pete with Portland. This was not an unreasonable request. People could not live on wind. They might get through an election on wind and Mr. Blair was trying to do it. But the laboring men had to live here and he asked which would they prefer—the C. P. R. as their winter companion or the honor of supporting a man who would no longer be a member of a government after Nov. 7.

Was it unreasonable, he continued, to ask Mr. Blair how much the proportionate rate was that he would get per ton per mile for a cargo of grain from the Lake front via the Grand Trunk. Mr. Blair had not answered this. Why did he not answer these questions? Had he done so, his case would have been largely gained so far as the winter port question was concerned. He tried, instead, to buoy his case by admiring the way the people refused to be stampeded in St. John. If he gave the figures satisfactorily, then ask him, said the speaker, if he can do that to tell us why when he had shut one gateway he did not bring the business over his railway and let the winter port go on? Why did he not give the meeting the knowledge they were in need of. Should the people say they lived before we had the winter port and would live after it? But the electorate would not decide on an issue like that. Mr. Blair had the information and should give it.

Mr. Foster said he was a young man who had fought his way up from the ranks, and what he got he got honestly. He was here not to present an appeal on personal grounds, but to have men judge his case fairly. Papers said he was the enemy of St. John. Mr. Blair would not go so far as to say that, but his henchmen did it. Mr. Foster said he had been in public life ever since 1880 in New Brunswick and was a member of the dominion Conservative government from 1885 to 1896. Mr. Blair had been New Brunswick's minister. Compare the records, he said. Had he done nothing for St. John? (Cries of no and yes). Had Mr. Blair done everything? He claimed that not an artery of railway in New Brunswick had been built by Mr. Blair, but that all were built because of the Conservative government and that he had a part in it. He further contended that there was no local steamship line but was running when Mr. Blair went into the government. He claimed that he had raised to $12,500 the subsidy for the Bay route and thus made it a good service.

As to the West Indies, he said, the Liberal-Conservative government, of which he was finance minister, put on a $90,000 service between St. John, Halifax and the West Indies. Mr. Blair had thought he would be afraid to speak about fast line and winter port matters, but he was ready to speak about anything he had done. Mr. Blair had said the City of St. John would never have anything to do with him because of the fast line matter. He also said the Liberal government had torn up the Allen contract. But, had they made another in its place? All that was done was that Mr. Dobell had gone about chasing his bottle-nosed turrett ships and all that came was a model. As to the winter port business, Mr. Foster said the short line was the first essential of it and it was the Liberal-Conservative government that put it through. He was in the government at the time and supported it and credit was due him. Mr. Blair looked just at the I. C. R. The city was in partnership with the C. P. R., but Mr. Blair just backs up and says: "This is my railway" and he won't give in a bit.

Who, he asked, gave the first subsidy for direct service from St. John? The Conservatives, he said. From the experiment of 1895 the Liberal-Conservative government—and he himself had made the proposition—felt that the thing for St. John was a permanent fast freight line (applause), and Mr. Blair knew that if the Conservative government remained in power both these ideas—a permanent fast freight service from St. John to Britain and a fast Atlantic line from Halifax with an option of coming to St. John would have been carried out. What did the ship laborers and others want most, a fast passenger line or the freight line?

After a year's experiment Mr. Foster said he had read from his platform promises which would be carried out if the Conservatives remained in power, and had this been the case, the business would be going on today. He said that 227 ships had come and gone here and more than $750,000 had been distributed in St. John through this.

Mr. Blair had built no railroads, had brought no steamship lines. But the Liberals, when they got into power, kept on to the Grand Trunk system for a year, and then followed the Conservative policy. Did they make the business here permanent? No; there were no permanent subsidies. But, Mr. Blair was here with his back to the wall. (Applause).

Were he (Foster) an elector here, he would say this appeared to be a personal matter between Mr. Blair and Mr. Shaughnessy. He would say: "You've said you had the government behind your back, Mr. Blair, but your master, Mr. Tarte, is on record as saying it was a matter of public policy, that the C. P. R. should be kept at St. John and Canada's ports used for the winter business."

He would also say to Mr. Blair that he had got in a hole, but that he would not submit the railway differences to an expert.

Hon. Mr. Blair sought to address Mr. Foster, but the latter would not give opportunity. Instead, he continued speaking. He would have said to Mr. Blair: "Hold on to the proper rights of the I. C. R., but as the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath, so the I. C. R. was made for man and not man for the I. C. R." Over and above bad business and policy, the speaker saw tyranny in Mr. Blair's management. He said the short route was laid to build up the maritime provinces and he claimed that I. C. R. arrangements were such that they interfered with the building up of industries along its line in the provinces.

He said Mr. Blair had built an elevator at St. John, but what was he putting in it, or what was he putting on the wharves he built? The elevator was there, but Mr. Blair's back was against the gateway. He told the electors to go to Mr. McAvity or Hon. Mr. Pugsley and ask what was going to be done. Hon. Mr. Pugsley would suavely tell the inquirer to sit on the lee side of Mr. Blair's elevator. Mr. Foster spoke of "slaughtered promises" and said their ghosts must haunt the minister of railways. He said there was no more unscrupulous politician in Canada than Mr. Blair, and that for 15 years he had his arms up to the elbow in the reputations of public men in the country buying and selling them; that in 1896 he had gone along the North Shore from Restigouche to Queens, tempting, but he had to sell a senatorship to get a seat. Mr. Foster closed by expression of his trust in the younger and older manhood of the constituency.

MEN WHO SIGNED THE NOMINATIONS.

Some of Those Who Had the Opportunity and Who Availed Themselves of It--The Intelligence and Stability of the Community Represented.
