The Western Real Estate Exchange.

78½ Dundas Street, London, Telephone 696,

Was never in a better position to meet the demands of intending purchasers than at the present time. We are constantly adding to our already extensive lists numbers of the best farms in Western Ontario.

The purchaser will see the advisability of consulting us when he can in a short time receive more information regarding quality, location and desirability of properties than he could in weeks of travel in search of a home. We have at the present time between 200 and 300 farms ranging from 25 to 350 acres to select from. We also have a number of city, town and suburban properties.

Now is the time for intending sellers to place their properties in our hands for sale, as we are making out new lists of farms which we have for sale and exchange, and we were never more prominently before the public than at the present time. b

RECEIVING THE ROYAL TOURISTS!

Heir to Briton's Throne Welcomed by the King and Navy.

Poet Laureate Indites an Ode on the Royal Home-Coming — Effective Illumination of the Warships.

Portsmouth, England, Nov. 1.—This historic old town has witnessed so many naval reviews and state functions that it has ceased to be excited by displays of bunting and maneuvers of steel-sheathed fleets. Flags were fluttering everywhere along the waterfront when the Ophir entered the harbor, under the escort of the Victoria and Albert and other yachts, and there were swarms of spectators on the Southsea Esplanade, but the town was decorated with a meager hand, and the crowds were listless and undemonstrative. The return of the Duke of Cornwall from a circuit of 50,000 miles could not have been regarded as a trivial event, but naval pomp and imperial spectacles had been witnessed so often that the populace had learned to take its pleasures sadly. Probably the heir to the throne had not heard such half-hearted cheering since his departure from England as that which greeted him along the waterfront at Portsmouth. The flotilla passed Clarence pier about 3 o'clock, and the spectators were silent, until at the last moment a conscience-stricken enthusiast took off his hat and called for cheers, and then the response was feeble. There was more enthusiasm when the Ophir reached her berth in the harbor, but the duke's reception on the whole was singularly unemotional.

THE NAVY'S WELCOME.

The channel fleet had formed earlier in the day in a double line across Spithead, and the King and Queen, in the new royal yacht, had gone out, while the guns of the fortifications were booming, to meet the Ophir towards Yarmouth Roads. This meeting was a less formal affair than had been originally planned, but the processional programme was carried out in detail. Royal and admiralty yachts escorted the Ophir through the squadron into the harbor. There were sixteen battleships and cruisers, and each was dressed in rainbow fashion. Each ship had a full complement of men on deck, and a salute was fired while the bands played the National Anthem. The escorting flotilla, including three royal yachts and the Enchantress and Irene, slowly passed through the watery lane, sentineled by a powerful vessel of war, and headed directly for the mouth of the harbor. Along the Southsea Esplanade the fortifications were manned by 1,700 soldiers, and one after another fired a royal salute, while the band was playing "God Save the ing," and now and again, handkerchiefs fluttered and cheers were raised. Nelson's Victory was the gayest ship in sight, being profusely decorated and looking graceful indeed in comparison with the fleet of floating batteries and machine shops guarding Spithead. It was a general holiday — dockyards were deserted by workmen, and every coigne of vantage along the waterfront was filled with spectators, but the scene, while stately and splendid, lacked color and animation. There was little real enthusiasm and the crowds were impassive and silent.

NIGHT ILLUMINATIONS EXCELLENT.

A naval spectacle is always disappointing, even on a clear day. Modern ironclads are improving in lines, but are not picturesque objects even in the full regalia of holiday bunting. They are forced to anchor a long way apart, and all cannot be seen at once, afloat or ashore, until nightfall, when searchlights are operating, and broadsides are aglow with electric lamps. Spectators by daylight could see little, except smoke from the funnels and the encircling lines of bunting, and as the wind was off the land they could barely hear the strains of the National Anthem and the booming guns. At night they were more fortunate, for the fleet in the offing and the Ophir and royal yachts in the harbor were splendidly illuminated, the lines of every battleship and cruiser being traced in silhouette with electric lamps. Nelson's ship again carried off the chief honors for decorative effort, the words "Welcome Home" in enormous letters being the feature of the night show.

NOT A DISPLAY, BUT A WELCOME

Neither British naval resources nor the intricate scheme of the defense of Portsmouth by iron citadels and the chain of fortifications were ostentatiously displayed. The heir to the throne was merely received in state by the King, with the channel squadron in the background, after his return from an imperial mission, and the people of Portsmouth, accustomed to water pageants and naval salutes, looked on without emotion, but not without patriotic pride and sincere loyalty.

POET LAUREATE'S GREETING.

The poet laureate's greeting, entitled "A Royal Home-Coming," denotes the imperial character of the duke's mission and contains, in better verse than he has recently been writing, a poetic acknowledgment for his public service.

IN LONDON.

London, Nov. 2.—Cheers greeted the Duke and the Duchess of Cornwall and York today as they passed on their triumphal return from their world tour, through the crowded streets of London. The ceremonies passed off excellently.

The King and his reunited family bade farewell to Portsmouth to the strains of the naval bands. All the ships in the harbor were gaily dressed, and the weather, as in London, could not have been finer. The royal train arrived at Victoria railroad station at 12:56 p.m.

Dense crowds of people gathered there to welcome the royal party.

TO DISPROVE SOME CURRENT RUMORS

Hotelkeeper Ross Writes a Letter Exonerating Detective Northgraves.

Mr. J. H. Ross, of the Queen's Own Hotel, Sarnia road, has handed out the following statement, which he makes to quiet rumors that have been afloat regarding Detective Northgraves, to the effect that he was the informant in the case, and that he tried to induce Mr. Ross to compromise the case. The charge was one of selling liquor during prohibited hours on Sunday, Oct. 6, and was disposed of on Oct. 16. The papers in the case were not served by Detective Northgraves, but by Detective Ward. The letter reads.:

"This is to certify that I, J. H. Ross, never had any reason to blame or to suspect Detective Robert Northgraves for laying any information against me, nor did he serve any paper on me or advise me to settle. J. H. ROSS."

—The theatrical entertainment given at Cullis' Hall, on Thursday, in aid of the pastor of Horton Street Baptist Church, were enjoyed by a large audience. The undertaking was a creditable one, and those taking part deserve much praise. Rev. Mr. White delivered a brief but witty address, and Miss E. Irons and Mrs. E. Wilson particularly distinguished themselves.
