Rebuked by the King.

Three Good Stories That Show What His Majesty is Made Of.

King George is a king who speaks his mind. Fond of a joke, good humoured, generous to his friends, he none the less never permits a dereliction of duty to pass unrebuked, and nobody has ventured to take the liberty with him without receiving a well-deserved snub, which has rendered the repition of the offence extremely unlikely.

Only a short time ago he boldly destroyed a disgraceful story, that had been circulated for years, concerning him, by criminally prosecuting one of its authors. In 1890, at Montreal, he adopted a similiar course.

The New York papers had published a telegram from their Montreal correspondent describing a riotous scene in which it was alleged the Prince had taken part.

He had been walking in the town with two companions, so the report ran, when his party was set upon by six ruffians with the demand for money, Prince George was said to have knocked down three of them, and then to have been arrested, and locked up in the police-station.

This amazing story was, of course, telegraphed over to England, and was given full publicity in the Times. The Prince at once took steps, not only to clear his name, but also to punish the author of the report, whom he regarded as a danger to society.

King George has also very strong views on the question of loyalty. Not many weeks ago, in a public-house in Cambridge, a man was indulging in cheap, treasonable gibes at the Sovereign. Another man present told him to hold his tongue, and for his loyal interference was knocked down and somewhat severely maltreated.

The incident became public through his assailant being sentenced by the magistrate for assault, and as soon as the King heard of it he wrote to his plucky loyal subject thanking him for defending the good name of his Sovereign.

But the King's rebukes are not always stern, as the following shows.

His attention, while he was in command of the Thrush, had been called to a young bluejacket on board another vessel who was always in hot water.

Something in the man's demeanour struck the King. He secured his removal to his own ship, and had him brought up before him on the quarter deck. There he spoke to him severely, but finished up by telling him that he was going to have a clean sheet. At the same time he put a sovereign in the man's hands, as his pay had been stopped, and told him that he trusted him.

After that the man became one of the best sailors in the Royal Navy.

The Kaiser and the German Navy

Hamburg, Aug. 28. — The Senate gave a banquet last night to the Emperor who in the course of a speech on the stimulating effect of competition on international commerce said: "If I understand the enthusiasm of the people of Hamburg aright, I think I may assume that it is the opinion that our navy should be further strengthened that we may be sure that no one can dispute with us the place in the sun that is our due."
