MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND

ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Way Lillian Rallied From the Shock.

I never have admired Lillian more than I did in the moments following Allen Drake's disclosure concerning Harry Underwood.

The news that he intended "beginning all over again" meant to her, of course, only one thing, that the husband who had treated her so cavalierly wished to make amends to her and to take up their old life together.

That the tidings sounded the death knell of Robert Savarin's happiness, and of Lillian's also, I knew. Indeed, no one knew better, for I had been my friend's sole confidante in the long weary months following Harry Underwood's departure for the war zone.

I had heard her frank confession that she loved the artist, but I had also heard the decision she had made—that if the husband who had wronged her should come back after his baptism of fire, needing her, she would take up her life with him again, no matter what heartbreak it brought to herself and the artist who loved her so devotedly.

Yet there was no trace of regret, no protest in her voice or face, and I knew there was none in her heart—for Lillian is too big a woman to stoop to pretence about her personal concerns—when at Allen Drake's last words she turned to me.

"Thank goodness, Madge, definite news at last!"

No trace now of the grey pallor which for a few brief seconds had betrayed the panic into which Dr. Drake's first brusque words had thrown her. Instead, there was unmistakable relief and gladness in her eyes and voice. I stared at her for a moment in frank amazement, for I could not understand how it was possible for either emotion to be genuinely hers at news of Harry Underwood.

A Burden Lifted.

Then, with an involuntary flush at my own stupidity the explanation came to me. With the news of Harry Underwood's safety there had been lifted from my friend's heart the terrible burden it had carried for so long—the suspicion that Robert Savarin's love for her had led him to seek Harry Underwood, whom he loathed as the cause of his liege lady's unhappiness, and do him so injury.

Mr. Drake rose to his feet, with no appearance of haste, yet with a definite air of withdrawal.

"I am sure you will excuse me now," he said to Lillian. "And thank you so much for the coffee."

"Thank you!" Lillian said meaningly, and Allen Drake flushed almost boyishly as he saw that she had fathomed his kindly ruse to give her his news when she was at home in her own living room.

He turned to me, held out his hand, smiling down at me in friendly fashion.

"May I Congratulate You——"

"May I congratulate you, Mrs. Graham, upon the successful termination of your errand tonight?"

His voice and smile were disarming, and every trace of the supercilious manner which had so annoyed me was gone. I felt a sudden shamed remorse for my cavalier thoughts of him. After all, he had spent much valuable time and energy in my service.

"It is I who should congratulate you, I think," I returned, feeling unwontedly shy as I spoke. "And I want you to know that I am very, very grateful for all your kindness to me."

His face changed oddly as he looked down at me. Into his eyes came a quick glint of some emotion which I did not understand. He crushed my hand in his as if involuntarily, then released it as quickly.

"If I may only assume that you will call upon me whenever you need the poor assistance I can give you," he said earnestly.

"I shall be only too glad to ask your aid," I replied, and truly felt that I meant it.

The Adventures of Jimmy Coon

THE COAT GREASED.

Cousin Bruin slept so soundly that he didn't feel Jimmy Coon and Teddy Possum poking around in his big fur pocket. Chatterbox, the red squirrel, tied the sharp thorn in the end of Teddy Possum's tail, and then Teddy stood up with his back against Cousin Bruin, and Jimmy Coon took hold of his tail with the thorn tied in the end, and poked into that big pocket of Cousin Bruin's fur coat, and after several jabs, he pulled out the piece of fat.

Once or twice the long sharp thorn pricked Cousin Bruin's skin through the lining of the pocket, but he was so fast asleep that he only stirred a little, thinking it was a fly or a bee.

And then you never saw anything so funny as the greasing of Cousin Bruin's fur coat. All those little rascals took a bit of fat and rubbed it into that thick fur, and then, with pine cones, they combed out the long fur. After much hard work, and a long time, Cousin Bruin looked as smooth as a seal. He looked so queer that his own mother wouldn't have known him!

But only one side of Cousin Bruin's coat was done. All of the other side also had to be greased, and he was lying on that side! "Now, Jimmy Coon, what are we to do? He will look funny with one side smooth and the other burnt and ragged from the fire!"

So Chatterbox took a handful of sharp twigs, and he began to tickle Cousin Bruin's ears.

But Jimmy didn't say a word. He just picked a handful of long grass, and tickled cousin's nose and neck; but the grass was too soft and bent, and didn't rouse him at all—he seemed to snore all the louder. So Chatterbox took a handful of sharp twigs, and he began to tickle Cousin Bruin's ears. I think you or I would call it scratching, for it was so rough. Finally Cousin Bruin twisted and turned a little, and in a minute he turned completely over. Then those little rascals began to grease his other side, and then to comb his rough fur. But before they had finished, Cousin Bruin began to wake up. He opened his little black eyes, and for a few minutes watched those little animals hard at work.

"What on earth are you doing?" said Cousin Bruin. "How funny—I feel just as a fish looks!"
