L. BLACK & CO'S
Spheroidal Spectacles
AND EYE GLASSES
ARE the best for the preservation of the sight, and took the medal at the Centennial Exhibition.

The lenses are made of the best material, uniform in density, and of high refractive power, their perfect polish and spheroidal shape adapt them to ease and improve the sight of the wearer.
The eye being the most delicate organ great care should be exercised in selecting spectacles; it is not enough that the glass be of the right focus, but the lenses must be perfectly centered and in many cases perfect relief is only given by having each eye fitted separately. To effect this the lenses are made interchangeable, and having an Optometer to measure the sight, a perfect fit is guaranteed.
Call and examine before purchasing any other kind.

IVANHOE.

(BY SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.)

CHAPTER XX.

"Grammercy for thy sack," said Wamba: "but think'st thou it is lawful for me to aid you to transmew thyself from a holy hermit into a sinful forester?"

"Never fear," said the hermit; "I will but confess the sins of my green cloak to my greyfriair's frock, and all shall be well again."

"Amen!" answered the Jester; "a broadcloth penitent should have a sackcloth confessor, and your frock may absolve my motley doublet into the bargain."

So saying, he accomodated the friar with his assistance in trying the endless number of points, as the laces which attached the hose to the doublet were then termed.

While they were thus employed Locksley led the knight a little apart, and addressed him thus: "Deny it not, Sir Knight; you are he who decided the victory to the advantage of the English against the strangers on the second day of the tournament at Ashby."

"And what follows, if you guess truly, good yeoman?" replied the knight.

"I should in that case hold you," replied the yeoman, "a friend to the weaker party."

"Such is the duty of a true knight, at least," replied the Black Champion: "and I would not willingly that there were reason to think otherwise of me."

"But for my purpose," said the yeoman, "thou shouldst be as well a good Englishman as a good knight; for that which I have to speak of concerns, indeed, the duty of every honest man, but is more especially that of a true born native of England."

"You can speak to no one," replied the knight, "to whom England, and the life of every Englishman, can be dearer than to me."

"I would willingly believe so," said the woodsman, "for never had this country such need to be supported by those who love her. Hear me, and I will tell thee of an enterprise, in which, if thou be'st really that which thou seemest, thou mayest take an honorable part. A band of villains, in the disguise of better men than themselves, have made themselves master of the person of a noble Englishman, called Cedric the Saxon, together with his ward, and his friend Athelstane of Coningsburgh, and would have transported them to a castle in this forest, called Torquilstone. I ask of thee, as a good knight and a good Englishman, wilt thou aid in their rescue?"

"I am bound by my vow to do so," replied the knight; but I would willingly know who you are, who request my assistance in their behalf?"

"I am," said the forester, "a nameless man; but I am the friend of my country, and of my country's friends. With this account of me you must for the present remain satisfied, the more especially since you yourself wish to remain unknown. Believe me, however, that my word, when once given, is just as inviolate as if I wore golden spurs."

"I willingly believe it," said the knight; "I have been accustomed to study men's countenances, and I can read in thine honesty and resolution. I will, ask thee no farther questions, but aid thee in setting at freedom these oppressed captives, which done I trust that we shall part better acquainted as well as better satisfied with each other."

"So," said Wamba to Gurth—for the friar, being now fully equipped, the jester, having approached to the other side of the hut, had heard the conclusion of the conversation—"so we have got a new ally?—I trust the valor of the knight will be truer metal than the religion of the hermit, or the honesty of the yeoman; for this Locksley looks like a born deer stealer, and this priest like a lusty hypocrite."

"Hold thy peace, Wamba," said Gurth, "it may be as thou dost guess, but were the horned devil to rise and proffer me his assistance to set at liberty Cedric and Lady Rowena, I fear I would hardly have courage to refuse the foul fiend's offer and bid him get behind my back."

The friar was now accoutred as a yeoman, with sword and buckler, bow and quiver, and a partisan on his shoulder. He left his cell at the head of the party, and, having carefully locked the door, put the key in his pocket.

"Art thou in condition to do good service, friar?" said Locksley, "or does the brown bowl still run in thy head?"

"Not more than a draught of St Dunstan's fountain will allay," replied the priest; "something there is of a whizzing in my brain and instability in my legs, but you shall presently see both of them go away."
