A Case of Typhoid Fever.

BY DR. J. HART, TORONTO.

THE paper I am about to present is a simple narrative of a case, and not a review of medical literature, or an expression of a scientific (or unscientific) theory.

On the evening of January 21st last, I was called to see Miss E., aged twenty-two years. I found her with dark rings about her eyes, face pale, except the cheeks, which was bright pink; pulse, 118; temperature, 102½; frequent diarrhoeal discharges; loss of appetite; white, furred tongue; and marked tenderness in the right iliac region.

She had that day been moved from another part of the city, where she had been ill for ten days. I was informed that her illness had come on suddenly (though her health had not been very good before) with abdominal distress and vomiting; that she had in two days
