History of the Earth.—The earth itself relates its own history. No historean ever composed such a narative of extraordinary events, or depicted them in such intelligable characters. The geological history of the earth tells us that there was a period when there was not a living being upon the surface of the globe. The primary rocks have not yet been found to contain a single fossil, or any vestage of animal life. The first forms of life that were placed upon the habitable globe seem to have been of the most simple kind, and successive generations of these grew up and perished, lived and died, before beings of more complicated structure were introduced. The scale of being commenced with a simple living fibre or tube like the polypi, with an inherant tenacity of life, that does not belong to organizations with more instruments of sense, more complexity of structure, or more extent of powers. Lichens and mosses, and ferns, appear to have been among the first specimens of vegetable existence. The different strata of the earth are vast pages in the geological history of ancient but unnumbered days, which exhibit the recrements of extinct species of animated beings, that successively inhabited the earth and the ocean; of which we know that they have been, but have ceased to be. Whole generations of beings that once were have perished without leaving any progeny; and the only memorials which they have left of themselves, are in their forms or skeletons that have been preserved in the ancient stratifications of the globe.—Fellowes's Religion of the Universe.

A Good Rebuke.—Dr. Dunscome took his seat in the House on Tuesday, and shook hands with too or three of his intimates, but the House generally received him with a coldness calculated to freeze the heart of a stone. The doctor, with a degree of unfeelingness without a parallel in any thing human, thrust forth his hand to a gentleman whom he had calumniated to Lord Gicnelg, with a look coaxing to its cordial shake, but our sycophant was met by the indignant frown of the injured, who thundered in his ears these appalling words, "Sir, if all you have said of me be true, I am fit to shake hands with no man; and if it be false, you, sir, are not fit to shake hands with me.'—Toronto (U. C.) Patriot.
