A DEAD MAN'S HAIR.

"You know her, then?"

"Yes, I met her last year at Monaco."

"What was she called, do you remember?"

"Let me see, her christian name was Violet. She was one of the women who are seldom called by a surname. The Lady Violet was the name that was in everybody's mouth, or Violet, tout court. Stay, I remember seeing her name once in the hotel book—Lady Violet Montargis, a peculiar name, which struck me for some reason or other at the time."

Ah, she was rather an adept at coining names. When I knew her she was the Hon. Frances Dalrymple—a girl with dark hair and light blue eyes; one of those rare combinations which are downright unnatural, and which often betoken some internal derangement of system, whether moral, intellectual, or physical. A beautiful girl, but with that steely look which you see sometimes on the surface of the Thames, blue steel mixed with water lilies. Keeley Halswelle knows how to draw the effect, as you can see in this year's Grosvenor. It always appears to me to convey a moral; the water lilies tempt you, and the cold, insidious water drowns you; therefore, beware of the lilies. If poor old Philip Drummond had only taken that moral to heart!"

"Philip Drummond! who was he?"

"Have I never told you? Well, I will give you my experience of the Hon. Frances Dalrymple, and then you shall give me yours of the Lady Violet Montargis. It was in a country house in the north in September. Our numbers were tolerably large, but an omnium gatherum lot, and very ill-sorted. You know the sort of household I mean, where there is no presiding hostess and everything all a tort et a travers. There was, indeed, a Mrs. Lionel Trotman, who was the lawful wife of our host, Lionel Trotman, Esq., retired sugar-boiler, or something of the kind; but she had the talent of self-effacement to a degree that was positively painful. Nobody knew where she was at any moment of the day, and I assure you that it was a work of herculean difficulty to discover her whereabouts in her own drawing room, before saying good night. The consequence was that we did what was right in our own eyes in wicked and selfish couples, such as a disintegrated household will relapse into when the presiding and prudential hand is withdrawn. Of these couples the most devoted, and perhaps the most interesting, was the Hon. Miss Frances and Philip Drummond.

"Drummond was a brawny, muscular hero, a fine fellow, unhampered by excessive brain, a keen sportsman and a good friend. She was—well, what I daresay you discovered at Monaco. Only you must remember that at the time of which I am speaking she had not developed those predatory instincts which I am told she afterward acquired so perniciously for her friends. She seemed a soft, lovable woman, with lustrous eyes and speaking hands. As a matter of fact, her hands spoke more than her tongue—it is the way with some incurably histrionic women.

"One day I was not out with the rest of the shooting party, owing to a press of business letters or a fit of laziness, I forget which. But I pottered out in the afternoon over the turnips a short way from the house. I was at the hall door on my return when two men brought home a ghastly burden. It was poor Philip Drummond, who had shot himself no one knew exactly how, in getting over a hedge or making his way through some tangled covert. I helped the men to bring his poor rigid limbs into the house, wondering to myself how I could best break the news to the undiscoverable Mrs. Trotman, or, harder still, to the reserved and somewhat haughty Miss Dalrymple. We had not got far into the house when she met us at the head of the stairs. There was no explosion of grief such as I feared; only a sudden tightening of the corners of the mouth and a blanched look either of superstitious dread or hardly realized sorrow. She looked for an instant on the corpse, asked the single question, 'He shot himself, of course?' and then swiftly withdrew.

"That evening, as I was going to bed, I met her again in the corridor. 'I was waiting for you,' she said; and then she began to beg me, by all that I held most precious, to let her see the dead body. The request struck me as unnatural, I remember, and somewhat heartless. Although I could not have formulated my objections in words, I felt that she was asking what jarred on my own feelings, and did not suit the circumstances of the case. At the same time I knew that the relations in which they stood to each other prevented me for refusing. 'I loved him so,' she said, with an air of passionate abandon, 'and I must see him for the last time; you can come too, if you like.' I led her to the threshold of the death-chamber, threw open the door for her, but did not enter. 'You will leave the door open, please,' was all that she spoke.

"Impelled by an irresistible curiosity I stood at the doorway and watched her. The room was only illuminated by a candle, which she carried in her hand. Dark shadows surrounded the bed on which was stretched the sheeted form of the man whom I had known as Philip Drummond. The rigid outlines of his body stood out beneath the merciful white covering which the hands of loving care had placed over his death-distorted features. All the rest of the room was black with the darkness of the night, only the ghastly light of the single candle, shaded by her hand, bathed in flickering white gleams the body of the man who had gained eternal sleep. I saw her kneel by the bedside; I saw her lift the linen from his face with deliberate hand; then, after gazing long and earnestly at the face of her lover she drew a penknife from her pocket, and with a quick movement punctured the vein at the side of his temple 'Peste,' she said: 'I forgot that dead men do not bleed.' Then, changing her resolve, she cut a lock of brown hair from his forehead and swiftly passed me as I stood at the door. 'Good-night,' she whispered, as the faint echoes of her footsteps rang down the corridor.

"The whole party broke up the next day, and we, one and all, departed to different points of the compass. I do not suppose that any one but myself knew of the scene I have tried to describe, but on me it left an ineffaceable impression. It was, perhaps, natural that she should wish to see him, but her strange action and her abrupt, swift movements utterly dissipated the idea of a touching farewell. Did she really love him or not? Was the situation, of which I was an unwilling witness, the last act in a heart's tragedy? Perhaps you can tell me?"

"Well, I can give you my experience, and then you can judge for yourself. As I told you, I met her under another name at Monaco. You remember that a merciful dispensation of Providence secured me in the nick of time the accumulated life-treasure of an affectionate aunt. I was abroad at the time when I heard the news of my good fortune; and I owed neither regret nor perhaps even respect to my defunct relative. I was not deterred by any feelings of compunction from enjoying myself. At Monaco I met the Lady Violet Montargis—a real celebrity as I learnt, who was not unknown in Paris or Vienna, or even Buda-Pesth. There had been an unusual run on the bank, and everyone was watching her game and staking on her luck. The first time I saw her she was only just beginning her career of triumph. I followed her, more out of gallantry than out of any determined gambler's resolve. Afterwards, I had sufficient instinct in these matters to know that I was in the presence of one of those who, for the moment, cannot even by accident go wrong. It was really wonderful to see her at the tables; a few strangers and new-comers, who did not know how the cards lay, played their usual cautious game and lost; the older hands kept aloof as they always do when some diabolic influence is in the air. After a few days friend introduced me to her, and I got to know her pretty well. Anywhere else except at the tables she was positively charming, insouciante, debonnaire, full of polished allurements and insidious beauty. Immersed in the game, she was a devil; no other word could describe her.

"One night there was a strange inversion of things, a positive debacle. Lady Violet Montargis was losing heavily, and leading her followers to incurable ruin. She came hurriedly to me, and in a low whisper spoke these remarkable words: 'For the love of heaven go to my rooms and ask my maid for my ring; she will know which one I mean; you see I have not my usual rings on my fingers.' She spoke nervously and rapidly, with a face out of which had departed all the triumphant calm, giving place to a low, contracted look of inscrutable cunning. I performed her commission for her, and then ventured to ask her the reason. I knew that all gamblers are superstitious, but I was hardly prepared for her reply.

"'Sang de Dieu,' she said, could you not guess that that ring contained a suicide's hair?'"

Marriage for Sixpence.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

The future, Professors Seeley remind us, is all with the large states, and some enterprising people in Berlin have just devised a patriotic scheme for "increasing the German race." A "marriage chamber" has been instituted to "facilitate acquaintance between persons of both sexes with a view to wedlock," and "without regard to position, fortune, age or faith." If the acquaintance leads to marriage, both parties have to engage to pay to the chamber 1 per cent. of their annual income. "Parties will do well," the circular adds, "to examine seriously if they possess those qualities that make marriage desirable." The fee demanded by the chamber is strictly moderate—6d. for Berlinese and 9s. for provincials; and if the first acquaintance leads to no result, clients may try again without extra charge. Decidedly, the Germans are a practical people.

Down in Dixie.

—The wife of Mr. J. Kennedy, dealer in drugs in Dixie, was cured of a chronic cough by Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. The best throat and lung healer known. 2-4-6

Professional Ties.

From the Weatherford (Tex.) Times.

Miss Rose Eytinge says: "Journalism and the theatrical profession are united by some very tender ties." One of which, most fragrant Rose, is adver-tise. There's nothing like it.

—To lessen mortality and stop the inroads of disease, use Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure. For all diseases arising from impure blood, such as pimples, blotches, biliousness, indigestion, etc., etc., it has no equal. Mrs. Thomas Smith, Elm, writes: "I am using this medicine for dyspepsia. I have tried many remedies, but this is the only one that has done me any good."

It must not be inferred that those politicians who eat crow are mourning for the "Lost Caws."

—Mrs. George Simpson, Toronto, says: "I have suffered severely with corns, and was unable to get relief from treatment of any kind until I was recommended to try Holloway's Corn Cure. After applying it for a few days I was enabled to remove the corn, root and branch—no pain whatever, and no inconvenience in using it. I can heartily recommend it to all suffering from corns."

The young man who wrote to his offended girl, asking her to send him "a line" informing him what she would like him to do, was surprised to receive by return mail a clothes-line with a noose at one end of it.

—One trial of Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator will convince you that it has no equal as a worm medicine. Buy a bottle and see if it does not please you.

About the Size of It.

From the Yonkers Gazette.

"Well, you may say what you will, Mr. Crimsonbeak," said that gentleman's wife, the other morning, while they were indulging in a ninety-eight-in-the-shade discussion regarding their own respective virtues; "I never do anything by halves!"

"No, indeed you do not," replied the heartless wretch; "you never half do anything."

Unknown to Science.

—That preparation is undiscovered which can surpass Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry as a cure for cholera morbus, dysentery and summer complaints. 2-4-6

A Naval Engagement.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

In the midst of the engagement, when the air was lurid with screaming shot and bursting shell the admiral, on board the American flag ship Invincible, heard a crash on the port bow and felt at the same time a slight shock. He called to the quartermaster:

"Was that the British ram that struck us?"

The quartermaster saluted:

"No, sir," he said, "it was a Jersey clam boat."

"All hands abandon ship," ordered the admiral, with the calmness of despair, for he knew that all was lost. In twenty minutes the Invincible lay safely at the bottom of the sea where the clam boat troubleth no more.

—The true philosophy of medication is not to dose for symptoms, but to root out disease. Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery and Dyspeptic Cure, the great blood purifier, has proved itself equal to this task. It is a most searching without being a violent remedy for constipation, biliousness and indigestion. It is as well adapted to the needs and physical temperaments of delicate females as to the more robust sex, and is a fine preventive of disease as well as remedy for it.

—J. H. Earl, West Shefford, P.Q., writes: "I have been troubled with liver complaint for several years, and have tried different medicines with little or no benefit, until I tried Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil, which gave me immediate relief, and I would say that I have used it since with the best effect. No one should be without it. I have tried it on my horse, in cases of cuts, wounds, etc., and I think it equally as good for horse as for man."
