Expansion in West Indies

London, Dec. 16.—Panama Canal possibilities begin to loom huge in the eyes of British naval dignitaries and experts.

One of the sensational developments of the session of parliament in January is expected to be a statement of plans of the new first Lord of the Admiralty, Winston Churchill, and a feature of significance to the American government, will be a project for the establishment of a great naval base in the Caribbean Sea, near the Panama Canal.

Mr. Churchill considers his transfer from the home office to the admiralty as a promotion, and is bent on making a record

When questioned by Lord Charles Beresford as to the views of the admiralty upon the question of placing Port Royal in the condition of a first class naval base for the cruisers protecting British trade routes through the canal, he replied that no change of policy was necessary "at the present moment."

"It is an open secret, however, that the government is preparing a large scheme of naval expansion in the West indies. The Unionists are ready to go much further in the same direction, if given a chance.

Their naval attitude towards "naval volition" is indicated in over-whelming vote by which the Lords rejected the naval prize bill—a measure intimately affecting the United States.

As there seems no doubt that the new German Reichstag, to be chosen January 12, will be invited to pass a navy bill largely extending the limits thought sufficent prior to the latest Morocco quarrel, the Lodnon government is taking time by the forelock; and though Mr. Churchill hopes for a reduction in the naval estimates, it is understood that he contmeplates a big naval loan.
