A Transient Experience

"And there's Gladwyn," said the rector. "You remember Gladwyn?"

"Oh, yes, sir," said Gerard.

Then presently came a warm invitation to come and see Mrs. Fleming. Wouldn't he come now? They were going home—had only looked in to leave a parish notice.

"Come, Nella, we're always glad to see you. Come and bring your cousin with you."

They went. Helena, because she could not manufacture an excuse, and Gerard, perhaps because he wanted to go. Short as had been his stay at Longhurst, it had left with him a memory of kindness and home. Mr. Fleming walked with him, asking kindly questions about his profession and his English visit. Mrs. Fleming was at home and received him with real pleasure. She had always a warm corner in her heart for an "old pupil." The black puppy of Longhurst days was displayed as a mature and trustworthy retriever, and Helena and Gerard saw each other as they were in ordinary life. There was a strange excitement about it for them both. Nella defied consciousness and talked and laughed with courage, while something new, unexpected and baffling seemed to be permeating slowly his views of the situation. He was beginning to think that he ought to take leave, and wondering whether English customs made it incumbent on him to see his cousin home through the dusk, or whether it would be incorrect to do so, and whether Miss Wynne would not be valuable, or whether it would not be too embarrassing.

"And would it not be well to consider whether the natural and obvious conclusion would be distasteful?"

"The old solicitor's words sounded in his ears, and then, there was a little movement and a tap at the door, and George Gladwyn stood among them.

He knew, and his approach brought consciousness and embarrassment back upon them both. He and Gerard greeted each other, but he seemed wild and pale, and his eyes looked odd and startling in the firelight.

Gerard cut the knot of the situation by starting up and saying he must hurry for his train. He could not walk away with Helena before George's eyes; but he accepted gratefully the kindly invitation to come again and—he borrowed Helena's book from Fanny.

Helena wished that it had never been written. She was certain that it would convey a wrong sense of her views of the situation.

CHAPTER XIII.

"George," said Fanny, "are you getting on all right? Do you like the school as well as you did at first?"

The rest of the party at the rectory had dispersed. Fanny sat in the firelight with the reigning kitten, a white and fluffy one, reposing on the lap of her soft blue gown. Othello, a name given by George in old days to the black puppy, because he had then been furiously jealous of cats, lay asleep on the rug, his early passions calmed by the weight of years. George himself sat on a low chair, his elbows on his hands, staring into the fire.

"Why do you ask, Fanny?" he said abruptly.

"Well, I thought you looked rather as if you were thinking about something else."

"Do I? Well, one can't escape from the problems of life."

"But it's so much better to keep problems for the holidays," said Fanny, wistfully, "especially when you're beginning new work."

"I was five minutes late for school this afternoon," said George, as if in the confessional.

"Oh, George. That won't do, however clever your lessons are, and however much you may influence the boys, no head master will stand unpunctuality."

"They won't," said George. It sha'n't happen again. Fanny, if one was a genius, or a saint, or a prophet, and were seized upon by an inspiration, mightn't it be worth while to follow the impulses that transcend all other motives? Wouldn't daily life sometimes get split into shivers by the sacred fire?"

"Perhaps," said Fanny, with reserve.

"Did Socrates tell his Damon to wait till the holidays?"

"I don't know," said Fanny, "but I have always understood that Socrates took a great deal of pains with his pupils."

George laughed out.

"Oh, Fanny, there's no getting the better of you. But I'm in earnest, in sober earnest. Prophets are forgiven for overmastering impulses. With them they save the world. But what's a poor beggar to do, who feels the impulses sweeping his soul before them, and yet doubts much whether any heavenly message is borne on their wings?"

"But what do you want so much to do just now?" said Fanny. "Is it a new scheme?"

"No, no," said George. "It's only a great desire, but if it was fulfilled it would be a glorious thing, and I believe I could bring it about."

Fanny drew back a little into the shadow.

"I think you often can bring things about," she said.

"It shan't make me unpunctual, Fanny," said George, with a rueful smile, "you shall scold me as much as you like, and I'll report myself every week. Corners will never be home to me as this house is. Mab and the others are babies. You're the sister that belongs to me."

Fanny lifted up the kitten and buried her face in its fluffy folds.

"Yes, George," she said, "I've kept you in order for a long time, haven't I?"

"You understand," said George, "that one can talk folly without being a fool."

"You've given me some chance of learning that truth," she said demurely, "but my last word is, that inspirations and messages, and Damons, should be kept for the holidays."

"The spirit might evaporate."

"Not if you cork it up tight, and if it's strong enough to begin with," said Fanny.

"Or burst the bottle."

"Wait till the bottle smashes."

"The heavens will fall. Let them fall; they have not fallen yet," quoted George, with a laugh, as he went away.

There was in his own soul a still small voice that told him he ought to stand aside and wait, that Helena should be left with a calm soul and a free heart, while the coil of circumstance was still around her; surely it was not for him, with his passionate, selfish desires, to rouse in her a force that might work misery and ruin.

The more George thought of it, with cool brains, the more he felt that the chances were all in favor of the marriage in Ashdew Church standing steady, and the more certainly he knew that Helena ought to be free from the suspicion of a motive for wishing it to be overturned. If the two cousins were let alone the probabilities were in favor of their finding out that they could put up with each other after all.

Not to interfere at this critical moment, was not only dictated by a generous insight, but considering all the circumstances, was really only proper and obvious.

And yet in George's heart was not only a burning desire for Helena's love, but at conviction that if he chose he could win it.

"I know I can," he said to himself, and if he could, then their mutual love would be a glorious thing, and there lay before them a future which was worthy any risk and effort.

And, playing into his hands, giving him his opportunity, was Miss Wynne's mysterious hint, that for Gerard Norman the disturbing influence had come already.

Again he thought.

"If the fellow wants to be off his bargain, he may be trusted to leave no stone unturned for that end. If he does not, why heed gossip?" Thoughts, as clear as the vision of the Gray Man in his dream, barred George's path, but, oh, how hot and strong was the force of the opposing torrent!

He deferred the battle and put himself into Miss Wynne's way on the next day, which happened to be Sunday, when she was coming away from a 5 o'clock service at the school chapel, which it was fashionable in Whitebury for privileged visitors to attend.

Helena had a class of girls in St. Peter's, but her aunt, in a very becoming costume, "took," as she was wont to say, "the opportunity of really intellectual preaching."

She heard the head master give a practical fifteen minutes, laying before his boys the uses and abuses of athletics, to which, as she told George afterwards, it was "a pleasure to see the dear young faces respond and thrill." George had not observed this result himself, but replied, that "the head was a good sort and understood boys well," and then she saved him all trouble by beginning:

"Oh, Mr. Gladwyn, it is so hard for a woman to judge. When I hear that Gerard has not been true to the vision of dear Helen's youth, what, oh what, does it imply?"

"But may I ask what you did hear?" said George, who was always driven by Miss Wynne to the severest common sense.

MOSQUE OF OMAR

Beautiful Jerusalem Edifice To Be Reproduced in Paris.

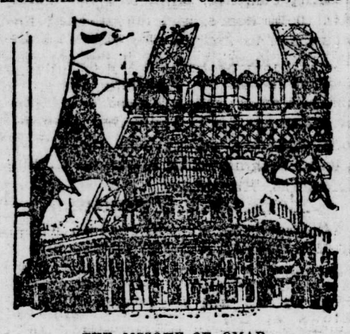
All Its Graceful Architectural Details Are To Be Seen at the World's Exposition at the French Capital in 1900—A Stupendous Task Which Famous Builders Have Set Themselves to Do.

The reproduction of the Mosque of Omar is one of the stupendous tasks which the Paris Exposition builders have set for themselves.

The Mosque of Omar, in Jerusalem, is situated on ancient Mount Moriah, the site of Solomon's and Herod's temple.

A member of the Palestine Exploration Society will superintend the building of the mosque and the Mohammedans will hold worship there daily. Great trouble will be taken to secure extreme accuracy and, as far as possible, the wonderful temple which the Armenians are always threatening to destroy in Jerusalem will be reproduced.

The entire inclosure of the Mosque of Omar in Jerusalem is called by the Mohammedans Haram-esh-shareef, the



THE MOSQUE OF OMAR.

Noble Sanctuary. About the middle of the inclosure is an almost rectangular platform, about 15 feet from the ground.

In the middle of the platform of the original temple stands the main temple, the Mosque of Omar. The building is an octagon in shape and is covered by a light, artistically shaped dome, which is surmounted by a crescent.

Outside the mosque there are several small elegant praying places.

To the south of the platform is the second large temple, or mosque, called El Aksa.

Here are several handsome stained-glass windows, and one especially that has called for the admiration of thousands who have seen it. It is made of small transparent glass mosaics, wrought into exquisitely beautiful flowers and arabesques of variegated colors, harmoniously blending into each other.

This window has another peculiarity of a double set of designs, one set being visible at a certain distance from the window, and on stepping back two or three yards another and entirely different set of designs appears to the view.

It is said that when the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria visited Jerusalem, he offered £2,900 (about $10,000) for this window, but was told that he couldn't get it for a million.

The priceless features, the builders think, can be reproduced cheaply, yet faithfully.

CHILD GROWTH.

Make the Education Accord With It, Not Oppose It.

Growth focuses for a time upon one set of organs or functions, then upon another, until the whole body is developed; but all parts of the body do not grow at one and the same time. The body grows first in length, and then in girth, in breadth and depth of chest, in breadth and height of forehead, in breadth and length of face.

To make a special application of this well-known fact of periodicity in physical growth, let us observe the development of the muscles of the arm. The muscles of the upper arm—those concerned in the functioning of the shoulder joint—are ripe and ready for training at least a year and one-half before the muscles of the fingers. The muscles of the shoulder mature for training six months before the muscles of the elbow, and these in turn five to eight months before the muscles of the wrist, which are ripe and ready for training from three to six months before the muscles of the fingers. When we insist that a child shall begin to write by means of the finger muscles only with a small pencil in narrow spaces on ruled paper or a slate we run directly counter to the principles of growth and development that nature has so plainly written in his constitution. Must not education, to be education at all, be in accord with these principles rather than in opposition to them? The child of 6 years, during the first days of his school life, chooses to make large, whole-arm movements rather than the minute movements of the finger muscles. At first he requires "almost an acre" of blackboard space in which to write a few sentences. We must train the large shoulder muscles before attempting to burden the tender, undeveloped finger muscles, which are really injured by such too early strain and involved activity.

Thus we find in our best regulated kindergartens of to-day none of the finer work for the younger children. The young child is no longer required to take up the bead-stringing and pin-pricking exercises—at least not until his eyes and his finger muscles are ripe and ready for such training. In some of the most modern kindergartens the occupations and gifts are concerned with larger objects instead of those formerly used, which were of the smaller, more orthodox size—larger blocks, larger pencils, larger needles, larger beads and coarse string instead of fine thread.—Forum.

Compliment to a Foeman.

After the Franco-Prussian war the Germans had the highest respect for General Gallifet, and when the French cavalry hero attended the German manoeuvres one autumn in the '80s by special invitation of the old Emperor he was treated with the most exquisite courtesy and consideration. His Majesty placed him on his right hand at the table, and felt inclined to repeat (he remarked later) what Frederick the Great once said to the Austrian Marshal Daun on meeting him after the seven years' war. The Marshal was for taking his place at table opposite the King, but Frederick exclaimed: "No, that will never do; come and sit beside me; I know only too well what it is to have you on the other side."

AN ODD BIRDSNEST.

On the arrival of a passenger train from Glasgow at Carlisle station, recently, a car examiner was examining a fish truck, which had been run on the train from Androssan, when he found underneath on a bar of the bearings, a blackbird's nest containing four eggs. The nest and eggs were perfect, and were regarded with much curiosity by quite a number of people. A nest has also been discovered in the spout of the school pump at Irthington, Cumberland.

The pump is not much used owing to the impurity of the water, and the birds must evidently have noticed this when they made it their nesting-place. Unfortunately thir eggs were destroyed owing to the schoolmaster having used the pump on the previous evening for garden purposes, before discovering the nest.

A DINNER PILL — Many persons suffer excruciating agony after partaking of a hearty dinner. The food partaken of is like a ball of lead upon the stomach, and instead of being a healing nutriment, it becomes a poison to the system. Dr. Parmelee's Vegetable Pills are wonderful correctives of such troubles. They correct acidity, open the secretions and convey the food partaken of into healthy nutriment. They are just the medicine to take if troubled with indigestion.
