Daniels Cut Down Wardrobes in Navy

Abolishes the Full Dress Outfits For Officers and Also the Gold Epaulets

Washington, June 18—Secretary Daniel's has issued an order cutting down the wardrobes of naval officers to a minimum. Gone are the special full dress outfits which ate up a large portion of the officers' pay. Cocked hats, epaulets, and full-dress belts also are forbidden. The order reads:

"As a result of the lessons learned during the war, during which officers of the navy were only required to wear the ordinary service uniform, as the result of which this uniform was found to meet the requirements for both formal and informal occasions, to effect economy and space on shipboard and facilitate ease in traveling from one station to another, a general order has been issued abolishing as part of the naval officer's equipment the following articles of clothing:

"Special fulldress coat; mess jacket; fulldress trousers; mess trousers; a cocked hat; epaulets and full dress belts.

"The following prescribed uniforms are abolished by the order:

"Special fulldress; white special fulldress; fulldress; white fulldress; dress; evening fulldress; dinner dress and mess dress.

"The action will result in a great saving to the officers of the service in the future, as they are required to purchase all articles of uniforms at their own expense. The only uniforms now authorized to be worn are: Undress, service dress, white service dress, and evening dress, but only the service dress can be worn until the president's proclamation that the war has closed. Epaulets will not be worn with evening dress hereafter."
