CHATHAM, N. B., - - JANUARY 1, 1896.

THE TWO INNS.

I was returning from Nimes one afternoon in July. The heat was terrible. As far as the eye could see the white burning road wound its way between gardens of olive trees and dwarf oaks under a great, flat, silver sun which filled all the sky.

There was not a spot of shade, not a breath of air. There was nothing but the vibrating heat and the shrill cry of the grasshoppers—a foolish, deafening music to quick time, which seemed the expression of the great luminous vibration. I had been walking in this open desert two hours when a cluster of white houses rose suddenly out of the dusty road before me.

It is what is called the relay of St. Vincent. There was five or six houses with long low, red roofed barns, an empty watering trough in a clump of straggling fig trees, and at the end of the place stood two large inns looking at each other from opposite sides of the road.

There was something striking about these inns.

One was a large new building, full of life and noise. And the doors were open. The diligence was standing in front, from which they were unhitching the steaming horses. The passengers were climbing down to get a hasty drink in the short shadow thrown by the walls. The court was filled with mules, loaded carts and the drivers lying under the sheds waiting fresh relays.

From the inside could be heard cries, oaths, the pounding of fists on the tables, the exploding corks of lemonade bottles, the clinking of glasses, the noise of billiards, and dominating all this tumult a joyous ringing voice singing in a manner calculated to make the glasses tremble.

The inn opposite, on the contrary, was as silent as if abandoned. Weeds grew about the entrance; the blinds were broken; upon the doors a small branch of withered holly hung like an old plume; the doorsteps were propped up with stones from the road. All was so poor, so pitiful, that it seemed a real charity to stop there for a glass of something.

I entered. There was a long, deserted, mournful room, which the dazzling light from three great curtainless windows made more deserted and mournful still.

Some limping tables, on which were scattered a few dusty glasses; a yellow sofa, an old counter, a broken-down billiard table, slept there in a heavy, deathly heat.

And flies, flies! Never had I seen so many—on the ceiling, in the glasses, in bunches. When I opened the door there was a buzzing and agitation of wings as if I had entered a beehive.

At the end of the room, in a window, a woman stood with her face against the glass, looking intently outside. I called twice:

"Ho, hostess!"

She turned slowly and let me see a poor peasant's face, wrinkled, hollow, of the color of dirt, framed in a scarf of red lace, such as old women wear in villages with us Nevertheless she was not an old woman. Tears had faded her.

"What do you want?" she asked, wiping her eyes.

"I want to sit down a moment and have something to drink."

She looked at me very much astonished, without moving, as if she had not understood.

"This is not an inn, then?"

The woman sighed.

"Yes, it is an inn if yot like—but why have you not gone opposite, like the others? It is much gayer—"

"It is too gay for me. I prefer to stay at your house."

And without waiting her response I seated myself before a table.

When she was very sure I was speaking seriously, she began to go and come with a bustling air, opening drawers, moving bottles, wiping glasses, disturbing the flies—one felt that to wait upon this traveller was an event.

Now and then the unhappy woman would clasp her hands to her head as though despaired of keeping on her feet.

Then she went into an adjoining room. I could hear her there rattling great keys, turning the locks, fumbling in the bread-box, grasping, dusting, washing glasses.

From time to time there was a great sigh a half choked sob.

After a quarter of an hour of housekeeping I had before me a plate of dried grapes, an old loaf of bread, hard as slate, and a bottle of wine.

"You are served," said the strange creature, and she turned quickly to take her place at the window. While drinking I tried to make her talk.

"People do not come here often, do, they, my good woman?"

Oh, no, monsieur. Never any one. When we had the only inn here, it was quite different. We had the stagecoach, game dinners in the wild duck season and teamsters all the year. But since our neighours have come and established themselves we have lost everybody. People would rather go on the opposite side. They find it too dull here. The fact is the house is not pleasant. I am not beautiful. I have had fevers and my little ones are dead. Over there on the contrary, they laugh all the time. It is an Arle'sieune who keeps the inn, a handsome woman who wears lace and three strands of gold chain about her neck. The driver of the diligence is her lover. With that there are several cajoling chambermaids. And then she has a good steady patronage. She has all the young people of Bezonces, of Redessan, of Jonquieres. Teamsters make a detour to pass her door. I—I stay here all day without a customer."

She said this with a preoccupied indifferent voice, continuing to support her forehead against the window glass. There was evidently something in the opposite inn which absorbed her.

All at once there was great excitement on the other side of the road. The diligence moved away in the dust. One could hear the cracks of the whip and the tooting of the postillions horn, the girls standing at the door crying:

"Adiousias! Adousias!" And all over the same formidable voice singing again:

"La belle Margoten."

On hearing this voice the hostess shook from head to foot and turning to me said;

"Do you hear that?" and then quite low; "That is my husband. Dosen't he sing well?"

I looked at her stupified.

"What? Your husband! He goes over there, he too?"

Then with heartbroken, but gentle softness:

"What would you have, monsieur? Men are made like that. They do not like to see crying, and I cry constantly since the death of my little ones. Then it is so sad, this great barracks, where no one ever comes. Then, when he is too bored, my poor Jose goes opposite, and, as he has a fine voice, the Arle'sieune makes him sing. There he is again."—Alphonse Daudet.

French Canadian Jour-de L'an.

A child prostrate before its father asking for his blessing on a New Year's morning. This is a typical custom among the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. The head of the family rises early New Year's morning, renews the fire on the hearth and in the stoves, and, seating himself in an armchair within the shadows of the Yule log, watches the embers and awaits the first of his offspring to ask for the paternal blessing on the glorious "jour de l'an."—Boston Globe.

You Must Not Waste Time.

"Dost thou love life?" asked Benjamin Franklin. "Then do not squander time, for time is the stuff life is made of."

Once when Franklin was in business as a printer and bookseller in Philadelphia a man came into his place and dawdled about, examining the books exposed for sale. At last, having made up his mind as to what he wanted, he enquired the price of the book chosen and the clerk said $1.

"Can't you take less than that?" said the man in feigned surprise. "One dollar is the price," said the clerk.

But the would-be purchaser was not satisfied. "I want to see Mr. Franklin about this," he said. "Mr. Franklin is very busy in the pressroom," said the clerk. "But I must see him," said the man.

"So the clerk called Franklin, and of him the man inquired the the price of the book. "One dollar and a quarter," was the philosopher's reply. "But your clerk offered it to me for $1," protested the man. "True," said Franklin, "and I could better have afforded to have taken $1 than to have left my work at this time."

"Well," said the man, "what is the very best you can do in making a price on this volume?" "One dollar and a half," said Franklin, The man's eyes grew wide. "Why, you said only $1.25 a moment ago." "So I did," said Franklin. "and I could have better afforded to take that sum then than $1.50 now." The man paid the price without any further quarreling. He had learned a lesson that Franklin wished to teach—that time is too valuable to waste.

Read the Bible New Year's Morning

In many a Welsh household the first thing that is done by each member of the family on rising on New Year's morning is to consult the family Bible with a view to learning from it what the coming year has in store for the person seeking the information. This is done by reading the first verse upon which the eye falls, and the verse in question is believed to foretell in some way the good or ill fortune, the happiness or unhappiness, during the just begun new year of the person making the trial.—Exchange.

New Year Bells.

Of all sounds, of all bells, most solemn and touching is the peal which rings out the old year. I never hear it without a gathering up of my mind to a concentration of all the images that have been diffused over the past twelve-months. I begin to knowthe worth of that regretted time, as when a person dies.—Charles Lamb.
