THE LONDON SEASON.

Rotten Row in the Morning—A Man of Fashion—A Night in the Season.

LONDON, June 7.

THE LONDON SEASON.

There are people who call London a dull place; who, having really seen little of it, imagine it to be forever shrouded in fog, or so dustily hot that existence becomes a desolation. But London in June, when the parks are garnished with darkest and most luxuriant green, and the sun for once pours down a light at once genial and warm, and everybody is in town, and the fashionable season is in full career, is as rollickingly gay and bustling as any capital in the world. Old Froissart, who said that the English take their pleasures "sadly," never lived to see a Derby Day, and never took a ride on Rotten Row. Now is the time when the West End resounds with horses and carriages from early morning till the small hours, when Oxford and Regent streets, St. James's and Pall Mall, are alive with people of all degrees from dawn "till dewy eve"; when Major Pendennis, a hundred times repeated, ogles young lady riders from club bow windows; when Charles Jeames Yellowplush, in all the glory of buff and calves, is kept on service without intermission the live-long day; when the dowagers have emerged from their country retreats, and have settled themselves in Belgravia and Grosvenor square with their hopeful daughters, ready for another matrimonial campaign; when the theatres are fullest, the clubs busiest with fashionable gossip, the tradespeople most satisfied with themselves and with the world, the opera glasses most brilliant, and the hospitalities of the noble and the rich most lavish and almost despotic. The "gentlemen of the Civil Service," as what we should call "Government clerks" are pleased to call themselves, have little to do but bite their quills and compare their notes of invitation; the M. P.'s whom you meet on Pall Mall look no longer ponderously statesmanlike, but simply long with the contended air of good men who have been struggling with adversity and have conquered it. Royalty is here, at Windsor, at Buckingham Palace, and at Marlborough House; and the young princes and princesses are constantly riding and driving about as if they enjoyed "the season" as much as any one. In short, London, and especially the West End, makes a prolonged gala of the month of June; Vanity Fair is full, and all the stalls are secured; the wave of fashionable gaiety and dissipation is at its highest; the shops are galaw with new wares, and the faces of their keepers glisten with prosperous content; the halls and fetes champetres, the musiques and soirees, the "at-homes" and breakfast parties have commenced; the temples of Fashion are shrine, and her votaries prodigal to intoxication in their worship.

ROTTEN ROW IN THE MORNING.

Rotten Row at 10 o'clock of a June morning is assuredly the pleasantest lounging place in Europe. It is "the thing" to be seen there. If you haven't a steeplechasing and that indispensable auxiliary, a groom, the next best thing you can do is to appear there in fashionable morning dress, lean on the railings, and suck the head of your cane. If you have a long auburn beard you will be all the more Rotten Rowish. What a picture of English society it is! There is the long, smooth reach of the riding road passing along near the railing of the "Park"—they always call Hyde Park "the Park" simply—with its moving panorama of fresh red-and-white beauties, of stately ruffled dowagers, of gallant guardsmen or Captains of grenadiers, of high-stocked antiquated beaux, of grim old lords, riding solitary and stiff-necked; of sleek flunkeys trotting at a respectful distance from "my lady," but haughtily conscious of their ineffable superiority to all the world on foot; of swarthy foreigners and even Indian rajahs, who have fallen delightedly into the fashion of Rotten Row; of Prime Ministers and squires, of bishops and curates, of big old jaded Generals and lisping candles, of maiden ladies of ripe age but inveterately "horsey" habits, and the very flirest of England's daughters in the very jauntiest of riding costumes, trotting along and flirting and laughing, stopping at the railings to chat with hirsute youths, then dashing up the avenue with such capricious speed that the powdered grooms with difficulty keep them in their sight. Rotten Row is the exchange of beauty and fashion; it is a sort of town "Conversation House," like the pump-room at Bath or Tunbridge, or the Bois de Boulogne. Every city has its place of aristocratic morning congregation; here it is Rotten Row. You see not only the cream of England's beauty, the pride of Belgravia's aristocracy, high life manners and fashion, but also the pride of English wealth. The horses on Rotten Row simply beat the world as riding nags; the display of horseflesh is dazzling to the lover of that noble animal. Of late the Princesses and their daughters have invented a quite peculiar preserve of the saddle and gentry; there is no stronger indication of the approach of England to democratic institutions than to see, on Rotten Row, the daughter of an Earl "who cannot hob with the Commoners," followed by the daughter of a manufacturer whose family established wigs. Not less curious than the mounted show is the exhibition of humanity on foot, or in chairs. For a penny you can hire a chair of an old woman, and sit leisurely close by the Row as long as the fancy holds you. The common people are the audience, the aristocracy the actors in this pretty morning social comedy.

A MAN OF FASHION.

I have a friend—though I do not boast of him—who is a simon pure—man of fashion. He is the second son of a lord, and has an income of five thousand pounds a year. Of course he is not so ungentlemanly as to engage in any occupation; I fear the old Baron, his father, would make short work of his five thousand if he dared to hint a purpose of going "into trade." And what does he do? He seems to be the most enviable of men, for I never saw man more perfectly contented with everybody, himself included. As his career is a type of fast high London society in general, I will sketch it for you; in his person he represents, more perfectly and exhaustively than any one I know, the spirit of aristocratic London in the season. He rises in his room at the Albany at half past eight, and breakfasts at the Junior Carlton, close by; skims the Times and chats with his boon companions till ten o'clock. Promptly with that hour his groom appears with the sleekest of chestnuts, which he mounts and makes for Rotten Row. There he flirts, hears the the latest gossip, books a wager for the Derby, and takes an hour's brisk canter From the Park he goes to lunch—not to the Junior Carlton, but to some West End house; likely enough, he drops in to lunch with Lady Blanche, and then goes to lunch a second time with Lady Amelia—that is, lounges at lunch time into perhaps half a dozen houses, where he takes a nibble at the delicacies and has a refreshing chat. The afternoon is full of engagements; it is a fete champaire at Richmond or Putney, a match of cricket at Lord's, a race on the Thames, a royal breakfast party in the gardens of Buckingham Palace or Windsor, a crack game of billiards at the club, a meet of the hounds in Middlesex, a drive into Kent or Surrey, an hour at the Exhibition, a pleasant little party to the Academy, or, a whitebait dinner at Greenwich. In the evening his brain is in a perfect muddle what, among so many things, to do. There is Patti as Desdemona at Covent Garden, and there is the bewitching Ilma di Murska as Margaret of Valois at Drury Lane; there is Dumas's "Diane de Lys" at the Princess's, and "The Wandering Jew" at the Adelphi. But Lady Tompkins is going to give an "at-home," and the Countess of Cranberry's ball must not be neglected; there is a musical soiree at Sir Titus Titcb, and the mosque at Banbury House; Cremorne, with its lanterns and song and free and easy frolic, is tempting, and not less so Tom Hopkins's bachelor "punch." So our man of fashion, whom practice has made subtly perfect, dresses himself ingeniously with a view to a variety of projects. He drops for a while into his box at Covent Garden; and makes a tour of the boxes of his acquaintances. Here he sees no more than any plebeian may see for half a crown; who, from his perch in the "amphitheatre," may gaze down upon the most dazzling array of dress, jewels, fashion and rank in Europe. Covent Garden on a night in the mid-season is wonderful; everybody is as resplendent as he or she can devise; everybody enjoys himself; and the theatre is a salon as well as a theatre, where society goes to make itself heard and seen as well as to listen and behold.

A NIGHT IN THE SEASON.

With a brilliant, noisy, clattering London it is, one of these limpid June nights! There is something infectious in the gay sounds and sights of which the stately quarters west of the parks are full. Every other house is alight from top to bottom; the roll of equipages is ceaseless; the burly, curly-wigged, scarlet-coated, cockaded coachmen are everywhere; the escutcheons on the coach doors glitter in the gaslight; little covered ways from the doors of lofty mansions to the curbstones, with carpets laid beneath obstruct your way at every other step; and as you pass, cloudlike forms pop out of the carriages, whisk by in a twinkling, and hurry along in over the carpeted pathway; not so quickly, however, but that you are dazzled by a glitter of jewels and a shimmer of silk. Within, there is a subdued hubbub of conversation, or perhaps the rumble of a waltz; all round about is bustle and rattling; and you ask yourself if these are really the melancholy folk which the blithe old French chronicler of the fourteenth century so lugubriously describes. My fashionable friend, who seldom goes to bed, in the season, until he has made his appearance in half a dozen West End drawing rooms, clearly enjoys it all, and comes out next morning as only an Englishman can—as fresh and red-cheeked as if he had just come off a Devonshire farm.

Agent for the celebrated

Dunn Edge Tool Co's SCYTHES.

None genuine without Waterville Dunn Edge Tool Co. stamped in red letters on the side of each Scythe.

Also, Agent for "OSHAWA" MOWING MACHINES and the celebrated RICHARDSON MACHINES. There are no genuine Richardson Machines sold in St. John except by the Subscriber.

We have in stock five different kinds of Mowers, and intending purchasers would do well by giving us a call before buying elsewhere
