HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE

BY MAY CHRISTIE

Copyright, 1920, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

LXXXV—An Unpleasant Meeting.

Alice crimsoned at the sound of Tony's voice. To be caught thus, after having so cleverly attempted to put me off the scent!

She gave a muttered exclamation.

As for me, I walked resolutely to the door, opened it, and—closing the door carefully behind me—confronted Master Tony.

He was looking very smart indeed, in riding kit. Perhaps at no previous time had his curious likeness to my Jim been more apparent. It was only a superficial likeness. The demeanor and expression were quite different. But, physically, there was a marked resemblance between himself and Jim. No wonder the short-sighted jeweler had been wholly deceived.

At sight of me, Tony looked considerably taken aback. He opened his mouth as though to speak, then—awkwardly, like a fish out of water—he gave a sort of gasp, and closed it again.

At the same time, he took a step backward. Perhaps he was afraid I might do him some physical injury, so furious I must have looked!

"Helene! You—here?" he stammered. He put a hand up to his soft, close-fitting collar, as though it were choking him. "What the dickens——"

I didn't speak. I only looked at him with a gaze of withering contempt.

At last he found his voice. He gave a sickly sort of smile that was vastly unbecoming.

"Jolly nice to see you! You look topping! Maybe you'd join Alice and me in our morning canter in the park."

The words died away on his lips as he saw my expression of contempt deepen.

I took a step toward him. My eyes—condemning, ruthless—were fixed upon his face.

"Tony, are you staying in this hotel?" My question cut through the air like ice.

"Why, no, Helene, of course not," he stammered. "I—I'm at my club——"

"Your club?" I repeated incredulously. "I understood you'd been kicked out of there, as well as out of many other places!"

My remark was not conciliatory, and I knew it. Open warfare was declared.

"I'm at the Rangers," he said, quite humbly. His humility might have disarmed any other woman. But I knew Tony.

"I've warned Alice against you, and I see my warning's had small effect," I went on, stonily, "so I just want to tell you straight that if you don't leave her alone, I'll stir up the whole matter of the diamond bracelet. I'll expose you, Tony. I'll have no mercy. Even if the police are dragged into the case, I'll see it through. No, you need not deny your part in the affair. I know it all. And then, too!"—my voice grew more contemptuous—"you had the nerve to pawn the bracelet and keep the money. Oh, you cad!"

Tony grew pale with wrath. He caught me by the arm.

"You needn't let the whole hotel know your—your vile suspicions," he stammered, "I—I could have you committed for libel—on what you've just said."

"Do so, please. And a good thing, too. Just do so, if you dare!"

He hesitated for a moment. And then he said, quite gently:

"Come downstairs, Helene, and let us talk this matter out. Flying into tempers won't do any good. Besides, it's such bad form——"

I could have laughed out loud. Tony—the robber of reputations—the parasite at rich women's tables—the sneak-thief—to instruct me in good form!

We went downstairs together. Tony caught me firmly by the elbow. He led me into a small, secluded reading-room just off the public lounge.

"You're determined to make an enemy of me, Helene." He lowered his voice to the old, caressing note I know so well. "You're anxious to rake up every blessed thing you can against me. I call it downright cruel, considering what I feel for you, and have always felt. You're mighty rough on a chap—"

"I'm interested in Alice's reputation, that is all," I cut in coldly. "I'm not going to stand by, and see you make a mess of her life. You never were to be trusted, Tony——"

He sneered.

"Alice can take care of herself, without your interference."

"I'm afraid she can't—the more's the pity!" I said sharply.

Tony wheeled round, still with the sneer on his lips.

"Why must you take on the role of guardian angel?"

"I promised Alice's husband, when he went away——"

Tony gave a sneering laugh. He looked at me meaningly.

"What about your own husband, Helene? What of him?"

I felt the blood rush to my temples and hammer there. My husband? What had Tony heard? Oh, what did he suspect?

Then the bomb burst.

"Don't look so fussed, Helene. For I know all your secret marriage!" he said coolly.

MAYOR OF WINDSOR DECLARES L. D. ACT MUST BE OBSERVED

Edict Issued Three Weeks Ago Ignored by Standard Hotelmen.

HEAVY FINES PROMISED

Hotels Have Been Crowded With Americans Seeking Liquid Refreshment.

WINDSOR, June 1.—In face of the flagrant inattention to the edict of Mayor Winter and the police commission ordering that hotel bars, confectionery stores and cafes stop the sale of near-beer on Sundays, his worship today, following a conference with Crown Attorney Rodd, in which the latter stated the city was quite within its right in imposing the restriction, again notified the hotelmen that the Lord's day act must be observed and business closed for the Sabbath.

Heavy fines will be meted out to violators in the future, the mayor declared. The closing order was first given out three weeks ago, since which time the bars have continued to be crowded with Detroiters who cross the river weekly for a Sunday out and in search of "refreshments."

Windsor hotelmen, who have ignored the Sunday closing edict, assert that the municipality has no power to interfere with hotels operating under standard hotel licenses.

TILLSONBURG TO VOTE ON INCREASED PRICE OF GAS

TILLSONBURG, June 1.—A complete understanding has been reached by the Dominion Natural Gas Company and its many consumers in Tillsonburg. Next Tuesday the ratepayers vote on a bylaw to allow the gas company to increase its rates from 40c to 45c per 1,000 feet the first year and 50c per 1,000 for the remainder of their franchise. As these prices are far below the cost of either coal or wood, there is not much doubt but that the bylaw will be carried. All manufacturers have now been cut off, while a neighboring town now using a total of 30,000 feet will also be cut off and the supply diverted to Tillsonburg. The gas company at present hold leases on 31,320 acres south of the town, with 2,417 acres being operated, leaving a huge reserve for future drilling, and if the bylaw carries thousands of dollars will be expended in the drilling of new wells, three of which will be drilled this year.

The congregation of Avondale Presbyterian Church is making big preparations for their anniversary services next Sunday. Rev. Captain J. M. McGillivray, pastor of Knox Presbyterian Church, St. Thomas, will have charge of both services.

CARELESSNESS OF OWNERS OF BEACH COTTAGES

Water and Gas Taps Left Open When They Returned to City.

CHATHAM, June 1.—When Chatham citizens locked up their cottages at Erie Beach last fall many apparently left both gas and water taps open, and when water and gas were turned on Sunday there were plenty of indications of their laxity. The water tank, which supplies the village, was emptied in 15 minutes. Had the gas service been continued during the winter months many explosions would have occurred, according to a beach official.

Officials of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission are in the district, giving information to farmers with a possible view of the extension of the hydro system to various sections of the county, when more power is available.

Building permits issued by Fire Chief Pritchard during the month of May just passed a value of $55,610.

GAS PRICES WILL GO HIGHER IN SARNIA BEFORE THE WINTER

thorities and Gas Company Officials Planned.

SARNIA, June 1.—Headed by Mayor William Nisbet, the entire council will, it was announced tonight, confer with the officials of the Sarnia Gas Company over a proposed revision of rates. The session, it is expected, will take place early next week. According to Mayor Nisbet, the rates, if they are changed as the result of the conference, will be raised before the winter months. The gas company officials have issued no statement on the subject beyond stating that the company will need a higher rate in order to continue improvements and to give a better gas pressure.

There was a dearth of marriages in Sarnia during the month of May, only eleven couples uniting in marriage. Death took a toll of 37, and 33 births were registered.

During May 79 building permits were issued by the building inspector's office. Twenty of these were working-men's homes. The total value was $92,450.
