MONTREAL A GREAT CITY SO MAYOR LAPORTE SAYS

Claims a Population of 450,000, With Bright Hopes for More.

Montreal, July 1.—(Special.)—The thirty-seventh birthday of the Canadian Confederation finds the commercial metropolis of the country with a population of 450,000 souls and with a record of progress scarcely excelled by any other city on this continent.

There are not fifty houses to let in all this great city, and if they were at all fit to lodge people in there would be in reality no residences to be had for love or money. There are one thousand houses now building, and if it had not been for the labor troubles five thousand new habitations would be nearer the mark.

Mayor Laporte, who has lived in Montreal all his life, has made the statement that Montreal's population has increased 75,000 during the past three years and that the commercial metropolis of the Dominion will pass the half-million mark in the near future.

His worship states that no one seeing the tremendous crowds on the streets on St. Jean Baptiste Day can help but realize that Montreal must right away take her place amongst the great cities of the American Continent.

CAMPING IN THE BARREN LANDS.

Vivid Description of an Outing in the Great Northwest.

The Barren Lands, called by the Indians "Land of Little Sticks," are absolutely devoid not only of trees, but even of brush, except for some stunted bushes to be found in occasional spots near the water's edge. These lands lie in N. W. Territory, near the Great Slave Lake. Caspar Whitney, in describing a hunting trip thru this region in "Musk-Ox, Bison, Sheep and Goat," says that a venture into this northern country except in summer means a struggle with both cold and famine. Yet the lack of food was not so hard to bear as the wind, and camping was a continual discomfort.

"One of the first lessons I learned," writes Mr. Whitney, "was to keep my face free from covering, and also as clean shaven as was possible under the circumstances. It makes me smile now to remember the elaborate hood arrangement which was knitted for me in Canada, and which then seemed to me one of the most important articles of my equipment. It covered the entire head, ears and neck, with openings only for eyes and mouth, and in town I had viewed it as a great find; but I threw it way before I got within a thousand mile sof the Barren Grounds.

"The reason is obvious. My breath turned the front of my hood into a sheet of ice before I had run three miles; and as there was no fire in the Barren Grounds to thaw it, of course it was an impossible thing to wear in that region. After other experiments I found the simplest and most comfortable headgear to be my own long hair, which hung even with my jaw, bound about just above the ears by a handkerchief, and the open hood of my caribou-skin capote drawn forward over all.

"The most trying hour in the twenty-four was at the camping time in the afternoon. The fire furnished no warmth; it was not built for that purpose. It was simply to boil the tea, and perhaps an idea of its size can be given by saying that by the time the snow in the kettle had melted into water and the water began to boil the fire was exhausted.

"Having drunk the tea, we rolled up in our fur robes, lying side by side around the tepee, with feet towards the fire and head against the sledge, knees into the back of the man next you, and with your snowshoes under your head, away from the dogs, who would eat the lacing.

"Sleep never came until the dogs had finished fighting over us, for as soon as we were rolled in our robes the dogs poured into the tepee. There were twenty-eight dogs, and the tepee was about seven feet in diameter at its base. No hour in the day or night was more miserable than this, when these half-starved brutes fought over and on top of us before they finally settled down upon us.

"In extremely cold weather a dog curled up at your feet or back is not unpleasant, but to have one lying on your head, another on your shoulders or hips, or perhaps a third on your feet, and you lying on your side on rocky, uneven ground, is not a happy experience.

A New Kind of Geologist.

An English professor of geology says that he once received a call from a man who was at the head of a large commercial enterprise. He wished to consult the professor about the instruction of his son, who would ultimately inherit his vast business and wealth.

"But mind you," said he, "I don't want him to learn about stratums or dips or faults or upheavals or denudations, and I don't want him to fill his mind with fossils or stuff about crystals. What I want him to learn is how to find gold and silver and copper in paying quantities, sir, in paying quantities."

Unfortunately for such people, the preparation for no business in life can be kept down to such severely practical limitations.—Success.

Endeavorers' Reception.

The sixth division of the city's Christian Endeavorers gave a reception to the newly elected officers of the Brooklyn Christian Endeavor Union in the East New York Reformed Church on Thursday evening. Following the introduction to the members of the new superintendent and associate, addresses were made by W. W. Freeman, ex-president, on "Past Successes of Christian Endeavor in Brooklyn"; by the Rev. L. O. Rotenbach of the Bethany Presbyterian Church, on "The Spirit of Christian Endeavor," and by William R. Hassell, as president, speaking for the societies of the city, "Looking Ahead—Future Possibilities."

WAS SHAKESPEARE A CATHOLIC?

Carlyle's Verdict on the Point Accounted Right.

"Shakespeare's Protestantism is the title of an article in the June Fortnightly, in which W. S. Lilly attempts to prove that Shakespeare, altho he may have observed the Protestant ritual and ceremonies, was at heart an adherent of the older religion. Mr. Lilly says that in all Shakespeare's works there is only one piece of unquestionable Protestantism, and that is in Henry VIII., where Cranmer is made to prophesy at Queen Elizabeth's baptism:

"In her days every man shall eat in safety
Under his own vine what he plants; and sing
The merry song of peace to all his neighbors;
God shall be truly known——"

But nearly all authoritative critics agree that the scene in which this passage occurs is not Shakespeare's at all, but an addition of Fletcher's. Shakespeare himself always mentions the old faith with a certain yearning fondness. In 'Henry V.' he gives us a well-nigh perfect type of a Catholic hero, all whose public acts bear a religious impress, who believes in purgatory, in alms-deed, prayer, fasting, pious foundations, as satisfactory works for the souls detained there,' and 'whose Catholic faith and worship appear like the flowers of true devotion, not the weeds of superstition. In 'Friar Lawrence' we have 'one of his kindliest creations.' In 'Much Ado About Nothing,' writes Mr. Knight, it is the friar who, when Hero is accused, vindicates her reputation with as much sagacity as charitable zeal. In 'Measure for Measure' the whole plot is 'carried on by the duke assuming the reverend manners and professing the active benevolence of a friar. In an age when the prejudices of the multitude were flattered and stimulated by abuse and ridicule of the ancient ecclesiastical character, Shakespeare always exhibits it so as to command respect and affection.' In 'As You Like It,' 'an old religious man, a hermit,' it is, by whom the usurping duke.

was converted.

Both from his enterprise and from the world.

In "All's Well That Ends Well" we find—more daring still—a tribute to one of the most beautiful and touching doctrines of Catholicism in the recognition of the power of the Blessed Virgin's intercession:

What angel shall
Bless this unworthy husband? He cannot thrive,
Unless her prayers, whom Heaven delights to hear,
And loves to grant, reprieve him from the wrath
Of greatest justice.

A Catholic in Real Life.

In "Measure for Measure," says Mr. Lilly, the ethos of the play is strikingly Catholic. The whole play is informed by an idea quite alien to the Protestant mind. Carlyle was therefore right in accounting Shakespeare "the noblest product of Middle Age Catholicism."

And now, if from Shakespeare's works, we turn to the little that we know of his life, what does it tell us about his religion? Not much. It is certain that his youth was passed amid Catholic influences, for there seems no room for reasonable doubt that his father was "a popish recusant," and suffered many things as such. In Mr. Gillow's "Bibliographical Dictionary," mention is made of a very ancient Catholic tradition that he was "reared up" by an old Benedictine monk, Dom Thomas Combe, or Coombes, from 1572. This is the more probable as it would account for the knowledge which he possessed of things Catholic, and especially of Catholic philosophy. That he was married in a Protestant church, that his children were baptised in a Protestant church, and that he was buried in a Protestant church, proves nothing about his religious opinions or principles. There can be no question that those who welcomed the change in religion and those who detested it, earnest Protestants and zealous Catholics, resorted alike to the clergy of the Anglican establishment, during many years after the accession of Elizabeth, for baptism, marriages and burial.

The only positive statement as to Shakespeare's religion that has come down to us is a note added by the Rev. Richard Davies, rector of Saperton, in Gloucestershire, till 1708, to the biographical notice of Shakespeare in the collection of the Rev. William Fullman; "He dyed a Papist." The precise date of this note we do not know, but it was written subsequently to 1688—more than seventy years after Shakespeare's death. Nor do we know where Davies obtained the information. All we do know is that he had access to some trustworthy traditions, since he was first able to mention the connection between Shakespeare's clodpate Justice and Sir Thomas Lucy. Davies' entry is probably what Mr. Halliwell phillipps has called it, "the casual note of a provincial hearsay." But Mr. Simpson's contention that Shakespeare's opinions were Catholic, and "that, with such opinions, he probably would, if he had the opportunity, die a Papist," does not seem excessive. More than that we cannot say.

King Edward's Zebra.

Zebras as carriage horses and for riding purposes may soon be a common sight, for a recent experiment at the London Zoo has demonstrated that these beautifully striped animals can be easily tamed and that they are even more docile and easily managed, when broken in, than the gentlest of ordinary horses, says Black and White.

After spending four hours in breaking in a zebra, Captain Horace Hayes is able to ride it handily.

His first pupil was Jennie, a 9-year-old zebra, presented to King Edward by the Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia. When first led into the paddock she was fidgety and nervous. In order to soothe her Captain Hayes stroked her gently with a long rod. She stood quite still during this proceeding, seeming not to resent it in the least.

But when a man approached her with a halter, she plunged and reared, racing madly around and around the paddock. Presently she quieted down, and the trainer got near enough to slip a rope around her right leg. She tried to kick it loose, but in doing so got her left leg tangled in it. She was thrown forward on her front legs in a kneeling position, and then, with a gentle push, sent rolling on her side. Her four legs were then bound with ropes until she was utterly helpless. For an hour she was left in this plight, then the ropes were removed from her feet and she got up a subdued and submissive creature.

She stood still while a bit was placed in her mouth and a saddle strapped to her back. Captain Hayes climbed into the saddle, and Jennie consented to be ridden. She makes an excellent saddle horse, intelligent, fast and thoroly to be relied upon.

Is full of uncertainties and difficulties, and so is life. Old age frequently finds early visions of future affluence still unrealized, but this is a difficulty which can, to a great extent, be overcome by endowment insurance. It is an investment about the realization of which there can be no uncertainty. If the insured, at any time after three years, becomes unable to pay the remaining premiums he may then take a paid-up policy for an amount proportionate to the number of premiums already paid. This is only one of several privileges for the protection of the policyholders. The name

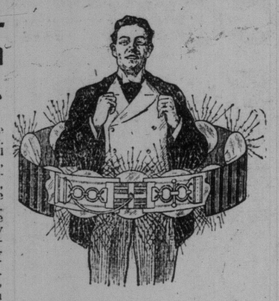
Happy Manhood

Free to Men Until Robust Health, Strength and Vigor is Regained.



All men with very few exceptions were made strong and should be so through life. Many have abused this grand privilege and through dissipation have become weaklings, puny, lack confidence, can't face the slightest difficulty, have drains, losses, varicocele, rheumatism, lame back, etc., and are mere plaything in the hands of their associates. How deplorable, but all these men can be made full of strength, vigor and life if they will only turn to the right source. Electricity cures these cases. I have been curing thousands every year for nearly forty years. So positive am I of what my world-famed Dr. Sanden Electric Belt will do that if you will call or send for one you can use it until cured and

NO PAY UNTIL CURED

Not a penny on deposit or in advance. I will take your word for results, and only charge price of belt—many cases low as $5.

My wonderful success has brought forth many imitations of my belt, but my valuable experience to advise and guide my patients cannot be imitated. It and my belt can be had free until a cure is effected.
