The Rose of Wentworth

She did not realize in the bright, cheerful rooms, while her busy fingers helped to fashion "pretty nothings" for the fair bride-elect, that it could be so dark and dismal outside; but it was quite unpleasant, and as she stepped into her carriage to return to Mordaunt House she shivered with a sudden chill.

She would have been glad to go straight home, but she had promised to do an errand for Lady Hamilton at a drug store, and so she gave her orders to the driver and was whirled away to Oxford street.

Here, instead of getting out herself, she gave her prescription to the coachman, asking him to get it put up for her, which he was very willing to do, and she sat in the carriage, waiting somewhat impatiently, while he was gone.

During this time a gentleman passed the carriage, and, looking up, saw the beautiful face at the window looking forth into the brilliantly-lighted store.

Arley, however, had not heeded him: she had not heard the low exclamation which he had uttered upon seeing her, or noticed that after passing he had turned again and came up close to the carriage, where he stood somewhat in the shadow of it.

Her thoughts were full of Philip, from whom she had received a long letter that day, and she was wondering what the nature of his business could be to detain him from her so long.

Suddenly a voice arrested her attention—a voice which sent her heart leaping into her throat, and strange prickling pains flying over her whole body; turning her face as white as death itself could have made it, and making her head reel dizzily.

"Arley—Mrs. Paxton," it said out of the chill darkness. "I do not wish to startle you, for I know what you believe; but I thought if I could speak to you and you should recognize my voice, it might prepare you for the rest."

Arley clutched at the side of the carriage; she felt as if ten thousand thunders were crashing in her ears, her voice refused to come at her bidding, her tongue seemed paralyzed and powerless to speak.

Apparently the man outside could see her face, and realized how greatly she was agitated, for he continued gently:

"Don't be frightened. I would not have startled you for anything; but I long for the sound of a familiar voice; speak, Arley, and tell me that you recognize me—that you are glad to see me."

Then, indeed, Arley found voice and sense.

Leaning forward from the carriage window, she extended both her hands and cried in trembling tones:

"Where are you? Come here and let me look into your face. Oh, Wil! can it be possible, or am I asleep and dreaming that you have come back."

Before she had half completed her eager sentence, she felt her hands grasped in a strong, warm clasp—a figure tall and manly stood at the window, and the face of Wil Hamilton, brave, noble Wil, was looking down into hers, yet quivering in every muscle with mingled gladness and emotion.

"No, you are not dreaming, Arley, though I do not wonder that you should fear it, after believing me dead for so long; but I am really and truly Wil—no myth, no spirit, but present in the body, though it is almost a miracle that I am. I have just arrived from Glasgow via the Grand Midland, and as it was too late to go down to Hazelmere, I was on my way to the Langham—walking, for I was too nervous and excited to be cooped up in a carriage—when, passing you, the light from the store struck full upon your face, and I recognized you instantly. I did not dare to present myself to you too suddenly, for I feared to startle you, and it seemed that I frightened you sufficiently as it was."

"Oh, Wil, I cannot believe it even yet," Arley said, in scarcely articulate tones, and still clinging to his hands. "Get in here," she continued, excitedly, while she moved to make room for him, "and I will take you home with me. Your father and mother are in London—Elaine, too; how shall we ever break this glad news to them? and, oh! we have so much to tell you, too."

The excited girl hardly knew what she was saying, and laughed nervously, and almost hysterically, as she concluded.

Wil Hamilton, scarcely less agitated, availed himself of her invitation and entered the carriage, seating himself opposite her.

"My father and mother here! Elaine, too!" he repeated, in trembling tones. "Are they well? Oh! shall I see them tonight"

"Yes, all well, and you shall see them in less than an hour; but, oh! Wil, they have been heartbroken for you," and Arley here broke down, sobbing for very joy.

"I know," he answered, huskily; "but I am very thankful that they are here—it seemed an age to wait until tomorrow. I am afraid, however, that it will never do for me to go in upon them suddenly; I have upset you completely, and I fear it would be even worse with them. Arley, you must go home to them first, and break the news to them as gently as possible, then I will come later," Wil concluded, anxiously.

"It is said that joy never kills," Arley replied, smiling through her tears; "but if you could give me such a shock, I should really fear for them, especially for your mother."

"Yes—yes, they must be prepared first; but where are they?"

"At Mordaunt House."

"At Mordaunt House!" he repeated, astonished; "how is that?"

"Elaine thought it would be pleasanter to be there by themselves in London than to be in a hotel."

Arley thought this explanation would be sufficient for the present.

"Have they grieved for me very sorely?" he asked, brokenly.

"Oh, it has been too sad for anything, Wil," Arley replied, weeping afresh; "it has nearly killed Sir Anthony and Lady Hamilton, and Elaine was crushed at first, but at the sight of their grief she seemed to lay away herself entirely, and has been like a pale, sweet saint whose mission it was to comfort them."

"Oh, it has been hard—hard!" Wil groaned, as the vision of their grief and the remembrance of his own experience rose up before him.

"Yes, I do not know how any of them have borne it; but I am nearly wild to learn all that has happened to you, Wil. I will not question you now, though; I will restrain my curiosity until you have seen them," Arley said; then she added: "I have some strange news for you, too. You remember the discoveries that were made upon my wedding day?"

"Yes."

"You know I was bereft of my name and fortune at one fell blow; but wonderful things have happened since. Elaine obtained a clew, and, following it up, has unraveled all the tangled skein of my life by her perseverance and patience; and just think, Wil, I have turned out to be a 'lady of high degree.'"

"Indeed! That is a discovery worth making," he said, greatly interested.

"Yes; and—you would never guess it, so I may as well tell you—she has proved that I am her own sister—the poor little Alice who was supposed to have been lost at sea."

"Arley! It cannot be possible!" Wil exclaimed, in astonishment.

"Oh, but it is, my dear brother that is to be; and," she added, with something of her old sauciness—"and your fair bride-elect has lost half her fortune by the means."

"Only give me my bride, and I care nothing for the fortune," he returned, eagerly; then continued: "But really, Arley, though astonished, I am delighted. No arrangement could have suited me better. But shall you assume, or have you assumed, the name of Lady Alice?"

"No; every one knows me by the name of Arley, and it would be very awkward to change; besides, the name is not essential. But here comes Robert," she added, as the coachman made his apearance.

As he handed her the parcel which he had purchased, he apologized for having kept her waiting so long, saying there were several to be waited upon before him; but Arley replied pleasantly:

"Never mind. I have met a friend who will go home wth me, and I want you to drive us there as quickly as possible."

"Oh," she continued to Wil, as Robert sprang to his seat to obey, "if Philip was only here tonight, what a happy party we should make! He is out of town upon business."

On their way to Mordaunt House they planned that Arley should enter as if nothing unusual had occurred, while Robert should drive Wil around to the stable, where he should remain in the coachman's room until she should ring his bell, which was connected with the house and was used to summon him when wanted, when he was to come to a side door, where she would admit him and conduct him to his loved ones.

But when the carrage stopped and she alighted and went up the steps her heart beat so rapidly and she trembled so she feared that she would break down and frighten everybody nearly to death by her weakness before she could prpare them to receive the wanderer.

Lady Elaine was just coming downstairs as she entered, and cried out when she saw her:

"How pale you are, Arley! Are you ill? And what made you so late?"

Arley was so glad of that last question as a loophole.

"Oh, you know, there is no end to bridal finery," she said, with a nervous laugh, and trying hard to conquer her trembling; "and it was later than usual when I started to come home."

"Yes, I know; and you have worked over said bridal finery until you are tired out. That is why you are so pale. Come up to my room, and let me help you off with your things, and brush your hair for you. You are damp, and shivering, and cold, and I fear you will be ill."

Lady Elaine regarded her anxiously, and, winding an arm about her, gently forced her upstairs, and led her into her own bright boudoir.

SOME PERSONS have periodical attacks of Canadian cholera, dysentery or diarrhea, and have to use great precautions to avoid the disease. Change of water, cooking and green fruit is sure to bring on the attacks. To such persons we would recommend Dr. J. D. If a few drops are taken in water when the symptoms are noticed, no further trouble will be experienced

WAUD'S FINE WORK AT BELMONT.

The Belmont baseball team played a 12-inning game with Sparta in Sparta on Friday afternoon, winning by the close score of 5 to 6. H. Waud, the Rocket pitcher, of London, pitched for Belmont, striking out 26 men. The features of the game were Jack Jones' heavy hitting and Campbell's good catching. This is the eighth game for Belmont this season and likewise the eighth successive victory.

ST. JOHNS DEFEATED McCLARYS.

McClary's City League team won and lost a game on Saturday at Tecumseh Park, when quite a large crowd assembled to see the exhibition matches. The Wholesale League team proved to be no match for the City League men, who defeated them by a score of 11 to 1, and would have whitewashed them had it not been for a timely hit made by Waud, who pitched for the wholesalers. The batteries were: City League, Gibson and Gibson; Wholesale League, Waud and Carrothers.

The St. Johns defeated the City League McClary team by a score of 9 to 3. This was an unexpected outcome, but the St. Johns won clearly on their merits. The score:

Four of Pittsburg's seven hits were made off his delivery, and he gave two men passes in addition. THE TURF.

THEY PLAYED THE FIDDLER.

Chicago, Oct. 4.—James O'Leary, a pool seller, lost $100,000 yesterday on The Fiddler, a 20 to 1 shot, in the last race at Morris Park. Agents of local gamblers who are fighting O'Leary were sent to every resort in the city where O'Leary operates a handbook, and the word was given to "play The Fiddler." Every one of the 50 handbooks operated by O'Leary had its quota of bets on the race. It is said that the opposing commission distributed money around town to be placed on the horse. When the news was flashed in O'Leary's pool room that The Fiddler won, O'Leary merely remarked: "That's an awful jolt; and to think that he was nothing but a cheap old selling plater."

Literary Notes.

LORD'S DAY ADVOCATE.

One of the latest ventures in the literary line is the Lord's Day Advocate, the official organ of the Lord's Day Alliance. It is a modest monthly twelve-page magazine. The first number gave a lengthy resume of the case just decided by the Privy Council, and general news of the work of organization. It is the intention of the alliance by all possible means to arouse and consolidate public opinion in favor of Sunday observance, so that at the next session of the Dominion Parliament legislation may be secured insuring such an object as far as possible.

THACKERAY LETTERS.

Thackeray's most important American letters are to see the light in November and subsequent numbers of the Centpry Magazine. They cover both the first and second visit of the novelist to America, and record his friendship with the Baxter family of New York. The letters are said to reflect Thackeray's various shades of opinion concerning America and its people with all the author's frankness, vivacity, and charm. A number of unpublished sketches accompany the letters, including good-humored caricatures of Longfellow and George William Curtis.

PHYSICAL CULTURE.

Physical Culture for October is, as usual, very interesting. George Francis' Experiences in a Pesthouse, and Where Doctors Can Buy Credentials, are two of the entertaining articles which appear this month. The magazine is devoted to the interests of keeping people in good health and there are many articles profusely illustrated, which give valuable pointers in all branches of physical culture.

HEALTH CULTURE.

Health Culture, for October, opens with a practical paper on Lung Capacity, by E. E. Carey; The Liver and Its Functions is the subject of an interesting paper by Dr. Latson, the editor, describing this important organ, and showing why people suffer from liver troubles. The Home Treatment of Headache, The Hygiene of Childhood, Physical Culture and similar topics are discussed in a very clear and forcible manner in the October number of this magazine. Health Culture Company, 483 Fifth avenue, New York.

DRAINING THE ZUYDER ZEE.

An account is given in the October McClure's of an engineering project second only in magnitude and importance to the Isthmian Canal; to wit, the stupendous undertaking of the Dutch Government to drain the larger part of the Zuyder Zee, convert the rest of it into a great fresh water lake, and reclaim from the sea a piece of land equal to one-fourteenth the present area of Holland. The works will extend over some 33 years, and each stage of it has been plotted and the cost estimated by the Dutch engineers, with the utmost exactness and thoroughness.

125 BABIES IN TROTTING MATCH

Spirited Race On Their Mothers' Knee at a County Fair.

New York, Oct. 5. — The crowning incident of the Westchester County Fair, which closed the White Plains fair grounds, Saturday, was the contest of 125 laughing, crying, kicking babies, who took part in a free-for-all open trotting match for babies over three hands high and under four, each entry being trotted on its mother's knee.

The trotting races were all forgotten by the horsemen and the society women, as it was only a step from the trotting and running horses on the track to the nursing-bottle competition.

Out of the 125 entries there were 121 losers, and the flustered judges—Supervisor A. Smith Hopkins, of Armonk; Mrs. Edward W. Brown, Portchester; and Mrs. H. S. Ferry, of Mount Vernon—have withdrawn into strict seclusion until the storm blows over.

Catherine, a baby girl under 1 year, the daughter of Mrs. E. Birdsall, of Mount Kisco, whose hair will probably be flaxen when it arrives, passed under the wire first, and is the proud owner of a gold heart necklace, studded with a diamond, for being the best one of the 1-year-olds trotting in long clothes in the nursing-bottle class. Alsone Coffee, the daughter of Mrs. Milicent Coffee, of West Plains, secured a similar prize for being the best baby in the 2-year-old class. John Frazier, of Yonkers, a 1-year-old boy, and Charles H. Buckley, 2 years old, of Mount Kisco, won silver mugs lined with gold in the baby boy canter.

The engagement ring is a left-handed sort of thing.
