MY HEART AND MY HUSBAND
ADELE GARRISON'S NEW PHASE OF REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Way Mrs. Durkee "Made Up" to Leila Fairfax.

"Oh! I know I'm a perfect fool, but I can't help it—I can't!"

Little Mrs. Durkee's voice rose in a wail strongly tinged with hysteria. In the shelter of the rose hedge secure from observation Lillian gripped my arm significantly. I knew that she was waiting as tensely as I for Mother Graham's reply, wondering what her attitude would be toward Mrs. Durkee's unreasoning disapproval of her son's betrothal to Leila Fairfax.

"You are all of that," My mother-in-law's voice was as grimly disregardful of giving offence as is generally characteristic of her. "And it is all nonsense to say that you cannot help it. Sit down on that bench and get yourself together while I tell you something."

Lillian and I exchanged hopeful, amused glances. Evidently Mother Graham was "strictly on the job," as Dicky would say.

Wonderful Words.

"Oh!" Mrs. Durkee's childish voice held vast astonishment and more than a little resentful chagrin. We heard her flounce down on the seat with an angry rustling of silken draperies, very much as a bantam hen would ruffle her feathers at something which displeased her.

"Of course, I might have known that you would be against me too," she said petulantly, and I knew just how her extremely pretty lips were pouting. Mrs. Durkee is one of the rarely fortunate women who preserve a certain youthful beauty far into late middle age and—who are fully aware of their good fortune.

"And I must confess that I didn't expect it of you either," she went on, "after what you said on the way out here, about knowing all about it."

"Don't be an anointed idiot just because you know how, and can do it!" my mother-in-law rejoined tartly, and I grinned joyously at Lillian, as I recognized the phrase Mother Graham so often used in talking to Dicky and me. "Of course I know all about it, and that's exactly the reason why I'm trying to prevent you from making the same mistake I did, although if you must have the truth, I never humiliated my son in the public way that you did yours this afternoon. But I objected so strongly to Richard's marrying Margaret that I said things which I am afraid Richard will never forget. He has never seemed quite so near to me since. And now, when I have learned that Margaret is exactly the wife for Richard, I would give a good deal to unsay the things I uttered at the time of their marriage."

"Exactly the wife for Richard," For a moment while the wonderful words poured over my consciousness, I forgot our errand, everything save the blessed fact that a wound, long hidden yet none the less painful, had been suddenly healed. I had long known that my mother-in-law under all her grimness had a very sincere affection for me. But that she approved of me, was fully contented with Dicky's choice, was news most grateful to me.

A Swift Retreat.

"You ought to know, having once had a mother-in-law yourself," went on my mother-in-law with relentless logic, "that the wife, if she be even ordinarily lovable, always has the inside track."

"You can just bet I do," replied little Mrs. Durkee. "I had the most cantankerous old dame you ever set your eyes on, but I managed it so that she never succeeded in interfering between my husband and me, although she tried it often enough, goodness knows. But I had my own way in everything."

"And Leila Fairfax will do the same thing, you mark my word," retorted my mother-in-law. "Alfred will simply eat out of her hand. So if you don't want her—and incidentally your son—to regard you as a 'cantankerous old dame,' I would advise you——"

"Oh!" Mrs. Durkee capitulated swiftly, entirely, at the dismal picture my mother-in-law had deftly painted. 'I hadn't thought of it that way. Do you suppose Alf will forgive me"

"Beat it, quick!" Lillian whispered in my ear, and noiselessly, swiftly, we skimmed back over the grassy path, entered the house breathlessly and then hugged each other ecstatically.

"You'll find Alf and Leila in the library," Lillian said a second later. "Better tip them off and get them back into the dining-room, so everything will be as it was when Mrs. Durkee flew the coop."

I obeyed her, and when Mother Graham and Mrs. Durkee—the latter flushed and "teary round the lashes"—appeared in the doorway, we were all chatting busily.

The men of course sprang to their feet, but Alfred Durkee did not go to meet his mother. Instead he stood rather grimly watching until she, with but a single appealing glance at him, went straight to Leila Fairfax and put her arms around the girl's slender figure.

"My dear," she said with the charming lovableness which always endears little Mrs. Durkee's friends to her, "please believe that I love you and am very pleased at Alfred's choice. And—some day—you'll know in your own heart just why I was so hateful just now, and that you had nothing to do with it."

Leila's answer was smothered in the big bear hug with which Alfred Durkee enveloped them both, and in which I knew all bitterness against his mother had been swallowed up.

I have never known more restful days than those of the summer months following Junior's birthday fete, which ended so auspiciously for the happiness of Alfred Durkee and Leila Fairfax.

Only the closing of school disturbed the placid monotony of the days, and that held no unexpected element, was simply a matter of tiresome routine which Alice Holcombe and I managed to dispose of without friction or outspoken criticism from the school board.

With Lillian and her small daughter domiciled at Mrs. Durkee's next door, I resolutely put from my mind all fear of any unpleasantness for me which might ensue from the campaign against Kenneth Stockbridge by his dead wife's relatives, a campaign of which I strongly suspected the sinister appearing man who had called upon me to be a part. Lillian is always like a solid rock of reassurance to me. I felt childishly that nothing could happen while she was my next door neighbor.

Only one thing clouded the utter indolent contentment in which I spent the first few weeks of my vacation, and that was my knowledge of the intense suffering which Alice Holcombe was undergoing because of the continued incarceration in the county jail of Kenneth Stockbridge, charged with having murdered his wife. But as the days wore on I found myself with an inward protest at my own selfishness, adopting the view of the matter which Lillian and Dicky kept forcing on me.

"Look here, lady," Lillian said one day shortly after school closed when I was expressing my sympathy for Alice, "if you don't quit trying to carry the weight of the world on your shoulders we're going to walk slow behind you pretty soon with nice little wreaths in our hands."

A Lazy Program.

"Why! Why!" I stammered. "I'm perfectly all right!"

"Yes you are," she scoffed. "You're about as near a nervous breakdown as anybody I ever saw. I wouldn't tell you this only somebody's got to make you take care of yourself, and I fancy I'm the goat. Remember, child, you've been under a pretty stiff strain for a long time, since before Dicky joined the aviation corps. And the melodrama at Bayview hasn't helped things along any."

"Well
