LIFE IN VIENNA.

The Humorous Features of the Great Exposition—Slavic Cunning and Hebrew Greed—Savage Merriment.

Bayard Taylor in the New York Tribune.

Although the Great Krach (Crash), as the papers here call it, still hangs over Vienna like a black thunder cloud which has not yet discharged all its electricity, there is a little brightness around the borders of the sky. Fresh insolvencies are reported, and there is now and then another suicide; but there is a general feeling of belief that the worst is over, and the drawn-down corners of the public mouth relax from their grim despondency. Rapacity, also, has had its claws clipped; the sunshine of the last two days brings a few more strangers to Vienna and a few more thousands to the Exhibition; so that, to use the expressive language of Joseph C. Neal, "buried Hope pops up revived, and cracks her rosy skins!" We must not be too hard upon the Viennese, after all. The roots of all that has recently flowered here go back through a great many years, and are fed by the most unsuspected elements. The change in the whole political life of the people not only extends to all their interests, but it is too recent to have entered into and modified their natures. The inertia fostered by the old system still remains, and cannot be overcome except by a new generation. Old-Austrian slowness, Slavic cunning, and Hebrew greed have impressed themselves upon nearly all classes of the people. There are few who are able to feel what the Exhibition symbolizes, but a great many who are eager to use its opportunities. Many visitors, therefore, find discomfort instead of the courtesy and hospitality for which the city has been justly renowned. On the other hand, the authorities, seeing the evil, and anxious to correct it, are forced to find new expedients in place of the arbitrary measures which they would have applied a few years ago.

THE EXHIBITION CARICATURED.

We must not be too hard upon the Viennese, for they are very hard upon themselves. I venture to say that no report which has been sent from here by any correspondent has been so bitterly satirical, so merciless, as the articles and epigrams which appear every day in the humorous papers. There must be at least a dozen of these, and they seem to have a large circulation among the people. The principal of them are the Figaro, the Kikeriki (Cook-a-doodle do!), the Bombe, the Vienna Punch, the Floh (Flea), and the Humoristische Blatter. The freedom with which they assail or ridicule persons and measures is one of the most remarkable features of the change which has come over Austria. Caricatures of well-known officials, absurd parodies of the Court bulletins, covert partisan attacks, and the most daring ridicule of priests and the Papacy, constitute their stock in trade; yet, since my arrival, I have not heard of a single instance of a number being suppressed. The humor of all these papers is acrid, rather than mellow and racy; now and then it amounts to positive venom. They show few specimens of pure wit, like the Kladderdatch, of Berlin, or the old London Punch, and there is much personal attack in them which seems simply malicious. For a week past nearly all have been filled with a sort of savage merriment over the great financial crisis. The Jews, especially, are skinned alive in their illustrations; but I do not find a single note of sympathy with the thousands of confiding depositors who have been ruined. Many of them predict the failure of the Exposition as gayly as if the pride and reputation of Austria were not concerned in its success. In short, their freedom of caricature is so new that they have not yet learned its higher and humaner uses. In regard to the scale of prices attempted to be established here about the 1st of May, however, they have done good service. There was no end to their illustrations and imaginary dialogues between guests and waiters. One represents a stranger stalking away naked from a restaurant, where he has left purse and garments in payment for a dinner. Another shows a waiter bringing a bill about ten feet long, and the guest, in despair, jumping out of the window. Another, again, has a waiter—an exquisite picture of supercilious condescension—saying: "Here's a glass of water, sir!" while the alarmed and embarrassed stranger replies: "I'd like to have one, but—really—I'm afraid I can't afford it." Some of the dialogues represent the waiter as adding five or ten kreuzers after every dish, in order to "round off," or make even sums, while another, after counting a small piece of boiled beef at one florin, asked the guest: "Was it good?" and when the latter answers "Yes," adds: "One florin more!" The various "concessions," out of which the Direction of the Great Exhibition hopes to regain a large part of the outlay, are very sharply ridiculed. Not only the restaurants and drinking pavilions, but the chairs, the music, and the provision for inevitable human necessities are taken up, one after the other and properly sacrificed. The other day, when the Rotunda leaked badly in twenty places, Figaro announced: "We learn that Baron Schwartz-Senborn has made a concession of the leaky spots, for 100,000 florins, to an American. The latter intends to use them as cooling off places for over heated visitors, at the rate of twenty-five kreuzers a minute." The Floh has two illustrations of the same leaking, one of them being the Rotunda inverted and discharging the rain into a barrel, with the words: "If we must have a Rotunda in the shape of a funnel, the spout should be undermost." Another journal says that the leakage was intentional, in order to make a new "concession" for umbrellas, and visitors are henceforth to be fined for bringing their own. So the changes are rung upon every feature of which strangers here complain, and some which they would, of themselves, have accepted as Viennese peculiarities. The New Kikeriki has the following dialogue: Stranger—"This is really scandalous; I am up to my knees in mud." Baron Schwarz—"Pardon me, that is an object of exposition; it's the big mud, of Kotzkemet in its natural dimensions." The Figaro publishes this communication: "Monsieur—I inclose to you 100 francs, to enable French ouvriers to visit Vienna; if the journey should cost more, the ouvriers will furnish the rest. The Exposition is a new triumph of Parisian civilization; for Vienna is France; France is civilization: Civilization is the world. Your immortal Victor Hugo." And also this, apropos of the Crash:—

"Quid sum miser tanc di turus?
Huem patronem rogaturus,
Quum vix Rothschild sit securus?"

The latter is hardly humor. Much better was the variation of the Berlin Kladderadatsch, in commenting on a threatened union of the Ultramontanes and the Communist petroleurs—"super hanc Petroleum edificabo ecclesiam mean!" The freedom—not to say indignity—with which the Pope is handled by these Vienna papers quite surpasses anything which Nast draws or Lawrence writes. The following is a fair specimen, by no means worse than the average:—

"Wanted, to fill a Vacancy.—A Governorship in the Vatican, with free board and lodging, and unlimited excommunications and Peter's-pence, will soon be vacant. Applicants must possess the following qualifications: 1. Experience in cursing. 2. An agreeable personality, for the sake of the Peter's-pence. 3. Skill in preparing and forwarding written or telegraphic blessings. 4. Be between 80 and 90 years of age, and prove his fidelity and obedience to the subscribers. Special services, such as the discovery of impossible dogmas, excommunications en masse, etc., will be rewarded by canonization. Pater Bekx and Associates." Pater Bekx is the chief of the Society of Jesuits, in Rome. Considering that Austria is still free to the sect, this form of attack is as defiant as it is coarse. One of the papers dares also to publish a sarcastic list of Cardinal Rauscher's charities in which 3000 francs are set down as a contribution to "poor Bishop Lachat, of Basle," and 2 1-2 florins to "the poor of Vienna." The movement in Bavaria is too near Austria—especially since the people are so closely allied in blood—not to be also felt, and the resistance to the new pretensions of Rome is much more general and powerful than appears on the surface. In spite of their bold attitude, I believe the infallibilists to be thoroughly alarmed; and their defence is a necessity of their present position. Much of the fun in the journals I have mentioned cannot easily be translated, on account of the dialect or allusions. The specimens I have given show the general drift and aim of the humor which is now popular here, rather than its peculiar character.
