COUNTRY GIRL IN THE CITY

UNMISTAKABLE EVIDENCE THAT SHE IS WELL ABLE TO TAKE CARE OF HERSELF.

Venerable Tradition Upset by Experience--Girls Who Had Little Money or Influence Doing Well.

"I believe the country girl in New York is a fake: a hoary tradition, without foundation in fact," said an observant woman the other day. "I mean the girl who has left the farm or the village home to seek her fortune in the great city, and arrives at a point where she is trapped, without money, home, friends or position.

"I never saw one like that. All the country girls I ever met in New York were doing well.

"I sat the other day in the office of the woman who is at the head of the woman's department of one of the biggest insurance companies in the world. She makes an income of $5,000 a year.

"She was an Iowa school teacher, originally, glad of a place at $60 a month, I fancy. Some enterprising agent managed to insure her, and she got so interested in insurance that when the summer vacation came around she began to write insurance herself.

"She did so well that when September came she did not go back to the schoolroom. She wrote insurance steadily, and in ever increasing amounts, until when the company decided to open its woman's branch it brought her to New York and placed her at the head of it. In fact, I think it was her arguments largely that induced them to establish the new department."

"But isn't she an exceptional woman?" asked the listener.

"Evidently, since there are few of us who make $5,000 a year. But the remaining four who sat in her room that day were all from the west, and all were doing reasonably well. One was an insurance agent, one was a doctor, one was a teacher of physical culture, and the other was a newspaper woman; $1,600 was the lowest yearly income represented, and they had all met there quite by chance.

"I know another young woman in New York who began her business career as secretary in the office of the board of education in a city of the middle west. All her tastes were for art.

"This led her to take an interest in the work of the agent who came to introduce a new system of drawing into the city schools. Eventually she started to sell drawing books for the same firm.

"She traveled for ten years for that firm, introducing their system into the schools of different cities. At the end of the decade she was ready for another step up. She came to New York, opened offices on Broadway, and started an advertising agency.

"She understood artistic advertising, and has done well. She has four assistants already, and is making money.

"There is another successful woman in New York who was born in a little mining camp in Wyoming. Her parents were the only Gentiles in the place. All their white neighbors were Mormons, and the mine laborers were Chinese.

"Later her parents moved to California and her first wages came as a reporter, at the age of 17, on a local paper. Five years age she came to New York and got a place in the business office of a leading magazine. She went from there to an advertising agency, where she had charge of the correspondence with out of town clients.

"She devised for her department a following up system which is considered a model of cleverness and simplicity. Then one of the biggest electrical companies in New York invited her to edit a monthly bulletin which it proposed to start.

"Since then she has been one of the busiest women in New York. She edits a little advertising monthly, designs cards and signs and turns out folders and booklets; and with all this original work gets through an amount of routine which would appall a good many men.

"There was another young woman who was teaching in a town in the far west. She had been teaching a number of years and wanted a year's vacation, which she could not afford. Also, she had never been east of the Mississippi, and wanted to spend a year in New York, which she also could not afford.

"She got a year's leave of absence, came to New York, and went to some friends while she was looking about her. She did not feel herself at liberty to stay with her friends more than a few weeks; and, like most schoolteachers, she had only a limited number of dollars ahead. So if she was to spend a year in New York it was incumbent upon her to find something to do speedily.

"Before her friends knew what she was about she had hired a little $15 a month flat away down in the tenement region, near the business district. She put in a gas range and a telephone, bought cooking utensils, paper boxes and a small stock of groceries, and started into serving noon lunches in the business offices. Eventually she had her year in New York, with a variety of experience which proved a perfect rest from teaching.

"She got back her capital and quit with as much money in her pocket as she had when she began. She might have gone on and extended her business and made a real success of it."

"Why didn't she?"

"Well, she decided to go back to Montana and marry a man who had been wrathfully waiting for her to finish her year's vacation in New York. It was a disgraceful capitulation, but she had proved that a woman could come to New York a stranger and make a living without finding a job.

"One of the fashionable flower stores uptown is conducted by a woman who started a few years ago with one greenhouse in a New Jersey village. Now she has eight, from which she supplies her own store.

"Some years ago there was a girl employed in a candy store in Buffalo. She had a genius for decoration. Julia Marlowe happened to play 'As You Like It' in Buffalo.

"The girl dressed the candy store window to represent the forest scene in the play. It attracted the attention of an Englishman who was wandering around Buffalo in search of Niagara Falls. He was a member of an old London confectionery firm. He sought out the girl and made her a good offer to go to London.

"She went, and introduced American window decoration into his shops. Her methods were successful. Her table decoration work became so favorably known that she was called on to decorate tables for the Princess of Teck and other swell personages.

"But after two years she 'heard the West a-callin' and returned to America to travel for drug and candy firms. She made one of the few successful saleswomen on the road.

"One day an employer who had recently added canaries to his stock, asked her to find out, if she could, why his birds were all dying off. From that she gradually came to devote all her time to birds, and now has the best-known hospital and boarding house for birds in New York.

"There is a clever little woman uptown who does beautiful things with leather. Each year, for several years past she has brought out a holiday edition of the 'Rubaiyat,' consisting of a very few copies, each bound by herself in leather. She decorates rooms with magnificent panels of stamped leather, makes splendid screens and all sorts of things for plutocratic patrons.

"She was a California girl whose father lost his money and then died. She began to sell for money the beautiful leather things she had been making for love of the work.

"She made a success of it in San Francisco, and then she came to New York, because she was convinced that she would find a larger public here that understood the sort of wares she had to offer. She keeps a room full of women now busy in doing the routine work, while she simply makes the unique designs and furnishes the personal touch which makes her work characteristic."—New York Sun.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, of the Standard Oil Trust, has recently had such a revelation and such a travail of soul. And it came about in this wise:

There lives in what is known as the "light" district of the Ohio oil fields—that is, the district where the wells yield so niggardly as to scarcely repay the labor expended—a worthy farmer who has acquired a lease of a small independent well. It is sold to the Standard Oil Company, and pumped daily into the large tanks which that concern has established at convenient distances. We say the average yield is only two or three barrels per diem. The worthy farmer's well, however, could not be put in the same category with the others in the district. With unfailing regularity it produced a sup
