HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE

BY MAY CHRISTIE

Copyright, 1920, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate

XIV.—The Figure by the Safe

"Helene takes an extraordinary interest in the invalid," caustically observed Alice, as we started to return to Thorny Grange. Her lip curled.

I didn't answer. In fact, I felt too much relieved over the doctor's verdict to bother in the least what Alice thought.

And the autumn sunshine had assumed new warmth for me.

* * *

The long day went by, and at last the evening came.

Dinner seemed an interminably protracted meal. Toward its close a ridiculous impulse came to me to fling a cloak over my black lace frock and run over all alone to Anstruther Lodge to beg the kind-hearted nurse for one glimpse of Jim, my husband!

If I only could confide in her, that kindly woman!

But commonsense informed me that I must do nothing of the sort!

When the meal was over Alice and Tony and two others went into the library to enjoy a game of cards. But on this occasion Tony was on the opposite side to Alice. They commenced to play—tremendously absorbed.

I found an interesting volume and curled up on the sofa in the library at a little distance to the players, and facing Alice.

After a time, some angry ejaculations from that lady pointed to the fact that she was losing steadily.

Half an hour later, Travis Lloyd came into the room. He was carrying a sheaf of documents. He went straight to his safe, which stood in one corner of the library, knelt down and began fumbling with the combination lock.

It struck me as rather careless that he would do this when not alone. . . Was it not possible that some inquisitive eye might learn the magic combination? He had his back to me, and seemed absorbed in his business.

With a click the safe opened. Then presently it clicked shut. Mr. Lloyd rose to his feet and came to sit beside me.

"You little book-worm!" His voice was a caress. Then, lowering it, he added:

"But I'm so thankful you don't care for cards! I hate to see a woman gamble—"

I smiled at him. The eternal Eve in every woman loves a word of praise.

We chatted happily for quite an hour. And then we went out to the hall, where a magnificent organ is built into the wall.

"Won't you please try it, Miss Beauclare?"

I seated myself on the high-carved stool. And soon soft strains of music drifted about us.

"You play divinely!" His eyes were aglow with genuine pleasure. "Oh, if only more women were like you—"

I changed from the plaintive minor key that had so enchanted him into a rollicking ragtime melody. I wished to put an end to sentiment.

At 11 o'clock the bridge players came out from the library, announcing that their game was over. Alice's face was very white and strained. I thought. Luck had been dead against her. She flung her scarf—a queer, Oriental thing—about her shoulders and petulantly said good-night.

One hour later the whole house was wrapped in slumber.

But—as I lay between the cold linen s
