FIGHTING FOR A NAME.

The young man felt as if he could scarcely contain himself, and it was well for his enemy, perhaps, that he had been put in confinement below, before this revelation.

"It would have been horrible," the young girl cried, with a shudder.

"Yes, indeed," Ned said; but since she was now safe, other thoughts began to assert themelves, and he continued, as he bent forward to look into her eyes: "Gertrude, have you believed that I was guilty of the crime with which I have been charged?"

The sensitive girl colored at the grave question; but, meeting his glance unwaveringly, she replied:

"Ned, I had the utmost faith in you until I received this note only a few hours ago; and you, yourself, can understand what it implies. But now, looking into your face once more, I know that you are as true as truth itself."

"Bless you, my own darling, for this comforting assurance!" Ned exclaimed, with deep emotion, "it has lifted a great burden from my heart. Yes, I can understand that if you believed this note—and that you did believe it, your presence here proves—you must have thought that I just the same as admitted my guilt. But, dear, although every circumstance has seemed to point to me, as the author of that crime, I am as innocent of it as you are. Let me tell you, too, that we have the real robber safe in hand, and I believe that the stolen treasure is all concealed on board this vessel, and will soon be restored to the bank."

"Can that be possible?" Gertrude joyfully exclaimed. Then she added, as she slipped both her small hands confidingly into his: "Oh, Ned, tell me all that has happened to you since that dreadful day."

Her act touched him deeply; it was so spontaneous and trustful that it told him more plainly than words could have done, that she believed in him fully, and loved him as truly as ever.

"I will, my dearest, but not just now. I must think and act for you first. Of course, your friend, Mrs. Page, does not know where you are," he remarked, in a troubled tone.

"No," Gertrude answered, flushing, and then she told him of Mrs. Page's absence from the city, and how she had come, unknown to every one in the house, in response to his supposed request.

"I am appalled when I think of it," Ned said. "That wretch might have taken you to a distant land, and there would have been no one to rescue you from his power."

"I am afraid it was very thoughtless and imprudent," Gertrude faltered. Then she looked up at him with shining eyes, and continued: "But, Ned, I believe—I should do it again if I thought you were in trouble and needed me."

Ned lifted one of the hands he was holding and touched it softly with his lips at the brave assurance.

Then he arose with a resolute air.

"I must see about taking you back immediately," he said. "You will not mind sitting here alone for a few moments while I go to make the necessary arrangements?" he added, inquiringly.

"No, indeed," the fair girl replied, her face taking on a happier look than it had worn for many days.

Ned was the same true, noble-hearted fellow that he had always been, and her cup of joy could ask for nothing more just then.

The young man went directly to the chief and briefly explained to him the circumstances of Gertrude's singular abduction asking permission to take a boat and one of the sailors and attend her back to the city.

His request was readily granted, and the chief added that an officer should also go with them as an additional protection, and in less than fifteen minutes they were flying over the waters back toward Halifax.

When they reached the wharf Ned called a carriage, and, telling the sailor that he would be back in the course of an hour, the two young people proceeded directly to the house of Mrs. Page.

Ned related on the way all the trying experiences of the last two weeks, and also rehearsed the great wrong perpetrated upon Mr. Hunting, who, he explained, was the inventor of the "Eureka Pump," in which Mr. Langaid came so near investing.

"How very, very strange!" Gertrude exclaimed, when he concluded; "and it has been dreadful for you both. Oh, Ned, I have been so utterly wretched during these last two weeks!—they have seemed like years to me—we, your mother and I, were so afraid that something terrible had happened to you," and again her hand was slipped confidingly in to that of her lover.

Ned clasped it warmly.

"And I, too, my darling," he returned, in a tremulous voice, "have suffered more than I can tell you, in view of what my friends would have to endure on my account; but, most of all, because of the stain which I knew rested upon my good name."

"Yes, indeed; I know you must have been nearly wild about it. But, Ned, dear, old Mr. Lawson trusted you to the end——."

"To the end! What do you mean, Gertrude?" Ned cried, in a startled tone, and with a sudden heart-sinking.

"I forgot that you could not know, or I would not have spoken so abruptly," Gertrude responded, regretfully. "But, Ned, Mr. Lawson died the next Tuesday after the dreadful Saturday."

Ned's face was unutterably sad as he listened to this sorrowful intelligence.

"My dear old friend," he said, with deep emotion, "how can I bear to know that I shall never see you again?"

And tears of genuine grief gathered in his eyes and rolled over his cheeks while Gertrude related all the circumstances attending Mr. Lawson's death.

"And you say he died believing in my innocence, in spite of all?" he questioned, when he could compose himself sufficiently to speak.

"Yes, with almost his latest breath," he asserted it to your mother," the young girl returned.

"That is very comforting to me," Ned said, with a deep sigh of relief. "I should have grieved sorely if he had died believing that I could repay all his kindness to my mother and myself with such base ingratitude and such reckless criminality."

CHAPTER XLV.

When Ned and Gertrude arrived at Mrs. Page's they found that the lady had returned only a few moments previous, and was just upon the point of retiring.

She was greatly astonished when, upon opening the door in answer to their ring, she found her young charge, whom she supposed was fast asleep in her own room, standing outside in company with a fine-looking young man, who was an utter stranger to her.

Gertrude soon explained her adventure to her satisfaction, although she chided her for being so imprudent, and Ned, after chatting a while, upon his own trials and experiences, arose and departed, but promising to make another call, if possible before he left for Boston.

He returned to the Bald Eagle feeling very light-hearted, for he believed that the outlook for the future was now very bright and promising for him.

On the evening of the next day, a Boston detective, accompanied by Mr. Cranston, who had returned from his vacation immediately upon learning of the bank robbery, arrived in Halifax, empowered with all authority necessary to conduct the formalities for the arrest and extradition of the criminals, and the recovery of the property of which they had robbed the bank, should it be found in their possession.

The Bald Eagle was thoroughly searched, and the stolen treasure was finally discovered in a cunningly-contrived safe, which had been built into the vessel behind the berth in the state-room occupied by Gould, the owner.

To Ned's exceedingly joy the bonds, which had been stolen from him during his trip from Albany, were also found in the safe, thus proving the truth of his assertions regarding their loss, and clearing him from all suspicion.

The money, of course, had been used, but Mr. Lawson's generosity had replaced that, so the bank would lose nothing through him, and his gratitude knew no bounds.

These revelations were regarded as prima facie evidence against the owner of the Bald Eagle, and on Monday morning, legal steps were instituted to bring the offenders—for Bill Bunting was, of course, regarded as an accomplice—to justice.

Of course, this took some little time on account of the formalities required in transferring the criminals from the jurisdiction of one country to that of another, and Ned was permitted, meanwhile, to enjoy himself in his own way, which, as may be supposed, was to spend as much time as possible in the company of Gertrude.

The meeting between him and Mr. Cranston had been a most joyful one, and the man could not have expressed more hearty satisfaction over Ned's entire vindication, if he had been his own son.

"You have had a hard time of it, my boy," he remarked, regarding him with genuine sympathy as he shook him cordially by the hand; "but you deserve great praise for the courage and good judgment you have shown in helping to rescue the treasure from those audacious knaves. You will reap a bountiful reward for it, too."

"All the reward I ask is to be restored to the full confidence of my employers," the young man returned with evident emotion.

"That you will be, I can emphatically promise," Mr. Cranston replied, "and I know everyone connected with the bank will rejoice as heartily as I do over the fact."

All legal formalities were at length concluded, and the prisoners were transferred to the custody of the United States authorities.

It was then thought best to run the yacht and all on board directly to Boston; that being considered the safest way to convey the valuable papers and the prisoners also to that city.

It was a joyful day to Ned when he once more entered the bank in Boston, and was more heartily and kindly welcomed back by everyone employed there. But the most joyful meeting of all was with his mother, whose confidence in her dear boy's integrity had never faltered for a moment.

There was much to be told on both sides, and Ned was not a little astonished to learn among other things of his father's return, and of the stand he had taken regarding Mr. Lawson's property.

He was, of course, very indignant over the proposals that had been made to his mother to relinquish her right of dowry.

"If Mr. Lawson made a will, leaving his fortune or any portion of it to us, we will have it, if it is possible to secure it," he resolutely remarked. "At all events, we will be in no hurry to settle with our haughty relatives."

Ned was immediately received into the bank again, but advanced to a more honorable position, with a proportionate increase of salary.

A portion of the reward offered for the recovery of the treasure was also tendered to him, but he refused to accept one dollar of it.

BY DEFEATING THE ROCKETS, THE LONDONS AGAIN LEAD THE LEAGUE

Champions, With Bert Sheere in the Box, Were Too Much for Their Opponents.

The games in the City League on Saturday were not of the spectacular order. Despite this, however, they were good exhibitions. The McClarys, with remarkable inconsistency, stepped out and won from the Blue Labels. The latter fielded poorly and threw their pitchers down in the shabbiest way. The Londons, with a strong nine, hit the ball at the right time and won their game. Sheere's perplexing slow ball had the Rockets going all through, and they were unable to find him to any advantage.

SOME HEAVY HITTING.

A deal of heavy hitting was witnessed in the McClary-Blue Label game. Each team had two doubles in the seven innings played, Allen alone making a pair of them.

The Labels started the scoring in the second inning. Fitzmaurice and Mines reached first and scored on Allen's double. They secured another in the third, when three hits were made. The foundrymen came up in this inning, however, and tied the score. Smith and Steele reached first, Early sacrificed, and the first two reached home on Delaney's fumble of Lee's liner. Howell, who had been pitching for the cigarmen, was taken out of the box in the fourth, and replaced by Smith, although the five runs secured by the McClary nine in this inning could not be counted against him. Two two-baggers were made, and two passes issued, but errors had to do with the scoring more than the hitting.

The foundrymen started in furiously again in the sixth. On four hits, an error and a pass, they scored five times. The team batted around in this inning. Another pair of tallies in the seventh put the Labels out of the running, and they could do nothing better than secure one run in the last inning. The score:

A CLEAN GAME.

It is almost unnecessary to state that the second game was clean. When the Rockets and Londons meet the fans look for a good match, and they get it. The majority also look and hope for the Rockets to win, but Dame Fortune doesn't always satisfy their wants and desires. The Londons had a batting streak on on Saturday, and scored in the first two innings. In the first Jackson helped them some by a pass, and with a hit two runs counted. In the second two hits and a couple of stolen bases told the tale of how another run was scored. In the fourth another counted, and London had a bad lead (for the Rockets), before the latter scored, in the fifth. Four hits were made, and they were all good ones and counted. Jackson made the swat that did the work, and London pulled out of a pretty predicament when it looked as if there was going to be a continuous show.

Three more came the way of the Londons in the ninth, by dint of several errors and two passes, together with Gibson's two-bagger. Jackson forced a run by issuing a pass with the bases full. This was unfortunate, as the pitcher had only handed out two of these previously.

The score was as follows:

ANOTHER VICTIM OF THE STEEPLECHASE

Jockey Swallwell Receives Fatal Injuries at Brighton Beach —Stake to Ort Wells.

New York, July 23. — The sport of steeplechasing claimed the second human life this season at the Brighton Beach race track today when the Canadian jumper, Opuntia, fell at the jump near the five-eighths pole, throwing his rider, Ernest Swallwell, and stepping upon his head. Swallwell once rode on the northern circuit.

Swallwell was picked up unconscious, bleeding profusely from a cut in his neck, and was removed to the temporary hospital near the entrance to the track. It was found that his skull had been fractured near the base, and an ambulance was called from the reception hospital at Coney Island. Swallwell died ten minutes after being admitted to the hospital.

Opuntia, the horse ridden by Swallwell today, belongs to Robert Davies, a wealthy brewer of Toronto and vice-president of the Ontario Jockey Club.

Ort Wells, winner of the Commonwealth Handicap, the Lawrence Realization and many other stakes, today added another to his already long list by capturing the $10,000 Brighton Derby. The Drake horse was ridden out to beat Broomstick by one and a half lengths. Knight Errant was third, three lengths back. After the jockeys had weighed out, the stewards disqualified Broomstick for interfering with Ort Wells, in making the turn into the stretch the first time. Knight Errant was officially placed second and Bobadil third. The time, 2:32 3-5, is within two-fifths of a second of the track record for the distance. The Drake entry, Ort Wells and Bobadil, was a hot favorite at 9 to 10, with Broomstick next in demand at 2 to 1. Knight Errant, the only other starter, was quoted at 4 to 1.

POLICE INTERFERE AT BUFFALO GAME

Jersey City Didn't Play, But Buffalo Was Determined and Suffered.

Buffalo, N. Y., July 25. — Buffalo not being a Sunday baseball town it had been arranged that the Buffalo-Jersey City teams of the Eastern League should play today at Tonawanda. When the Jersey City team found that deputy sheriffs were on hand they refused to play. Then the Buffalo team began a game with an amateur nine. The deputy sheriffs then stepped in and arrested Captain Shaw, of the Buffalos, and a player in the amateur nine. They will have a hearing Tuesday and a test case may be made out of the affair.

TECUMSEHS FELL TO CAPS.

The Tecumsehs experienced their first defeat at the hands of the Capitals of Ottawa at Toronto on Saturday. The score wound up 7 to 3, although it was a taken-for-granted matter that the Tecumsehs would win the game. Odds of 3 to 1 were offered against the Caps.

PULLED UP TO WALK, CLAUDE BEAT CANADIAN HORSES BADLY

Claude, Mike Daly's still great Lissak colt, now in his 4-year-old form, on a track made to his order at Fort Erie on Saturday, administered a terrific beating to Fort Hunter and Light Brigade, the Canadian cracks. Overnight rain made the track several seconds slow, and caused George Hendrie's candidate, Reservation, to be withdrawn. Three finally faced Starter Dwyer in the special, the big feature of the day, an event at a mile and a sixteenth, with $1,000 added. Of the three Claude was always a pronounced favorite, 1-2 being considered a fancy price about him at post time. Fort Hunter, the Dyment Derby colt, as second choice, receded in price from 8-5 to twos at post time, while Light Brigade was generally regarded as the dangerous outsider, at four to one at the end.

Light Brigade was fractious, and had to be led to the post, and when they got the word after a minute in the starter's hands it was Light Brigade that spoiled what would have been a perfect sendoff by bumping violently into Fort Hunter as they plunged past the barrier. The blow knocked Fort Hunter out of his stride, and by the time he had recovered he was several lengths behind Light Brigade, while Daly had gone on about his business with Claude, and had a length the best of it.

Fort Hunter speedily made up the disadvantage, and by the time the first turn was reached was but a length back of Claude, which, under restraint, had yielded the lead to Light Brigade. For about the fraction of a minute Munro, on Light Brigade, may have fancied he was on the winner, but when they were fairly straightened out on the back stretch Daly gave Claude his head, and the truth came out. He shot by Light Brigade, and despite Munro's urging, the son of Maximo could not hold on. Gradually Claude widened the gap, and when he struck the last turn he was ten lengths in front of the struggling pair, and a derisive yell went up from the backers of the favorite in the stand.

Into the stretch came Claude, fairly drying up the mud, and when he reached the stand he had fully twenty-five lengths the best of it, pulled to a walk. Light Brigade fought gallantly for the place when challenged by Fort Hunter, half-way down the stretch, but early pace had left its mark, and the Derby colt came on after Claude, a length in front of the Hendrie candidate.

YACHTING.

PROTEST OF NO AVAIL.

New York, July 23. — The regatta committee of the Brooklyn Yacht Club, after considering the protest made by Gilbert Ray Hawes, has unanimously decided to award the Lipton cup to the Little Rhody, C. F. Tillinghast, owner.

LONDONS ONCE MORE LEAD CITY LEAGUE

The Londons are again in the lead in the City Baseball League, the tie with the Rockets being broken by the victory of the champions in the game on Saturday. The Londons now have a lead of nearly 100 points, with the McClary team a poor third, and the Blue Labels fourth. The standing:

	Won.	Lost.	P.C.
Londons	9	3	.750
Rockets	8	4	.666

Blue Labels	3	8	.273

TIGER'S MANAGER HAS RESIGNED

Barrow, Discouraged by Lack of Victories, Throws Up His Position.

Manager Edward G. Barrow, of the Detroit Club, has tendered his resignation as manager of that club at Washington. Although his action caused surprise among the magnates, he evidently explained himself sufficiently, as the resignation was accepted. Barrow's action is attributed to the failure of his aggregation to land many games. He was a man who would become discouraged when success went the other way, and he foolishly sold several of his best men early in the season, and their success on other teams reacted on him. What Barrow intends doing is not known even to his friends, and who his successor will be is quite as much in doubt.
