LAST HOURS OF TWO JAP SPIES

Story of Final Moments on Earth of Two Officers.

ABOUT TO DESTROY BRIDGE

Accepted Sentence of Death With Unconcern, After Giving Towards the Russian Red Cross Fund.

Harbin, Manchuria, June 5. — This is the story of the last two hours of two Japanese spies, who were caught by Russian Cossacks just as they were about to shatter with dynamite a bridge on the line of the Manchurian railway. They had made their way to the bridge through the Cossack lines, and were about to shatter it to pieces, in view of a company of the Czar's men, but at the last moment were not quick enough.

When the accused were led into the little room of the Chinese "fansa," which had been turned into a court-martial hall by the military authorities of Harbin, the judges and spectators, consisting almost wholly of officers, and not conceal their feelings of admiration for the doomed men.

The formalities of the court-martial were of the simplest order, and the hearing of the trial offered little of interest, seeing that the accused openly, and not without a certain patriotic pride, accepted the responsibility of the crime weighing upon them. They gave their names and rank without the slightest tremor of voice.

"Tehomo Jokoko, 44 years old, colonel of the staff, passed out first from the Military Academy of Yeddo," said the elder of the prisoners, a short, thick-set man of strong and energetic countenance.

"Teisko Jokki, 31 years old, captain of the staff," said the other, taller and slighter in build than his comrade, with a thin and deeply bronzed face. As he gave his name he turned a disdainful look on those in court. A moment later he added:

"Buddhist."

"And you, colonel?" asked the president of the tribunal, "are you of the same religion as your co-accused?"

"No, sir; I am a Christian."

Seeing the looks of astonishment produced by this declaration, he added, quickly:

"I am all the same a true Japanese, born of Japanese parents. But in my youth I was won over by the soft words of Christ, and was converted from Buddhism."

Col. Jokoka spoke in English, and it was an Englishman, employed in the Russo-Chinese Bank, who translated his testimony. A Chinese acted as interpreter to Capt. Jokki.

The explosive substances found on their persons were now shown to the prisoners; but they did not seek to exculpate themselves, nor did they deny in any particular the declarations of the Cossacks who had arrested them.

The interpreter next translated to the officers the military public prosecutor's charge, demanding for them death by hanging.

I watched the faces of the two men when this was read out. Not a single muscle did they move. Impassive as statues, they betrayed by no outward sign the painful workings of their brain.

Their advocate pleaded for a remission of the death sentence to one of hard labor, in consideration of the full avowal they had made. This speech for the defense made no impression on the two prisoners, and not a word did they utter.

Knowing that the law admitted of a reduction of the extreme penalty, we all expected a lighter sentence than that of capital punishment, but after a deliberation of half an hour the tribunal condemned the two officers to the maximum punishment—namely, hanging.

Jokoko and Jokki heard the sentence with as unconcerned an air as if it had fallen upon strangers to them. Indeed, had the verdict been a lighter one they would probably have shown surprise.

Only confirmation by Gen. Kuropatkin was awaited.

I was present when the commandant read out Gen. Kuropatkin's order changing the mode of death to shooting.

"It is well," was Jokoka's reply. "I am ready!"

His comrade said nothing, his most disdainful look expressing indifference as to the deaths that awaited them.

Jokoka asked leave to write to his family and embraced Jokki. The latter now opened his lips.

"I die more tranquil than you, colonel."

"How so?" asked the other.

"I have done my duty to my country and my Maker. You have only earned the thanks of your country."

"What do you mean, captain?"

"I have often thought, colonel, of what you have told me of Christianity. You boast of its superiority to my creed. Well, I find that you are not in accord with your Christ's teachings. I, on the contrary, have nothing to reproach myself with."

"You are perhaps right, captain. But now I have a favor to ask of you. Will you authorize me to perform the first really Christian act which has been allowed me in my life. You know that I have still a bundle of notes of the Chinese rank. There are, perhaps, a thousand rubles. I want to hand over this money personally to the commandant to give to the Russian Red Cross for their wounded. Do you agree to this?"

Jokki stood reflecting a moment. Then he said:

"I have always felt great affection for you, colonel, and if this makes you happy, give the money to our enemies."

When the commandant returned to the prisoners Jokoka handed him a sheaf of white bank notes, with red inscriptions, saying:

"There are about a thousand rubles here. We beg you to give the money to your red cross."

"But had I not better send it to your families?"

"Oh! no! no!" cried the condemned men with one voice. "The Mikado will not forget our wives and children. Do not refuse us this satisfaction," added Jokoka; "divide the money among your wounded."

The commandant still insisted that the officers should send home to Japan all they left. For one moment Jokki appeared to waver. He glanced at his comrade in misfortune. The latter only reiterated his wish to make amends in this way for the wrongs committed in his life. The captain bent his head, acquiescing at last.

Our commandant yielded. He then asked the two Japs whether they wished for anything.

The Buddhist's reply was: "I should much like a bath; after that we will be at your disposal."

A bathroom is an unknown article in Harbin, and the commandant could only send for a couple of pails of water.

The Christian colonel earnestly begged to be allowed to see a clergyman before going to his death.

As there was no Lutheran chaplain on the spot, the Russian priest of the regiment was sent to him. Jokoka begged him to read out the sermon on the mount. This was read in Russian, Jokoka following the text in his Japanese Bible, which had been left with him in his cell. When the priest came to the words:

"For if ye love only those who love ye, what reward will ye have? And if ye welcome only brothers, wherein lieth the virtue?" Jokoka closed the book, joined his hands, and bowed his head a moment, his lips moving.

"Jokki," he said, "you are right. You die more peaceful than I, for I have never felt so strongly how much my life has been in disaccord with Christ's teachings."

The carriage which was to take the two men to their death was now waiting. Outside swarmed the crowd—that hideous crowd, always alike at such times—merchants out of work, seedy adventurers who had flocked out to the far east on the lookout for an odd job.

The two Japanese went to their doom as impassive as ever. Only the colonel, one could see, was a prey to painful thoughts. Both lighted their cigarettes, and asked not to be tied to the posts.

The commandant took a couple of handkerchiefs from his pocket and handed them to the prisoners. Jokoka himself bound his eyes, but Jokki refused disdainfully to do so, declaring he wished to watch the operations.

Twelve soldiers were posted in front of the colonel, another twelve in front of the captain.

"If you have any pity on these unfortunate men," said the commandant to his soldiers, "aim at their hearts. Death will be instantaneous."

Jokoka fell to the left. Jokki, without having twitched his eyelids, fell forward.

Both were riddled with bullets. Our good soldiers had taken pity on them.

SCENES OF FIRST LOVE

Frances Joseph Retires to Where He Wooed Elizabeth.

Vienna, Aug. 3. — The aged Emperor has gone into retreat at his villa at Ischl, in Upper Austria. It is announced that he will remain there for some time, and it is generally understood that the old and grief-worn monarch has retired to the pretty health resort for the touching and romantic purpose of living over the days of his early love.

It was to Ischl that Francis Joseph came when in his first youth to woo as his bride his cousin, Helen of Bavaria. All the world knows how he say by chance the younger sister Elizabeth, a lovely vision, her arms full of the wild flowers gathered during her solitary ramble in the woods. For "little Elizabeth" was as yet but a child; and her mother and the court ladies were all so busy fussing over Helen that they had no thoughts to spare for the girl who was supposed to be doing her lessons in the schoolroom.

Coming into the villa garden, the girl met the Emperor face to face. He was just twenty-one, tall and handsome, and—the Emperor! No wonder the child stood there as if bewitched, while he gathered up the flowers that had fallen from her hands. No wonder she lingered on the terrace until her mother, wondering where her imperial guest had betaken himself, found the pair still leaning by the garden gate.

The scandalized Princess said something about preparing for the gala dance, which was to take place that evening. "May I, then, secure my partner?" the Emperor said, taking Elizabeth's hand in his own. "But she is a child—a child," remonstrated the bewildered princess, "and it is Helen" ——. But the Emperor was firm. It is Elizabeth or no one," he said. "If she will accept me, I am hers from this instant. If she refuses me, I ride away tomorrow, and there will be no question of a wedding for me."

No one then foresaw the horrors of tragedy that the future held for those young lovers—the bitter tears, the shadows of misery, and of violent death. All was then as fair as the wild roses Elizabeth had gathered in the Ischl woods.

And now the Emperor comes again to Ischl, a lonely, white-haired man. His only son and his beautiful wife rest in their blood-stained graves; and all that is left to his solitary heart is the memory of the bright days long, long ago, when he wooed and won the woman he adored. It is no wonder he leads a lonely life at Ischl. Even his daughters and his grandchildren never intrude upon him there.
