a number of overnight handicaps, with values ranging from $600 to $1,000.

HAD ANOTHER GOOD PRACTICE

Football Players Turn Out in Large Numbers at Tecumseh Park.

Local pigskin chasers turned out in force again last night, and another splendid practice was worked in. Several new men were present, some of them with all the necessary points which go toward making fine football players. Tecumseh Park has been fitted up with electric lamps, and quite sufficient light is afforded by these to make practice after 7 and 8 o'clock as easy as it is during the daytime. As it is, much more convenient for nearly all of the boys to spend the evening after 7 o'clock in practice, rather than that immediately previous to 7, practice has been set for 7:15 tonight, instead of 5:30, which has been the usual time. This allows the boys time to have their dinner and then change their clothes, instead of going direct from their work, and it also gives an opportunity to work in a longer practice. Two good solid hours of hard work are on the programme for tonight.

The juniors were out in full strength last night, and some fine players are coming forward. Vic Jackson is developing rapidly. He can already punt, run and tackle like a veteran. Experience seems to be the necessary article which most of the boys lack, and which one or two games like last Saturday's will afford. Billy Rowlands is showing up well, as also are McConechy, Westman and Thomson.

A very interesting and instructive talk on Rugby was given in the Masonic Temple, Room 16, after practice. Messrs. Meredith and Fields spent an hour or so explaining the different lineups, tackles and signals, and with the aid of blackboard drawings demonstrated just how the different formations would be worked. This method of learning the game is almost as necessary as getting down on the field, and is certainly equally as instructive as a practical workout. Arrangements have been made for another talk, to be given on Friday evening. Every man interested in the game is requested to be on hand, as all the points of the game will be gone through.

Although Harry Peel has been down to practice but a few times, he will be in the game on Saturday. Harry's business does not allow him to get down exactly when he would like to, but he is spending some time each morning in getting into shape.

Givern, a new man on the field this season, is a husky chap. Though not very big, he is solid, and runs and tackles well, and will make good on one of the teams on Saturday.

The boys who can stay with Ewart Fields in the running and passing have got to be top-notchers in those lines.

Bice was playing Association last night, which is fine for getting into shape. He wasn't down to the Rugby gridiron.

H. Brown, H. Down, J. Robinson, McLaughlin, D. Brown and Livingstone are all new players, who will be on the field tonight.

Mr. Gordon Butler, this year's secretary, is looking after the team's welfare in a very able way. He is seen in the park every night.

ELORA PROTESTS SEMI-FINAL GAME

The Elora Rocks, who were defeated by 8 to 1 in Saturday's junior C. L. A. semi-final with Brantford II., have entered a formal protest with Secretary Hall, and make a serious charge against their conquerors. The protest relates that there was not sufficient protection to prevent delay to play by the encroachment of spectators on the field, and also that the Rocks suffered more severely than their competitors from the rulings of the referee. The important part of the complaint, though, is the charge that in both games, in Elora last Wednesday and in Brantford on Saturday, Smith, one of Brantford's regular senior players, played for Brantford II. under an assumed name.

Secretary Hall was notified yesterday that the Junction Shamrocks would defend the protest entered by the Young Torontos over the eligibility of two of the Shamrocks in the junior C. L. A. games of Sept. 24.

GOOD CHANCES FOR JOCKEYS

Winter Will Likely Be a Busy and Profitable One for the Boys.

New York, Oct. 4.—It looks as if this would be a busy and profitable winter for the jockeys, writes Frank J. Bryan. The fact that there will be racing at many points, and for the entire winter, means chances galore not alone for the riders of established reputation, but for the aspirants for fame in the saddle as well. A canvass recently made among the fraternity shows that many who have heretofore taken a rest with the close of the regular season have decided to keep right on, and this will assure a generous supply for all the tracks.

We see published from day to day many stories of the intentions of this or that rider, with glowing tales of how delighted he will be to spend the winter at the tracks mentioned, but this is chiefly the dream of some busy boomers, backed up by a lot of hope. The decision of the jockeys now under contract has not been made, and will not be announced for some time to come. If the boys were to have their say they would probably show some preference. But the majority of them have managers, and it is their say that will decide matters, and this say will not come until the eleventh hour.

It is reported that some of the boys have been promised immunity from punishment at certain tracks if they will go there. This, however, is hardly possible, for it would make a farce of racing if a rider or his manager was to have an assurance that he would not be punished for any offense of which he might be guilty.

BOSTON LEADS BY ONE POINT

Race in the American Becoming More Exciting—The National Waning.

The results of the American League race is being awaited with interest by every baseball fan in the country. Never before has the fight been so close and exciting, and now the Bean-Eaters are but a solitary point in advance of the Highlanders. A lose by either side would be next to disastrous. Yesterday both teams won, but the games were not runaway exhibitions, and the teams are liable any day to receive a set-back that will prove their downfall. Boston has the hardest proposition at present, being pitted against Chicago at the Windy City, while the Highlanders have something easier — St. Louis, on the latter grounds.

The Nationals lead is unchangable, and interest is wanning in the games in that league. The standings are as follows:

CURLING.

ANNUAL MEETING OF LONDON CLUB.

The annual meeting of the London Curling Club will be held at the London House on Friday evening, Oct. 7, at 8 o'clock. Members are particularly requested to attend, as business of importance will come before the meeting for discussion.

The business to be transacted is as follows: Receiving financial report, acting upon recommendation of executive committee, election of officers, and appointing committees.

THE ASSOCIATION SEASON OPENED

First Game Played Between the Collegiates and the Medicos.

The first game in the City League Association football championship series was played on the St. John's A. C. field in West London last night. The London Collegiate's team lined up against that of the Medical School, and for an hour kept the circular ball rolling around the field without either side being able to score a goal. Although the score would suggest a remarkably good and close game, this one was not characterized by very good playing. Individual grand stand play was not very much in evidence, practically no good combination work was indulged in, although at intervals some brilliant rushes enlivened matters a bit. What seems to be the trouble is inexperience and unfamiliarity with the game, and both of these will be remedied as the season progresses. Lack of practice by both teams made the game appear anything but a very interesting exhibition. One or two of the players showed out conspicuously against their fellows. Garrett, of the Collegiate team, played a splendid game, and Blackwell, for the Medicals, played the strongest game for his team.

One of the chief essentials, though, for making an interesting contest was plainly shown last evening—the teams were very evenly balanced, and in future, when the boys are more familiar with the game, some fine, exciting contests may be anticipated. The league consists of four teams—the Y. M. C. A. and Londons being the others. These latter two meet next Saturday and a royal battle is expected to take place.

Mr. Frank Bryant refereed the game last night to everybody's satisfaction.
