Alligator Steak.

A recent letter from Jacksonville, Fla., contains the following: Dropping into a store where Florida curiosities are sold I asked the proprietor about alligators. He had about 100 little fellows from ten to twenty inches long, active and vicious as any one might desire, which he was willing to dispose of at a good round price to those who cared to take them, with the positive certainty that they will live but a very short time after being carried away. He said that alligators were already becoming scarce, and that their extinction now was only a question of time. It was not so much the adults, which were killed by tourists and home people, as it was the destruction of the eggs and the capture of the young. The eggs are taken in large numbers before maturity, blown out and then sold for curiosties. Formerly, he said, you could get all the alligators you wanted in the immediate vicinity of Jacksonville, but every year they had to be looked for further and further in the interior. He said there was a great deal of lying about alligators, and he then went on to tell some alligator stories himself. It was all humbug about the hide of the alligator being so tough; he had frequently blown an alligator's head off with a shotgun.

He warmed up with the recital, pulled out of a drawer a pistol a little longer than his finger, of the most ancient construction, and apparently incapable of sending a ball through pasteboard, and said: "Why, I have killed a twenty-foot alligator with this." He said he was devoted to alligator steaks cut from the tail; that they were whiter and more tender than chickens; that whenever he and his wife wished to particularly honor a guest they served up alligator steaks, and he believed in a very short time the hotels would all have alligator steak regularly on their bill of fare. When aroused or angry alligators give out a musk-like smell and sink in the water of the marshes, where you could not see them. In wading around you were apt to tread on them, as he had done often, but he had found no trouble in jumping off. Once he had fallen astride of an old patriarch, who commenced snapping his jaws and beating with his tail, but he gave one leap and landed at a safe distance. He said it was a great mistake to suppose that alligators have so much strength in their jaws or that their teeth were so terrible. They grow new teeth every year and do not bite very hard. Altogether, according to this Floridian, the alligator is rather a good fellow to meet in a dark night, and it is a pity they are going out of existence.

Kennedy and Hanlan.

PORTLAND, Me., May 24.—John A. Kennedy continues his preparation here and is in the best of health. He takes two rows each day in the harbor and is using a paper boat received from Waters & Sons a short time since. He has not yet shown a trial, and does not know how fast he can row three miles, although the pace he travels at in practice appears to satisfy him. This morning he rowed four miles with a turn, and did some hard work. He was accompanied by O'Connell, the promising young Portland amateur sculler, and Mark Davis, brother of the inventor. Kennedy will leave here for Point of Pines on Saturday. Kennedy expects that his new boat, which is building, will be finished by Saturday and, if it can be rigged in season, he will give it a trial on Sunday. If the odds on Hanlan are $100 to $35, Portland men will wager largely on the result of the race, and if nothing better than $100 to $50 is obtained they will stake their money liberally. Hanlan has so many admirers that these odds are looked for.

NEW YORK, May 24.—The final deposit of $500 each in the Hanlan-Kennedy race, was made this afternoon, and the full stake of $5,000 is now up. If the referee is not agreed upon before Wednesday, the stakeholder will appoint some one to act in that capacity. Mr. George F. Johnson, the backer of Hanlan, offered $5,000 against $4,000 that Hanlan would win. but the bet was declined by the backer of Kennedy.
