LOVE IN MASQUERADE.

I dreamed that love came knocking
At your door one winter night,
While the spectre trees were rocking
In a blast of savage blight,
"Oh! I perish!" poor love pleaded;
"Ope the door, for love's dear sake."
But, although you heard and heeded,
Still no answer would you make!
Not one word of sweet replying
Would your haughty lips have said,
Even if love had lain there dying,
Even if love had lain there dead!

Then I dreamed that love o'erruled you:
For in tenderest voice he cried:
"Nay, dear lady, I sadly fooled you,
Since I am not love, but pride."
And you straightway oped your portals,
With a merry and welcome nod,
To that willest of immortals,
To that masquerading god.
Ah, you oped your portals lightly,
Not for love's, but pride's dear sake;
Yet, O lady, if I dreamed rightly,
Love soon taught you your mistake!

AN ASSURANCE POLICY.

One evening as Bracken, the detective, and I were strolling leisurely through Fitzroy square, he pointed across the way and said: "Did you ever hear of Ferdinand Prevot, a Frenchman and an artist?"

"I cannot say I have."

"He lived in that house opposite. He had come over here from Paris to seek his fortune as a portrait painter. Then he was a handsome young man of five-and-twenty, with very taking manners and many accomplishments. He had no success as an artist, but he found the fortune he wanted in the possession of a widow, and he married her, a woman much older than himself.

"No sooner was the knot tied than he began to make her money fly. In five years they hadn't a rap. He was always a gentleman to his elderly wife. He never failed in politeness and attention to her, and she simply worshipped him; and, as far as we ever heard, though she saw her money slashed about right and left, they had no serious quarrel about it. He had the good sense and good taste to include his wife in all the extravagant schemes by which he dissipated her fortune.

"About a year ago all was gone, except an insurance of a thousand pounds on his wife's life. They still lived over the road, but open house had been abandoned, horses and carriages put down, and the half-dozen servants reduced to none at all. The door remained unopened to callers, though now and then Prevot entertained a few intimate friends in his studio, where he gave them beer and birdseye instead of the champagne and Havanas of other days.

"Very little was now seen of Mrs. Prevot. When her husband was asked about her, he shook his head and sighed, and said her health and spirits were so bad she could not find heart to meet anybody, or go out of the house even for the air, and he was much afraid she would fall into deplorably bad health indeed.

"Then he told his friends he had insisted on Mrs. Prevot seeing a first-rate west end doctor, that she had been ordered abroad, was now in Paris with friends of his own, and that he had begun to hope she was on the way to recovery. If was, he said, his intention to take up his residence in Paris as soon as he could settle their affairs in London.

"A week later he declared the improvement in his wife's health had not been maintained, and that she was worse than before leaving England. During a couple of weeks more he reported her going from bad to worse, and at the end of another week informed his friends that his poor wife's case han been, by the Paris doctors, pronounced hopeless, and that he was going away to fetch her home.

"He went on Monday, the 16th of October, coming back on Friday, the 20th, and driving up to his own door in a four-wheeler. Mrs. Prevost was a small, fragile woman at the best, and the hearts of the neighbors were saddened and softened to see the loving care and solicitude with which this spendthrift husband carried his sick wife into their old home to die. Many a rackety man like him would have let her die in Paris among strangers instead of bringing her back to her own country. It could not be said he brought her back to her own people, for she was childless and had no relations of her own, and all her husband's cut her on her marriage with this penniless foreign adventurer.

"Mrs. Prevot's condition was so bad that no one was allowed to see her, and in little over a week all the blinds of the house were down. One or two of Prevot's closest friends were then allowed to see all that was mortal of the artist's wife, and declared they found her very little changed—something thinner and a good deal paler, that was all. This was the first day. The second day all who called were admitted to the death chamber. By the time the body had been placed in the coffin with a glass panel so that all might see the face. Prevot explained that the nature of the case made such an arrangement desirable. The funeral took place on the fifth day. Nothing noteworthy occurred at it. Every one who saw the new-made widower noticed how becomingly he bore himself; his conduct was just the perfection of suitable behavior, making no parade of his grief nor any attempt to conceal natural sorrow.

"A week after the funeral the insurance company communicated with me. There was, they told me, something very irregular, they feared, about the death and burial of the late Mrs. Prevot, whose life was insured for a thousand pounds, and whose husband had sent in a claim for the money.

"'Irregularity of what kind?' I asked.

"'Well,' said the secretary, "to be plain with you, we suspect foul play. To begin with, no friend of the dead woman saw her in London during her last illness. He was alone, without servant or nurse in the house, with the deceased, and we have just discovered that the doctor's certificate is forged.'

"'That looks black enough,' said I; 'and where is Prevot himself?

"'We do not know. We suppose he has left the country. He has placed his claim in the hands of a solicitor.'

"'Have you refused to pay the claim?' I asked.

"'Oh, no. But we will not pay it until you have cleared up the case. You may go ahead at once and do all things necessary.'

"'Very good,' said I, 'this is clearly a case for exhumation and an inquest. The formalities for taking up the body will occupy a few days. I will take care of that part of the case. Inquiries had better be made in Paris at the place deceased stopped when out of the country, and some one must keep an eye on Prevot.'

"'All right,' said the secretary, 'we have full confidence in you.'"

"Which proves, Bracken," said I, interrupting the detective, "that of the London insurance companies one has a most acute and discriminating secretary."

Bracken did not resent this speech. Over his face a quiet smile stole. "I lay you five to one you do not solve the riddle now."

"A bet on such a ghastly subject," said I, severely, "would be out of place—horrible. Go on, Bracken, go on."

"Well, I needn't tell you that an order for exhumation cannot be got in five minutes, and is not easy to get even in ten.

"Before we obtained it our man in Paris wrote that so far as he had been able to trace Prevot's movements the artist had given a true account of himself. He had been in Paris from the night of the sixteenth of October to the morning of the nineteenth, when he left with his wife for London. Mrs. Prevot was said to have been ailing while in Paris and when quitting it, but as far as he could find out her case was not considered even serious, not to say dangerous. Our man wound up by asking for further instructions.

"This was strong confirmation indeed of the secretary's suspicion. On the nineteenth the woman had left Paris with her husband. She was believed to be only slightly unwell, although he declared her to be dying, and when she arrived in London next day she was so ill that she had to be carried out of the cab into the house.

"I telegraphed our man in Paris: "Come home over Prevot's tracks, and find out everything you can about the pair on their journey.'

"Another suspicious fact came to my knowledge at this time. Prevot had left the country, and his solicitor either could not or would not give us his address. I now felt that not only had the hemp been grown, but it had been spun and twisted for his neck; that is, of course, if we got orders to arrest and could find him. I had no doubt we should have the order to arrest him twenty-eight hours after the exhumation.

"To the cemetery we officials went one dull, foggy November day. The coffin was soon reached and raised, and in a very few minutes the lid was off and we were all gazing at the perfectly unaltered face in it. We were, of course, under cover, but had as the light was here it was better than in the Percy street room with blinds down. No one suspected anything in Percy street, and we all suspected the worst here. But I venture to say not one of us was prepared for what now occurred, and I venture to say that never in the whole existence of that dreary mortuary did its walls hear anything like what it now heard.

"We glanced at one another, and then burst into a loud fit of laughter. One of the onlookers had moved the body of the late Mrs. Prevot, and disclosed the fact that it consisted mostly of a roll of carpet. The head and hands were very faithful waxwork representations of that lady.

"On getting back from the cemetery I found a telegram from the man who had been acting for us in France. It was dated Rouen, and read: 'Mrs. Prevot is here in fairly good health. She has not yet been informed of her own death. Shall I break the news to her?'"

"And," said I to Bracken, as he stopped to hail a bus in Oxford street, "did you ever find Prevot?"

"No. You see he didn't get the money, and it was no one's interest to prosecute and they said he was in Mexico and no one wanted him."

"Not even his wife?"

"Not even his wife. When she heard of the thing she did not like it at all. She said the man who could weep at such a funeral could not be a nice-minded man. An opinion in which I heartily concur. Good-by."

Why Farmers Should Keep Bees.

It is essential that every farmer keep a few bees on the farm to collect the honey afforded by his orchards, timber land, pasture fields, and to gather the delicate nectar which would be lost in the atmosphere, and furthermore to mingle the pollen of the flowers and fertilize its fruits and clovers. Honey and pollen are supplied by most flowering trees and plants of the vegetable kingdom. Honey is a liquid sweet secreted by flowers, and gathered and stored in the combs unchanged by the bees. The pollen is the fertilizing dust, discharged by the anthers of the flowers. It is used to feed the young and immature bees and is collected in great quantities for this purpose. It is carried to the hives in little balls upon the thighs of the workers.

Demolition of Dickens' Landmarks.

Another Dickens landmark has been doomed for destruction. This is in Holborn, a part of London for which the novelist must have had some fondness, for he lived there or thereabouts until prosperity came to him, and many of the episodes of his stories down to "Pip's" life in London in Great Expectations are laid in the inns or streets of that venerable thoroughfare. It is Wood's hotel that the vandals are now about to demolish, and in one set of rooms in the building Dickens passed through some of the many vicissitudes of his early life.

An Amusing Metaphor.

Sir Frederick Milnor, speaking on the Budget in the House of Commons recently, created immense amusement by one of his metaphorical references. "A cow," he said, "might be drained dry, and if the Chancellors of the Exchequer persisted in meeting every deficiency that occurred by taxing the brewing and distilling industry, they would kill the cow that laid the golden milk."

PERMANENTLY CURED
BY USING
Ayer's Pills

"My husband was subject to severe attacks of neuralgia which caused him great pain and suffering. The pains were principally about his eyes, and he often had to remain in a darkened room, not being able to stand the light. Ayer's Pills being recommended, he tried them, using one before each meal. They very soon afforded relief, followed by permanent cure. I am a strong believer in the efficacy of Ayer's Pills, and would not be without them for ten times their cost."—MRS. M. E. DEBAT, Liberty, Tex.

"I have used Ayer's Pills in my family for forty years, and regard them as the very best.—Uncle MARTIN HANCOCK, Lake City, Fla.
