SCENE THE FIRST.

IN THE BANKING HOUSE.

CHAPTER VIII.

AN UNWARRANTABLE DIGRESSION AND A WARRANTABLE EXPLANATION.

The persons who play their parts in this story are but little, if at all, removed from the common run of men and women. Of wonderful characters the world has but few; you can count them upon your fingers, and the chances are that, if you met one of these rare birds in society, and conversed with him, you would be woefully disappointed. Very seldom is it that pearls are distilled from the tongue—such pearls, at least, as you would be on the look-out for from the tongue of such a man. That man is happy indeed who lives through his life without having his ideals shattered; and be assured, if that man breathes, he lives not in a crowded city.

The passions and emotions which animate the characters in this story, and direct their words and actions, are also of the common order, therefore it is unlikely that you will have the pleasure of reading in these pages any records of amazing adventures or hair-breadth escapes. Here and there a surprise may occur or an unexpected turn may be given to the incidents, but of these the author can not claim to be the inventor; they are but the natural outcome of the ordinary passions and emotions referred to, which in their workings are surely sufficient for any literary craftsman. There is no need even in a story of City life, such as this is, to encroach upon the land of romance. The chess-board of the commonest lives presents strange and startling variations, and the old stories are being played over and over again, every day in the year—with constantly new effect, because the actors in them are new. Romance glows in courts and narrow streets, and those who gaze from a superior stand-point upon the common scenes from which they are removed, see not the mediate lights and shades which make up the sum of the lives of the dwellers therein. A strong light and a deep shadow they have the power to discern, and these, presented in an airy, attractive fashion, are alluring to a mass of readers who do not desire their authors to be too much in earnest. To them, earnestness, apart from the serious occupation of life—to wit, the making of money—is a bugbear; and business out of business hours avoid it as, if they had the power, they would avoid a nightmare. We require our dramatists and writers of fiction to amuse us, they say; we do not wish to be bored with an over-abundance of earnestness. They may be simple, if they please; they may tickle us with a mystery; but they must not make our heads ache with their earnestness. We have enough of that in our offices; we want sedatives in our leisure.

Notwithstanding which remonstrances, they are sometimes deluded into swallowing sugar-coated pills.

And it is to be noted that many stories, simple in their construction, are found to contain tragic elements. Simplicity, I know, is out of vogue, and yet how often do we, who for the most part live artificial lives, and poison life's best and brightest leaves with fashion's follies—how often do we tired-out men and women sigh for that simplicity which we turn so religiously from our doors! There, we say, when we are wearied with tasteless hours, there is true happiness unalloyed. With few cares, that one from the country, with the roses in her cheeks, with sunlight dancing in her eyes, tastes the sweetest sweets of life, and enjoys them. They pall not on her tongue; daisies and sweet-smelling flowers are strewn among her days, and she gathers joy and gladness from them.

For it is always in the country, and from the country, that simplicity is said to live and spring. I myself have grown to believe that in crowded cities, where we knock each other down as we hurry along, where we push and squeeze with merciless disregard of our neighbor's ribs, there is no room for simplicity, and that only in the country does it find a dwelling-place.

How often have we heard that God made the country, and man made the town! In plays, the country maiden is brought to the fevered city, and the sweet modest primrose is invariable transformed into the gaudy, flaunting sunflower. Before you were thought of, this view of simplicity was preached and believed in. Being in a variable mood, I should begin to waver in my belief if I were to ask myself if this view is true; for the subject is many-sided, and presents different aspects from different points of view. In this age of selfishness and action, the mental [illegible] base uses, prostrated, [illegible] you believe that this same thing is false. I am working for such and such an end, therefore I see clearly that is white; you are working for such and such an end, therefore you see clearly that it is black. This man is high-minded, noble, virtuous, I say; he is mean-souled, base, vicious, you say. What you hold to be sacred, I despise; what I admire, you condemn. And in the main our judgments are influenced, not by calm consideration, but by the circumstances which surround our selfish aims, and the positions in which we are placed.

Which induces me to remark that, although this is a pure digression from the story, it yet can be made to apply; for numbers of persons would hold Frederick Chappell in high regard and esteem for the very qualities which render him objectionable to Mr. Armstrong and Richard Barton.

Life is so full of astonishing contrasts—wedded in many instances—that you can evolve from it nothing more startling than the wildest imagination can invent.

And it is suggested to me that in a certain newspaper of yesterday's date, I read of a deed perpetrated in a quiet, happy-looking, little village which turned my blood cold. This modest little village, embosomed in green hills, far away from the hot breath of cities, is just the place where, according to popular belief, simplicity should have its home; yet the worst passions have found their worst development there, and the place is poisoned by more than one foul deed.

Again: it was but the other night that I was walking home after a happy interview. It was a cold night, and the snow was falling, but my blood was in a glow. I had occasion to pass a quaint old church, standing by an ancient cemetery—strangely out of place in the locality in which it was situated—and attracted by its beauty and peacefulness, which seemed to be in harmony with my condition, I lingered there, and walked around it twice or thrice, indulging in happy thought. The next day I heard that a poor outcast woman had been found in this churchyard, lying dead in the snow and that she must have died within a few minutes of the time I had lingered there so happily.

One thought suggests another, and, like dogs in the leash, they are comrades following the same trail. I remember meeting one whom I knew and liked with a fair liking. An old man was he, with ruddy face, merry tongue, always blithe and joyous, with a cheery laugh, and a strong and sympathizing friendship in his horny fingers. For years I knew him, and went regularly into the country, where he had lived since his boyhood, to see him and those he had gathered about him. "Dear, simple old man!" I thought, as I gazed upon his white hair, and venerable, honest face; 'you at least have had the talisman with you all your days; you at least have enjoyed through all your seasons the happiness which comes from simplicity of habits and character.'

He died when he was seventy-eight years of age, and among his papers I, who was privileged to search, found letters with which this man's life was inwoven, so terrible in their revelations, so overwhelmingly shocking, that all my admiration was turned to horror. If the seal secrecy were not upon my tongue, I could a tale unfold respecting this simple, honest, ever-blithe and cheery old man, in the light of which the most startling and unreal I have ever read would pale to insignificance.

Senator Simpson's Denial.

Senator Simpson has telegraphed to the Ottawa Free Press that "he never spent a dollar in his life to purchase or secure a vote of a member or an elector on behalf of himself or any other party." There are many in this riding will say, "Tell that to the marine's." Who sent the $2,000 to Clarke at the time of the Blake-Milne election? and who is it that still holds the claim of $800 for money spent at that time? were we allowed so wide a scope as to prove that Mr. Simpson had been guilty of corruption we should have no trouble in fastening abundance of it upon him. Indeed we are compelled to look upon him as one of the most corrupt men in Canada; but our charge at this time is that he bought up members of the Commons to defeat Sir John Macdonald's Government at the time of the crisis in 1873, and we are not going to let side issues or general statements draw attention from this one fact.

Mr. Simpson's denial, although not specially directed to our charges, is evidently intended to apply to them. Suppose his denial to be the truth, now about his boasting of having bought up these men? Mr. Simpson cannot deny the boasting. But we forget his memory is very short. He once forgot that he ever received the "big push" letter. So we will ask him if he remembers ever having said "D——n them, they had no consciences; I had to pay off a $20,000 mortgage for one of them before he would promise to vote against John A.?" Poor Simpson. It is safe to conclude that had he been innocent he would have put it into a lawyer's hand to attend to our case, and the telegraph to Ottawa would have read something like the following:—"Mr. Simpson has instructed his lawyer to take legal steps against the editor of the West Durham News." But no, a simple denial is all the reply. Will the country accept of this as sufficient? We think not, especially with so many things before them to corroborate our charges! Why is such a favour shown to the Ontario Bank by the Government, and why was Mr. Simpson capable of making such a certain prophecy of this, in his famous circular in South Ontario? Why did Mr. Simpson write a nice little letter to the Finance Minister, almost as soon as the present Government took office? Why, when certain charges were made against Mr. Simpson did he send to know of the Government whether he should answer those charges or not, and why did the Government reply, "Certainly not?" Why did Mr. Simpson's Bank get the post office account about six weeks after this Government took office? Why have new and doubtful columns been introduced into the bank returns, where hundreds of thousands are represented; but which even directors would have no power to ascertain the friendship! Mr. Simpson bought the present Government into power, and if we are ever allowed to show up the whole case, either before a court or a commission, we shall show that his helping them did not quit with simply helping them into office.

Should Mr. Simpson decide to settle these charges in a court of law, we may look for a very interesting trial; but we have little hopes that he will do this; nor will the Government allow us a commission to investigate these things. We confidently expect to see the House dissolved at the meeting of next session on some pretext or other, and thus a charge against them prevented. It will be the simplest way to get out of the difficulty, and some of the rabidest Grits would hold them innocent.

As we have already said, the end of our charges is not yet, and what we have made has been made with due deliberation and the press need not fear to comment freely upon them. We have plenty of evidence ready to hand, that Mr. Simpson has boasted of having bought up those members, and behind and beyond this we have plenty that the members were so bought up by him and others whose names will, doubtless, appear in good time. By-and-bye the country will know why—after two months in which it was not intended to dissolve the House—Mr. Mackenzie all at once went to the country.
