and the change of policy adopted by the Grand Trunk Railroad, in cultivating local traffic in preference to carrying through freight from the far West to the extreme East at merely nominal rates as compared with the charges on local freight. By this beneficial change, produce dealers are able, at all seasons, to make direct shipments to Liverpool, against which they can draw at once, instead of remaining comparatively idle during the winter, as has hitherto been the case. The Northern Railroad had, also, they said, largely increased its storage capacity, thereby supplying a want long felt. When I reach, in these traveling letters, a description of the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railroads, it will be seen that they could not confer great and good services on this country, as they do, without the American through traffic. In 1861-62, the passengers and freight crossing the frontiers at Niagara and Detroit rivers, yielded 75 per cent of the whole income of the Great West-ern main line. The year 1863 has opened with American business still increasing; the Company thereby being enabled to dispense the elements of industry and wealth through the western forests of Canada.
