A Shocking Murder in Ireland.

The foreign journals describe the incidents of a fearful murder case, which took place recently near Parsonstown, Ireland. The King's County Chronicle, an Irish paper, says:—

On Friday, May 26th, a man named Hayes was arrested on a charge of having made away with his wife, who had been missing since the previous Monday, and who, the prisoner had alleged, had gone to America. On that day, however, Hayes made a full confession of his crime. He said that on Tuesday morning about 4 o'clock, before he got up, he gave the unfortunate woman a kick which knocked her out of the bed, and that she fell on the floor, and that he went to sleep again, and did not think more of the matter till he awoke again in about two hours, where he found her still lying on the floor where she fell, and bleeding profusely.

He got up and washed her face, and then found that she was dead, when he got a sack and put her clothes and herself into it, and brought it down to the bog and buried it.—He then described how he packed everything belonging to her into the bed tick and brought them to the same place and also buried them. During the confession the wretch fainted.—Having somewhat recovered he proceeded to describe the place where he had her concealed but it soon became evident that even with this help it would be almost impossible to find the place. Hayes, after some time, agreed to go to the spot and point it out, provided the chaplain went with him, and that the police would allow none of the country people to go near him. The preliminaries having been arranged, a covered car was procured, and the prisoner, with the chaplain and a constable, proceeded to Gairos. The prisoner, having reached the part of the bog where the body was disposed of, made the carriage stop and the police got down. Hayes then pointed out the place to the police, but it was at such a distance that it was found impossible to find the exact spot unless he could be induced to go himself, which, after some persuasion, he consented to do, and closely accompanied by the chaplain, he crossed several drains, and traversed a good deal of ground until he came to a small gangway across a drain which had recently been cleared up, and then he stopped, and raising his haggard face and lack-lustre eyes to heaven, he pointed to the place, exclaiming, "Before God, there she is."

The spot was most cunningly selected, and as the wretched man himself said, "twenty thousand men could not find it unless he went himself." The police having procured spades and shovels, set to work with a will, the prisoner directing them to keep where they found the bog soft, and not to cut any fresh ground. After dipping about three feet below the surface of the surrounding bog, the police laid bare the ticken of the bed. The prisoner, who showed evident signs of lamtness, several times throwing himself on the ground to recover himself, was taken away to the covered car and brought to the town. The bed-tick was first exhumed, and, on being opened, displayed a most heterogeneous collection of articles—indeed, everything that belonged to her in the house. The sack was next brought to the bank. It was sewed on the mouth and on being opened the slippers which she wore came out. A smoothing iron was also in the mouth of the sack. It was evident that she had been thrust in the sack head formost, and it therefore became necessary to rip the bottom of the sack, when a most horrifying sight presented itself.

The head was terribly battered, the right eye was nearly closed with a cut, and there was another desperate cut on the left temple. Her nose was also apparently broken, while the blood on her face was quite fresh, which appeared as if it had been recently washed. The appearance presented by the body made it clear that the prisoner had not confessed the truth as to the manner of her death, as she was dressed, and the wounds on her head were such as could not be inflicted with a fall out of bed, the smoothing-iron which was in the sack with her being most probably the instrument by which the foul deed was perpetrated. It is most extraordinary the distance which he brought the body, the place where it was found being about one thousand yards from the high-road which had to be crossed, and on the other side of the road, where his residence lay, he had to bring the body five hundred yards more. The same day an inquest was held, and the prisoner was sent for trial on a charge of wilful murder.

☞ A most respectable woman was brutally ill-treated by a number of "loyal American ladies," at Indianola, Iowa, last week, for suspected disloyalty. Her clothes were nearly all torn off her, and in this condition she was forced to parade the town, with a flag in her hands. Her little daughter 13 years of age was beaten and bruised by the fiends, until she was covered with blood.
