VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED NOTIFICATION OF DISABILITY PENSIONERS OF ELIGIBILITY FOR HIGHER WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recent increases in war veterans and civilian war allowances have created a disparity between these allowances and disability pensions. The disparity creates the effect that veterans with 75 per cent disability or less and who earn no other income may be losing many dollars annually; and in too many cases they are not made officially aware that they are eligible for the higher rate under war veterans allowances. In order to overcome this disparity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

● (1110)

That this House recommends that the Minister of Veterans Affairs direct that all veterans who are eligible be notified forthwith and that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—APPOINTMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE OF LABOUR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has he succeeded in completing the appointments to the Anti-Inflationary Board? I think that three members were contemplated. Has someone who would be reasonably credible from a labour point of view been sought and found? Has the process been completed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that as a member of the permanent group of eight, we have one person who was very closely identified with labour. I believe there is a vacancy left amongst the three Ottawa members. We are attempting to get somebody there, not necessarily to identify with labour but somebody who will be able to understand their point of view.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—COMMITMENT OF MRS. PLUMPTRE TO CONTROL PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): The process has not been completed. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he has confidence in Mrs. Plumptre's commitment to the controls program that he has announced, particularly in view of Mrs. Plumptre's statement in Edmonton on March 6, 1974, in which she said, among other things, and I quote:

—while any government in a sharply inflationary environment might be tempted to start down the general price control path, it was a path that led all too quickly into a morass of tensions and antagonisms between national groups and classes and regions.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember that statement by Mrs. Plumptre. However, having myself made statements that prices and incomes control could very well lead to a morass of complications, I am not surprised at that statement. It is obvious that Mrs. Plumptre shares the government's view that it would have been better if we could have cured inflation without going into controls, but since she has accepted a position on the board, she has come to the view that this kind of action is required at this time.

I might add to my previous answer that I was not intending to imply that the six people now appointed to sit are not able to understand labour's point of view. The point that the Leader of the Opposition was making is one with which I agree. It would be good if we could have some people as members of the board who in the past have been more directly associated with labour.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister how many people accompanied him, the Minister of Finance and Mrs. Plumptre on that bus ride to Damascus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—ABILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO SELL PROGRAM TO THE PEOPLE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Given the fact that the vice-chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board in a speech yesterday expressed reservations about some of the limits of the government's program, and indeed expressed grave reservations about the exclusion from the program of prices at the farm gate, and given the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress have mounted a half million dollar campaign to oppose the government's program, how does the Prime Minister expect to sell this program to the people of Canada, if the vice-chairman of the board has doubts about it and organized labour in Canada is going to oppose it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I would need to ascertain what the Vice-Chairman of the board said. I have not heard the quotation to which the hon. member refers, but I am sure if she accepted membership on the board knowing what would be in the white paper and the legislation, the interpretation given by the hon. member could not be the correct one. As regards labour, I repeat what I said yesterday. We were given a very fair hearing by labour. Obviously, we have not led them to change their minds yet but I hope the meetings we had and the suggestions which were made, invitations made to them to improve any aspect of the plan they thought was deficient, will bear reflection on their part and that they will come around to seeing that not only will this plan work but that it must work if we are to prevent this disease of inflation from crippling our society.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO ENFORCING REGULATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Given the fact that unenforceable law is bad law and faced with the proposition that organized labour in Canada has indicated that it will not support the program—indeed, that it will campaign against the program—and this in the midst of a potential wage settlement by the government with the postal workers which will destroy what credibility is left in the program, I ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to assure the House before the bill now in committee is passed by parliament that the government intends to enforce this law and that it intends to meet again with the representatives of organized labour to ensure that some kind of compromise can be worked out, because we all realize the stakes are high.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It goes without saying that a law voted by this parliament will be obeyed by all the citizens of this country.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—ABILITY OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS TO AVOID PROFIT CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Since the success of the government's policy in controlling price increases is dependent upon an accurate knowledge of profit levels, particularly of those of multinational corporations, I should like to ask the minister whether he can explain the statement by Mr. James Gourlay, director general of audit for Revenue Canada, reported in the press today in which he said with reference to the profits of multinational corporations:

> These companies don't move today unless they know all the tax laws and then they just run around them. They can do it in such a way that you really can't point the finger and say "You have done something wrong".

The substance of his comment was that hundreds of millions of dollars are lost annually in this way. Would the minister explain how the government hopes to control price increases through the profit control mechanism, particularly in connection with multinational corporations?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): One of the obligations I feel the Department of Revenue has is to secure the best available expertise, as much expertise as possible, to see that these end runs do not take place. Part of that operation, as I think Mr. Gourlay explained, is the work of the Inter-American Centre for Tax Administrators where we look into that aspect on a binational basis. In mid-November I shall be meeting with my opposite number, Mr. Don Alexander, the Commissioner of the IRS and with regard to such action as the multinationals are taking, we hope to get them where it hurts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The minister did not tell us precisely in what way the government plans to make changes in order to avoid the situation so described. Is it his view that the statement reported in the press is accurate and that we are losing hundreds of millions of dollars in tax revenue? If so, what precise steps has the hon. gentleman in mind to plug this major loophole in the control program?

Mr. Cullen: I can do not better than quote the words of my predecessor who said at one time:

> It is important that we collect from multinationals the correct amount of tax based on income earned within Canada so that other business enterprises and individuals are not required to pay more than their share.

That is our goal and we shall do our best to see that we attain it.

● (1120)

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—PROVISION FOR REINVESTMENT OF EXCESS PROFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The minister is sounding like his predecessor. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a final supplementary question pertaining to another kind of loophole in the price control mechanism. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was quoted in a speech he made in Calgary the other day as saying that excess profits would be permitted well beyond the guidelines if these profits were reinvested in new capital facilities. Is this not, in the minister's view, the loophole to end all loopholes? Would not any corporation rather expand its investment into new capital facilities rather than pay taxes to the government of Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the special levy that we have proposed regarding exports. We think it is very likely that the export revenue of Canada will recover, and the proposal is that the special levy on export revenue should be refundable if it is to be invested in new capacity in Canada, which I think it can be said is in the interests of all of us.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF MERCURY POLLUTION ON HEALTH OF INDIANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In view of the minister's responsibility towards the native people, could he say what measures his department is taking to solve the problem resulting from the mercury pollution of some rivers? We know that much of the fish the Indians eat is mercury poisoned. Can the minister say what steps he is taking?

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, measures are being taken and being examined jointly with the provincial government, which has responsibility in this area, to provide alternate sources of suitable protein for the people involved.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR CONCERTED ACTION BY GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS TO STOP MERCURY POLLUTION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the minister, since his colleague the Minister of the Environment stated in Miami Beach on October 7 last that the best procedure was to make haste slowly, whether he could use his influence to ask his colleague of environment and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to exert pressures jointly. Three departments, I think, are involved in this problem. Steps must be taken to prevent any irreparable injury to those people who consume large quantities of fish contaminated by mercury.

[English]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to pursue the matter with my colleagues.

TRADE

CONSULTANT'S CONTRACT WITH ROY McLAREN—EXAMPLE OF GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but first of all may I congratulate him on being promoted to take over the best department in government. My question is one of which I have given him notice and I am sure he will have an answer for me. Was a Mr. Roy McLaren of Toronto recently taken on by his department with the purpose of improving the department's image with the Canadian business community at an annual salary of $50,000 a year, with an operating allowance of $40,000 a year, and with no requirement to move from Toronto to Ottawa?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question and also for his kind words. I agree with him about the department. It has been improving substantially over the past seven, eight or nine years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: With a start like it had, it could not help but improve.

Mr. Jamieson: With regard to Mr. McLaren's contract, I will be very glad to send the hon. member the details of it. Essentially it is a $50,000 a year contract for two years. However, that is the gross amount. In other words, there are no fringe benefits or anything of that nature involved, so it is substantially less than that in actual retained earnings. I might also say, by the way, that he took a substantial reduction in income in accepting the position.

In so far as expenses are concerned, they are fully accountable. There is a ceiling of $20,000 annually. He cannot spend more than that for travel or any expenses of that nature. As to whether he will in fact live in Ottawa, no firm decision has been made on that but he has the choice of remaining in Toronto or moving to Ottawa. If he is going to stay in Toronto and commute, there are the normal transportation allowances, etc. that are paid in all such cases.

On the last point, Mr. Speaker, it is not so much a question of improving the department's image. As I believe the hon. member knows, there has been a great deal of interest lately in having a closer liaison with the business community, particularly in relation to the international turn key projects, overseas missions and the like. It will be these in large part upon which he will be concentrating.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as this is the first time it has ever been found necessary to improve the department's image with Canadian businessmen, a very sad state of affairs, and I can assure the minister that in the past the department always had a very good image with Canadian businessmen, will the minister indicate whether this is the government's idea of cutting down on unnecessary government expenditure and setting an example of restraint for the Canadian people?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member means by the department's image having been better in the past that he is better looking than I am, I am completely prepared to agree with him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: On the other hand, let me assure the hon. member, as I said a moment ago, this is not by any means an image building operation. I can assure the hon. member if he is interested that there is a very important necessity for closer liaison, particularly in terms of Canadian businessmen getting to know how the various new programs, including the turn key projects, and overseas and developing country projects, can function, and this will be his primary responsibility.

Mr. Hees: I have one final comment, Mr. Speaker. I had no idea that things had deteriorated so much and were so bad.

POST OFFICE

PROTEST BY UNION OF POSTAL WORKERS AGAINST LETTER CARRIERS SETTING UP A POSTAL SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a telegram from union officials of CUPW complaining that members of the letter carriers' union have set up their own postal service in the Nova Scotia region which, according to CUPW officials, is absolutely against the law?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received such a telegram. I have suggested that a return telegram be sent to this official of CUPW suggesting that we have referred the matter to the Department of Justice for study, and they will move at their usual speedy pace—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What will Basford say about that?

Mr. Mackasey: —which means a decision one of these days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: That will help the Department of Justice.

Mr. Mackasey: In the meantime, one must commend certain Canadians for their initiative and wish them well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Similar operations are going on in, I suppose, about 20 centres that are now back to work. I would suggest to the official of CUPW who sent out the telegram that he spend a little more time in communication with his president and the negotiating team to resolve the very few differences that exist between our position and that of the union.

While I have the opportunity, I might suggest to the hon. gentleman who is the consumer critic for the opposition that in his question to the Prime Minister he has misrepresented the facts. The proposed settlement with CUPW is well within the guidelines.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Hold your press conference outside.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

ALLEGATION OF BIAS AGAINST CHAIRMAN OF BOARD IN CONNECTION WITH CERTAIN PIPELINE HEARINGS—GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION AT COURT HEARING

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a very serious question to the Minister of Justice regarding an application now before the National Energy Board by Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Limited and Foothills Pipelines Limited of Calgary. A challenge objection has been filed by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee. Has the Minister of Justice, his department or the government looked into this challenge of Mr. Marshall Crowe, chairman of that committee, to the effect that he may have some preconceived ideas in respect of the applications of these two major syndicates I have mentioned? This is an application or motion for prohibition which endeavours to prohibit the chairman from sitting. He is a graduate from western Canada and has held many high positions in the public service. I would also ask whether the Department of Justice intends to appear to make certain on behalf of the chairman that this is a fair and proper hearing before the court?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the matter to which he has referred has been referred by the National Energy Board to the Federal Court of Canada. At the present time I am considering what role the Attorney General of Canada should have at this hearing.

● (1130)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, as this is generally a speedy and extraordinary remedy which is being taken, would the Minister of Justice be prepared, if he is not able to answer today on such a serious matter related to the question of energy, which is one of the important factors in reference to inflation, to answer in the very near future and put in a representation for counsel so that Mr. Crowe, who was appointed by the government as chairman of the National Energy Board, a board appointed by the former Conservative government, will get a fair hearing.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, in answering the first part of the hon. member's question as to whether we will give a speedy reply, the answer is yes. I am endeavouring to ensure that justice is speedy in this country.

ALLEGED EVIDENCE LARGE CORPORATIONS CONTRIBUTE TO INFLATION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF EVIDENCE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. There was a report in today's Globe and Mail in which the deputy minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Dr. Sylvia Ostry, was quoted as saying:

> It seems clear that at times large and powerful industries have played an important leadership role in the inflationary process. As well, there is considerable evidence that prices in concentrated industries are less responsive to changes in the general level of business activity.

In other words, it is suggested that larger corporations are not responsive to competition and are major contributors to inflation. Would the Prime Minister say whether the deputy minister was enunciating government policy when she made that statement.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the member would draw some conclusions from the fact that we have made these guidelines enforceable precisely against these large corporations so there does seem to be a valid point in the statement of the Deputy Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and our precise action in this case seems to reflect it.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this: Since the Prime Minister's royal commission on corporate concentration will not report for at least another year and has already pointed out that it will not look at the adequacy of the combines legislation, can the Prime Minister at least request the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the deputy minister to table this body of considerable evidence the deputy minister talks about dealing with the effect of corporate concentrations and their contribution to inflation, so at least the House will have access to this considerable body of evidence when giving consideration to Bill C-73.

Mr. Trudeau: There are two points, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the Bryce Commission is beginning its hearings next week and that the New Democratic Party is submitting a brief to it. That is fine and we will see what argument they have. But if I were to make any suggestion, Mr. Speaker, it would be that the hon. member and his party, rather than be interested in these theories, should back the government's program which precisely is going to restrain prices against those very corporations.

INFLATION—PRIME MINISTER'S VIEW ON PERCENTAGE INDUCED DOMESTICALLY AND INTERNATIONALLY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in this regard. I am under the impression that in July 1974 the Prime Minister indicated that the rise in our galloping inflation was primarily induced internationally whereas we, on the other hand, said it was induced domestically. I should like to ask the Prime Minister which one takes precedence and what percentage of our 11 per cent inflation rate now is domestically or internationally induced.

Mr. Speaker: In fairness, I should say that I have some doubt that this is the kind of information an hon. member should expect to receive during the question period. Perhaps the question might be posed in another way.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks the present rate of inflation at 11.2 per cent is primarily induced domestically, and to what extent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): To a large extent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have just one supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REASON FOR OMISSION OF DAY CARE COSTS FROM INDEXING

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance of which I have given him notice. Why was the deduction for day-care cost not included among the income tax deductions subject to indexing, indexing incidentally which was a proposal first suggested by my leader, ridiculed by the government and now espoused as a breakthrough in policy development.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my advice is that those provisions of the Income Tax Act with regard to the child-care allowance did not have the benefit of the indexing provision.

An hon. Member: Why was it not included in the announcement the other day?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In answer to the hon. gentleman's question as to why that was not included in the announcement the other day, it is because it is not in the law. I am prepared, of course, to undertake consideration of that for a future budget.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO COVER ASSAULTS OCCURRING DURING SPORTS EVENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the action by the Attorney General of Ontario with regard to violence in hockey, as the minister has admitted in the House, would only deal with the situation with regard to the existing law within the Criminal Code, would the minister consider amending the Criminal Code in order to make it clear, since the league probably would use the same kind of defence that was used in the Minnesota Forbes-Boucher case, that violence in hockey—and I refer to situations which can be seen as criminal assaults outside of sports—and assaults within professional sports will be charged as criminal assaults, as they would if they occurred outside of sport.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that we have the same difficulty in Canada as in the Minnesota case, but I would be happy to consider the Code. I will be meeting with the Attorney General of Ontario very shortly on a number of matters and will raise this with him.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

CONSTRUCTION—MEASURES TO AID SMALL FIRMS AND ENSURE CO-ORDINATION OF FEDERAL AND MUNICIPAL CONSTRUCTION PLANS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, might I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the fact that small construction businesses show a declining proportion of total construction sales yearly, will the minister inform the House what steps he is taking to ensure the viability of these many small companies?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will understand, apart from saying in a general way that we certainly will take all the steps we can, that I have been discussing with the various elements in the construction industry how our activity might be meshed with the activity, for instance, of the Department of Urban Affairs and the like, but anything beyond that I would not be able to cope with in a general answer in the question period. However, I will be glad to discuss it with the hon. member or perhaps answer a specific question.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, has the minister consulted with his cabinet colleagues in both the Department of Public Works and the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs to consider the co-ordination of federal and municipal government construction plans to ensure a more even rate of growth in the industry?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is one of the things I think the hon. member will know was proposed in general terms in a recent report of the economic council. I should point out, however, that there is an ambivalence in much of what I am hearing these days from, for instance, the business community which is insisting on substantial cuts in government spending but which also is asking what we are going to do to stimulate construction across the country.

GRAIN

COMMITMENT BY RUSSIA TO BUY FROM CANADA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the United States and Russia have signed a multi-year agreement on grain sales, would the minister give his assurance to the House that Canada will still be a number one supplier of Soviet Union requirements in the upcoming years and whether or not Russia has given a definite commitment to the Canadian Wheat Board in this regard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Soviet Union has once again confirmed it will look to Canada first for grain and that our very long-standing and mutually beneficial relationship with them is still firm.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether any thought is being given to signing a similar agreement with Russia or any other country to ensure a basic export sale of grain in future years so far as Canada is concerned with the countries to which we export?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board is prepared to discuss and does discuss long-term arrangements with different countries from time to time and had indeed some of those arrangements. The question did come up between the Soviet Union and Canada during the last discussions between the Canadian Wheat Board and Exportkleb and it was agreed by them that the long standing and firm commitment that we have is in fact a better arrangement than a formal specific agreement.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

SUGGESTED STUDY OF STRUCTURE AND EXPENDITURES TO PROMOTE EFFICIENCY AND REDUCE EXPENDITURES

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the President of the Treasury Board and all our House committees have been active in identifying areas where we can reduce expenditures and that the need for even more reductions of greater magnitude is being made apparent, will the minister consider a broad study of the fundamental structure of government and its expenditures to promote more efficiency and savings in the total government operation, a study such as the one carried out by the Glassco Commission?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a constructive suggestion. I will be glad to give it further consideration and discuss it with my colleagues.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRANSLATION OF TECHNICAL DOCUMENTS INTO FRENCH LANGUAGE—REDUCTION OF COST BY NOT TRANSLATING OBSOLESCENT DOCUMENTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It has been reported that the DND is spending $250 million to translate technical documents into the French language and it has been stated that 50 per cent of the job could be eliminated if it were decided not to translate anything that will be out of date in five years. Will the minister be calling a halt to the translation of the documents that will soon be out of date in the Department of National Defence?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the plan to translate technical documents is proceeding, but the ones that are most essential will be translated first. We will be looking at all the documents with a view to seeing whether or not a translation is required, and this would of course include those that could be outdated in five years.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR IDENTIFICATION OF EXEMPTIONS FROM PROFIT GUIDELINES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it relates to profit guideline exemptions. It is related somewhat to the questions put to the minister earlier by the leader of the NDP. Considering that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has suggested that industry profits which are reinvested in projects to increase productive capacity may not be covered by the guidelines, will the minister identify all the exemptions that are to be permitted from the profit guidelines and whether any company which reinvests its earnings in productive capacity increases will be exempted from these controls?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have confirmed with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that his remarks were with respect to profits from the export business. We will be bringing forward some proposals with regard to a special levy.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—NUMBER OF COMPANIES TO WHICH GUIDELINES ON PROFIT-FLOW BETWEEN SUBSIDIARY AND PARENT APPLICABLE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is prepared to consider profit flows from subsidiary to parent organizations as a special case in the application of profit guidelines, will the minister explain to the House in what way subsidiary-parent transfers are indeed special, and inform the House of his estimate of how many companies there are to which such a special arrangement might apply?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member knows, the bill is before the standing committee and therefore that kind of question should not be put to the minister here.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS AND FUNCTIONING CONSULATE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the honourable and learned Secretary of State for External Affairs, whom I welcome back from ceilidh, and it is in reference to the regrettable situation in Lebanon. Can he report to the House on the continuing function of our mission and the safety of Canadian nationals there?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank my hon. friend for his welcome. The situation is that the Canadian mission has been advising Canadians for some days now, that unless there are compelling reasons to remain, they should leave the city and leave the country. With respect to the embassy staff, the policy is to send out dependants and other members of the staff who are not able in the circumstances to carry out their functions effectively. There is no question of closing the embassy or removing it. The embassy will continue to function in order to provide consular services to Canadians still remaining in the country. To my knowledge, as of yesterday it was still possible to leave by way of commercial airline and the authorities were providing security and assistance for persons who wanted to take advantage of that possibility.

ENERGY

ELDORADO—IMPORTATION OF EUROPEAN WORKERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A week ago a telegram was sent to the minister, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and other ministers in connection with Eldorado Nuclear Limited importing into Canada some 60 Europeans when there are available in northern Saskatchewan close to Uranium City 128 Indians and Metis who have the necessary physical and mental capacity to fill the positions. Has he consulted with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in this connection, and will he assure the House that the company will be informed clearly and definitely that it is not in keeping with the Canadian spirit to import Europeans when Canadians are available for employment?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the President of Eldorado and we have discussed the program with the company with respect to the employment of these people. I can assure the hon. member that there are such persons, that is Indians, on strength at present and we are most anxious to increase the number and to provide training facilities so that they can take their place along with others.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the meantime, has the minister suggested to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and with the assistance and support of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that this group of Europeans should be told to stay over there so that the positions can be filled when the Indians and Metis have the necessary training, which at present has been denied to them?

Mr. Gillespie: I should like to reassure the right hon. member again that we are making every effort—

Mr. Diefenbaker: But when?

Mr. Gillespie: —at the present time, and this has been going on for some months, if not longer. At the same time, there is a serious shortage of certain skills which are not available and which require many years of training. For that reason, the corporation is looking to other sources as well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Forget Canadians and bring in foreigners.

POSSIBLE CREATION OF FEDERAL SECURITIES COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): My question is for the Minister of Justice. Is his department considering the creation of a federal securities commission to complement the provincial bodies and, if not, why not?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter on which the department and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have been doing considerable work in the past. I think the question should be more properly directed to my colleague.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—METHOD OF MONITORING PRICE INCREASES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of a statement made yesterday by the chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board that the board will ask 100 of the largest firms to identify their main product lines as a basis for an efficient system of price monitoring. In view of the minister's admission yesterday that the government had difficulties with drafting a list of corporations to be covered by the guidelines, can the minister tell us how the board will handle the complexities of price monitoring?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this seems to me like one of the questions that might appropriately be asked in the committee and I will be glad to deal with it there.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the intention of the Anti-Inflation Board, as announced by its chairman, to change the regulations governing the program as often as necessary to ensure that they are equitable and workable in their daily application, can the minister explain to the House how an effective system of price monitoring and control can be carried out in such a climate of change, or does the minister agree with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that virtually all excess profits will be exempt from the guidelines, thus making price monitoring unnecessary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Similarly this question should be put to the minister in the standing committee.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF DEDUCTING MORTGAGE INTEREST FROM INCOME TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

As the home ownership assistance program is about to expire without the housing problem having been solved satisfactorily, and as the minister stated he would soon announce new measures in this regard, can he tell the House whether he intends to include in those measures to encourage home ownership the possibility for an owner to deduct his mortgage interest for tax purposes?

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I really could not indicate that without divulging the program. It will address itself, however, to the very real problems of high carrying costs of which interest rates are a major part. I will be making an announcement to the House on Monday on this matter.

EFFECT OF ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM ON HOUSE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the minister advise the House whether the restraint measures which the government will take to fight inflation will slow down the home buyer assistance scheme and result in a further aggravation of the housing crisis in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has set housing as a priority and it continues to be a priority. We are approaching it from the view of supply so that it is indeed anti-inflationary and job creating. I think the hon. member will be pleased with the announcement I will make on Monday.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR EARLY TABLING OF ALL SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the serious doubts raised by the President of the Treasury Board yesterday in his very partisan speech on the helpful motion put forward by my leader, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he would undertake before the Christmas recess certainly, and hopefully before we complete discussion on Bill C-73, to bring in all of the supplementary estimates for the present fiscal year so that the House and the country will know the extent by which the deficit proposed by the former minister of finance is going to be exceeded and how successfully the government has been in cutting off the fat and frills on the existing estimates this year?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I will consider the suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

SUGGESTED RELIEF FROM PENALTIES FOR FAILURE TO RETURN TAX MONEY IN VIEW OF POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister now assure the House that he will honour the principle of the Postal Services Interruption Relief Act and grant relief to all citizens of Canada who are under a statutory deadline to make returns of money or records to him under the taxing statutes, for example income tax, federal sales tax, unemployment insurance, etc., so that these citizens will not have to apply individually to a judge of the federal court for repeal in order to avoid undeserved fines and penalties.

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representation. It is a route which we intend to take.

ENERGY

PROPOSED ARRANGEMENTS FOR PAYMENT OF OIL EXPORT TAX IN VIEW OF POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would he accept the spirit of the law just mentioned by the hon. member for Lethbridge as it has come to my attention that people are having to travel from Calgary to bring their export tax to his office in Ottawa. That seems a waste of energy. Perhaps arrangements could be made to have this tax paid at the bank in Calgary or to the Department of National Revenue there rather than adding this wasted transport cost?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to look into that suggestion.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON PROBLEMS OF NORTHERN BUSINESSMEN IN OBTAINING CONTRACTS—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In July of this year the report of the task force formed to study problems encountered by northern businessmen in obtaining federal contracts was published. The report contained some 29 recommendations. Can the minister advise whether his department has taken steps to implement these recommendations and would he advise whether he is prepared to refer this report to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I believe there are 42 recommendations and subrecommendations involved in this. We have already taken action to implement ten. Five were not acceptable and we are still pursuing the rest which have involvement with other departments, agencies, and the territorial governments. I will have to take under consideration the question of referring the report to the committee.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ELIGIBILITY OF DISABILITY PENSIONERS FOR HIGHER WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—SUGGESTED NOTIFICATION OF PENSIONERS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As a result of the increases in war veterans allowances there is a widening disparity between them and the disability pensions of around 75 per cent. Would the minister advise the House if the pension commission or the War Veterans Allowance Board have been told to notify all those receiving disability pensions of less than 75 per cent and no other income that they could qualify for increased aid under War Veterans Allowances?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel that this information has been conveyed already by various means, especially the efforts of the Legion. They have undertaken to notify all veterans what is available to them.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that I think the minister is wrong and the information is not readily available to everybody, would he direct the pension commission when sending out their cheques to notify anybody who is receiving less than the rate that they can qualify for a higher rate? This should be done immediately.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, we will be glad to do this.

AIR CANADA

ESTEY REPORT—POSSIBILITY OF PREJUDICE TO COMPANY BY EARLY IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Concerning the Estey report and the suggestion to put some of its recommendations into effect immediately, even if the translation of the report is not completed, will the Minister of Transport assure the House that he will see to it that the principle embodied in the Official Languages

Act as regards the tabling of reports in the House is complied with, while ensuring of course that no prejudice is caused to the company referred to in the report?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our objective has been to attempt to get the report translated and available for publication as quickly as possible and we will certainly try to do that. I think that speculation about its content in the meantime can be a danger and we will see whether we can do anything to guard against those dangers.

BROADCASTING

PROPOSED PROHIBITION OF ADVERTISING OF NON-PRESCRIPTION SLEEPING AIDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Communications. In view of the fact that evidence has been coming forward that non-prescription sleeping aids may be ineffective and potentially harmful, and in view of the fact that the Federal Trade Commission in the United States plans to issue regulations prohibiting false advertising of non-prescription sleeping aids, could the minister advise the House whether similar restrictions will be placed on advertising such preparations by this government or if it has plans to review this whole area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me at the very least that my colleagues in the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would be more involved than the Department of Communications, but I will see to it that the representations come to their attention.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF BUDGETARY AND CASH DEFICITS FOR THIS YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of restraint in government spending being such an important part of any anti-inflationary program, and in view of the minister's references to the June 23 budget as being the basis of the current fiscal stance of the government, would the minister indicate if the budgetary deficit of $3.2 billion and the cash deficit of approximately $5 billion still holds or is a larger deficit on a budgetary and cash basis anticipated?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not proposing to make any statement on these figures at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: I bet you are not.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF PRICE FREEZE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. In a speech in Vancouver yesterday Mrs. Plumptre proffered what she called a well deserved compliment to the Premier of that province for his imposition of a price freeze, saying that he deserved compliments for his courage and statesmanship in taking these two steps. Has Mrs. Plumptre or the board made any recommendation to the government with respect to the imposition of a price freeze at the federal level and if not, is it the government's intention to impose such a freeze?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): We have had no such representation, Mr. Speaker, and it is not our intention to do so.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF PRICE FREEZE IN YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his capacity as the Czar of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Does the minister intend to cause the price freeze to be imposed in the two northern territories?

● (1200)

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not hear the first question and am not sure whether the hon. member was referring to government economic action. I have discussed with both commissioners the implementation of the guidelines with respect to territorial governmental operations and am awaiting their responses.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 974, 3,133 and 3,159. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

[Text]

POWER CORPORATION

Question No. 974—Mr. Rodriguez:

1. Does Power Corporation have any direct or indirect interest in exploration, importation, sale or transmission of any energy resource and, if so, what aspects and what resources?

2. Does the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have a direct or indirect interest by trust, family, or corporate device in Power Corporation or in any corporation providing capital of any kind in these areas and, if so, what is the nature of his holdings?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): 1. Power Corporation being a private corporation, information about its direct or indirect interest in exploration, importation, sale or transmission of any energy resource may be found wholly or partly in public records of competent regulatory agencies in Canada, the media generally and specialized periodicals particularly, and failing this, through inquiries directed to the Corporation's Headquarters or specialists in the field of energy or the capital market place.

2. No, with respect to direct or indirect interest by trust, family or corporate device in Power Corporation. As to the second aspect of the question, this is so broad in scope that it cannot be answered since it could embrace holdings of policies issued by private insurance companies, deposits in banks, trust companies and credit unions, some or all of which operate in capital markets.

VETERANS' HOSPITALS

Question No. 3,133—Mr. McKinnon:

1. As of October 1, 1975, how many veterans hospitals are still under the control and operation of the Department of Veterans Affairs and where are they located?

2. How many hospitals have been turned over to provincial or municipal authorities in the past three years and where are they located?

3. Is it the intention of the Department to force the handover of those hospitals which have not to date been handed over to provincial or municipal officials, or is it the intention of the Department to retain those hospitals indefinitely?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. Six: Camp Hill Hospital, Halifax, N.S., Queen Mary Veterans Hospital, Montreal, P.Q., Ste. Anne's Hospital, Ste. Anne de Bellevue, P.Q., Westminster Hospital, London, Ontario, Deer Lodge Hospital, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Colonel Belcher Hospital, Calgary, Alberta.

2. Three: Lancaster Hospital, Saint John, N.B., Shaughnessy Hospital, Vancouver, B.C., Victoria Veterans Hospital, Victoria, B.C.

3. It is still the intention that veterans' hospitals be transferred to the community under conditions acceptable to the Department.

UIC—NUMBER OF CLAIMS AND BENEFITS PAID IN 1974

Question No. 3,159—Mr. Reynolds:

1. (a) How many claims were made against the Unemployment Insurance Commission during the year 1974 (b) how many were initial claims?

2. What were the total benefits paid for the year 1974?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned—1 and 2. See Statistics Canada Publication 73-001 entitled "Statistical Report on the Operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act".

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND THE APPLICATION OF THE ACT

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-28, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Canada's animal health standards are among the highest in the world. As a result, our livestock and livestock products are welcome in practically every country of the world. Last year our exports of live animals, meat, poultry and livestock by-products were worth close to $475 million. They were shipped to 120 different countries, all requiring Canadian veterinary health certification of varying degrees.

Within Canada, more than half of all farm income comes from the sale of livestock and livestock products. In 1974, farm cash receipts for cattle, hogs, sheep, poultry, eggs and dairy products were more than $4 billion. The extent of our animal exports and the prosperity of the Canadian livestock industry is directly linked to the high standards of animal health which are maintained in this country under the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

The savings to the cattle industry because bovine tuberculosis has been eradicated is more than $15 million annually, not to mention the savings in human misery and hospitalization costs from bovine tuberculosis in humans. The reduction of brucellosis in cattle to less than 1 per cent of the cattle population results in similar savings, including the reduction of undulant fever in humans. It has cost Canada approximately one cent per marketed hog to maintain complete freedom from hog cholera. Prior to the present eradication program in the United States, it cost $1 per marketed hog to keep hog cholera under control through the use of vaccines. Before the introduction of the eradication program, hog cholera had cost the United States $75 million per year. Hog cholera has not been completely eradicated in the United States. Last July there was an outbreak in the state of Texas and, using eradication techniques, they eradicated some 3,000 swine.

These three examples, together with our livestock and livestock exports, which are dependent upon our animal health status, give adequate proof that it is to Canada's advantage, not only from a livestock production point of view but from a human health point of view, to maintain the highest possible standards of animal health.

The original act to control and eradicate animal diseases was passed by this House in 1869. Since that time it has been amended as needed to keep pace with changing conditions. We are now at a point in time when the act must be further updated if we are to protect Canadian farmers against livestock losses due to disease, and retain our international reputation and markets for high quality livestock.

This bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act provides, as set out on pages 14 and 15, clauses 31 and 32, authority for the development of a program for reducing the incidence of disease and sickness in animals entering or leaving Canada or being transported within Canada, and provides for humane treatment of animals. Over the years there has been an increase in the percentage of livestock losses sustained during long transportation across the country. In order to reduce and, if possible, eliminate these losses, regulations must be introduced to cover the movement of animals by truck, rail, air and ship within and out of Canada.

The bill, as set out on page 6, clause 4(3)(p), extends the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to regulate the construction, operation and maintenance of animal deadyards and rendering plants. It is important that the carcasses of animals that have died do not enter the human food chain. The bill provides us with such authority, including the important authority to regulate packaging and marking of the products of such yards.

The provisions for compensation payments to livestock owners whose animals must be slaughtered under disease eradication programs must also be amended. I am referring to clause 9 which amends sections 12(1) and 12(2) on pages 10 and 11. The present system provides for compensation values with the owner also receiving the slaughter value, where this is permissible, of the animal. The current compensation rates have created inequities. Many cattle have varying values due to various factors including breed, genetic value and resale value. The present system is also inequitable because dairy cattle have lower slaughter values than beef breeds. Those changes are also included on pages 10 and 11 of the bill.

The proposed amendment will change the basis for compensation to be the fair market value of the animal up to a maximum amount prescribed by the governor in council, less the gross slaughter value received by the owner. The change in the act provides for more equitable returns to the owners of livestock ordered destroyed under the provisions of the act.

Another area added to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act is extended authority for the control of artificial insemination centres. The artificial insemination industry in Canada has undergone marked growth in recent years, to the point where approximately 52 per cent of dairy cattle and 10 per cent of beef cattle are bred by artificial insemination and, in addition, exports of frozen semen have in recent years exceeded $13 million annually. In its present form, the Animal Contagious Diseases Act provides for the control of the health of all bulls entering artificial insemination units; but because of the rapid development of the industry, both in domestic and foreign markets, it has become necessary, in order to further eliminate possible disease spread, to extend the control of such units to include the collection, processing, storage and identification of animal semen.

At present, Mr. Speaker, there are no regulations requiring disease-free certification of animals exported from Canada. While we do test and certify the health of all animals being exported, it is considered that if we are to keep the foreign markets we have on the basis of our high health status—and people all over the world recognize that we have one of the healthiest animal populations in the world—there must be adequate authority to require such certification should we be faced with a situation where someone wishes to take animals out of the country without adequate disease certification.

Animal by-products, fodder and other articles are sometimes ordered destroyed to prevent the spread of infectious diseases. Bill C-28 extends compensation so that appropriate payments can be made to owners when this occurs.

As new or different methods of feeding livestock are introduced, there are new threats for spreading contagious diseases. The practice of feeding garbage to swine and poultry, for example, threatens to spread many diseases. The food that people in Canada throw away could feed our total hog population. Some of this is used to provide energy, but most is thrown away in the form of garbage. This could be used, but we must be certain that the disposal of both domestic garbage and garbage brought into Canada on ships and aircraft is adequately controlled in so far as possible livestock usage is concerned.

While the control of garbage is presently, and has been for a number of years, carried out under the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, our legal advisers tell us that authority for such control is not sufficiently clear in the present act. Therefore, the necessary authority is being more adequately stated in this bill. Again, while control of veterinary biologics, both domestic manufacture and imports, is carried on under the present act, it is considered that clarification of this authority should be more explicit.

The changes to the act will also allow for the setting up of health and disease control standards for zoos and game farms, make provision to require dairies, creameries and cheese factories to provide product samples for disease testing, and require foreign ships to seal their meat lockers and use Canadian meat while in our waters. This may seem rather extreme, but several years ago some sausage was illegally imported into western Canada and then thrown away. It cost this nation about $881 million to clean up that mess. Therefore, we feel that ships using our inland waterways should be forced to use Canadian meats. In this way, no meat from foreign countries will be dropped overboard or given to friends in ports.

In addition, a number of existing areas of authority under the act are being amended to make them more clear and effective. For example, Agriculture Canada has been working under the act to eradicate tuberculosis, brucellosis and other diseases on an area basis for 40 years. The existing legislation does not clearly provide for the establishment of such areas and this, therefore, is being corrected. In the same vein, animal semen, poultry, other birds, bees, reptiles, hatching eggs and fertilized ova are specifically included in the jurisdiction of the act in order to eliminate confusion or misunderstanding with respect to definitions.

I have recently received correspondence from some members of parliament and others with regard to the spraying that took place in Winnipeg, Windsor and other areas which caused damage to the bees. Under the present act, there is no way for the owners to be compensated for the loss of their bees. This amendment will allow compensation to be made. Imported hides and wool as a possible disease source are already dealt with under the act and the regulations made thereunder, but the authority for this control is again being clarified with the new definition of animal by-products.

I know all hon. members recognize that a strong act, with adequate authority to control and eradicate animal diseases and to prevent the possible introduction of contagious and infectious animal diseases into Canada, is absolutely essential for the well-being of our livestock industry. I am sure that members of this House, when giving consideration to this bill—and I must say we have waited a long time, as it is over a year since it was introduced in the House—will recognize the essentialities involved in order that it can be put into place as soon as possible.

I am convinced that Bill C-28, involving the control of infectious and contagious diseases of animals, including a number of such diseases transmissible to man, will be of benefit to all Canadians.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to take part in this debate on Bill C-28, an act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The Animal Contagious Diseases Act is administered by the Contagious Diseases Section of the Health of Animals Branch of Agriculture Canada. For the knowledge of hon. members, it does not have anything to do with the inspection of meat; it is a different section of the act.

The objective of the legislation and of the division is to keep and protect the nation's livestock population from contagious and infectious diseases. The division, operating under the authority of the act, controls and regulates the importation of animals and animal products, eradicates exotic diseases when they gain entry into the country, controls and eradicates established diseases, and is responsible for the certification of livestock for export.

Such an act, or something similar to it, first made its appearance in 1865. Since that time it has had many revisions and changes. Up to 1970, when the last revision was made, there had been 25 revisions and changes. The act has not been amended since that time except for the coming into force of section 14 on January 1, 1972. That is the date on which the Pesticide Residue Compensation Act came into force.

The Animal Contagious Diseases Act confers very wide powers and regulations for the achievement of the objectives of the act, namely, to prevent the entry of animal diseases into Canada and to eradicate or control those that are already established in this country.

It would be, perhaps, more convenient to summarize the legislation within the context of the three classic procedures for combatting disease, namely, exclusion, eradication and control. Under exclusion, the procedure includes measures to reduce to a minimum the means by which disease is introduced. Such measures include compulsory quarantine and inspection, embargoes, the importation of animals, animal parts and products from places where diseases are known to exist or not known to exist.

The act provides for the establishment of quarantine stations and for the destruction of imported animals known to be diseased or suspected of being diseased. Inspection is also carried out in ports on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, along the Canada-U.S. border, and airports, to enforce the provisions of the act. With regard to eradication, the legislation recognizes that in spite of the most rigorous inspection procedures, disease will from time to time be introduced into Canada from abroad. The act, therefore, confers very wide powers to test and, if necessary, destroy infected animals and animals suspected of being infected with or exposed to disease. If possible, destruction is avoided by quarantine of animals within designated areas, and subsequent treatment until authorities are satisfied that the disease has been eliminated.

All affected areas and premises are included under the legislation, as are all infected vehicles and vessels associated with the disease in question. The requirements of the law make it incumbent on all owners, breeders, dealers and importers of animals to give immediate notice to the Department of Agriculture of the appearance of any disease. Veterinary surgeons are also included under this requirement. The marketing, sale, exhibition, and so on, of animals is covered by the legislation, as is the removal of animals from an infected area. Where the diseases are eradicated by the slaughter of animals, the legislation provides for compensation to the owners.

Under control, where a disease has become established in Canada the legislation facilitates the investigation and reporting of outbreaks. Quarantine procedures can be instituted, and therapeutic measures, including vaccination, are carried out where possible. More than 600 individuals, including veterinary inspectors, are employed by Agriculture Canada to carry out the provisions of the act. Inspectors have full power of entry into "any place or premises or any steamships, vessel or boat, or any carriage, car, truck, airplane, horse-box or other vehicle used for the carriage of animals." Inspectors are empowered to make official declarations as to the presence of disease, and they also have the power to arrest offenders.

The foregoing is just a brief introductory summary of the main provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. Bill C-28 calls for the changing of the name of the act from its previous name to the Animal Disease and Protection Act, which more clearly describes the purpose of the act as amended. Much of the preliminary work regarding Bill C-28 was undertaken by the Senate Committee on Agriculture back in the spring of 1974 when it was introduced there as Bill S-2. At their hearings, which lasted for several weeks, the Senate committee heard representations from Mr. Charles Gracey, manager of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, from Mr. C. G. Munro, president, Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as well as from representatives of Canadian Pacific Railway, a representative from the Health of Animals Branch of the Department of Agriculture, representatives from the Canadian Council on Animal Care, the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies, the Canadian Association for Laboratory Animal Science, the Department of Justice, and others. In my opinion, the Senate Committee on Agriculture did a very thorough and excellent job and should be commended for their hard work. Much of Bill C-28 as it is now written has resulted from findings and information compiled by that committee on Agriculture.

Most of the changes advocated by Bill C-28 are progressive and timely. The new provisions call for the examination of all animals prior to being loaded in aircraft, railway cars, ships or other vehicles. This was not previously carried out. Overcrowding will now be controlled. There are to be more adequate provisions for feeding and watering animals transported by rail across Canada. The maximum number of hours animals can be transported before being unloaded for rest, food and water will be more adequately established. The act will establish guidelines in accordance with the specifications set down for the construction of animal stalls, pens, fetterings, containers, etc., and how they are to be maintained. There are also new provisions for the payment of compensation for hay, straw, fodder, foodstuffs, fertilizer, manure, containers, etc., if they are infected with an infectious disease. The compensation would be at market value.

One of the very few objections I have to Bill C-28 concerns the provision for paying farmers compensation for animals ordered destroyed by the Health of Animals Branch. Section 12(2)(b) provides:

> In case of cattle or sheep destroyed pursuant to any area or herd disease eradication program instituted pursuant to the regulations, such maximum amounts will be paid as may be prescribed by the governor in council for pure bred or grade animals minus an amount equal to the value of the carcass, as determined by the minister or a person appointed by him for that purpose.

This clause could cause considerable hardship to farmers if it is not interpreted sympathetically. If a farmer is called upon to suffer considerable loss as a result of disease such as brucellosis and tuberculosis and is forced to destroy all or most of his herd in order to eradicate the disease, his loss could bring him to the verge of total ruin should the compensation he receives be insufficient to replace his herd. I do not think a farmer should have to face losses of any kind when faced with such a problem. He has a hard enough time making ends meet, without having to risk losing his herd.

I believe the Department of Agriculture should take a much harder look at this section with the purpose of treating farmers more equitably in this regard. I am suggesting that a farmer should at least break even, enabling him to recoup his losses at no cost to himself. We should do everything possible to keep farmers producing and on the land. We should not discourage them, as this section could easily do. I urge the department and the Standing Committee on Agriculture to give more consideration to this provision, when it is brought before them for further examination, and to spell out exactly what amount of compensation they have in mind so that we may all know where we stand. The future of many farmers, whether they decide to stay in farming or not, may well depend on it.

One way to handle the problem of compensation equitably would be to pay a farmer replacement value for an animal ordered to be destroyed. Determination of this value would be made on the basis of the age of the animal, its quality and its probable usefulness in a producer's operation. Regard will be paid to the cost of importing new breeds of animals as well as to cross-breed programs involving beef cows and dairy stock. Compensation of this type would mean more flexibility, range and realism in the level of compensation paid. It would also make farmers better inclined to co-operate even more fully with the Health of Animals Branch in animal disease eradication programs, knowing that their personal losses would be recompensed and that they would be in a position to start again with new herds.

I should now like to say a few words about brucellosis. Brucellosis is an infectious disease of cattle characterized by abortion, retained placenta and infertility. The disease can cause undulant fever in humans and can be contracted if a person drinks raw milk from an infected cow or comes into direct contact with infected material. For many years, the control and elimination throughout the world of communicable animal diseases such as brucellosis has been the goal of the veterinary profession and of the livestock industry. The main reasons for this effort are that such diseases not only cause high economic losses to farmers and to the agriculture industry, but also that many of them, as the minister has pointed out, may be transmitted to man. We are fortunate in Canada that, through the concerted efforts and understanding of our livestock industry and the veterinary profession, Canadian livestock is now free from many of the foreign animal diseases which plague most countries throughout the world.

This is never an easy task, however. The prevention, diagnosis, control and eradication of communicable diseases are always complex because of the many and varied factors associated with their dissemination. When these problems are compounded by the use of vaccines and dependence upon a biological test for diagnosis, eradication becomes even more difficult to achieve. Brucellosis is one of the serious communicable diseases of animals. It has cost the livestock industry of this nation many millions of dollars each year. At the same time, it exposes the human population to undulant fever, causing suffering, misery and high costs in medical treatment and hospitalization. I, for one, am a prime example of that: during my practice I did get undulant fever and had a difficult time getting rid of it.

The obvious manifestation of brucellosis most often results in the abortion of the foetus, together with the decrease or total loss of milk yield of the dam. However, we are sometimes inclined to overlook the losses caused by temporary or permanent sterility and the reduced sale value of cattle in infected herds. In the early 1950s, these losses to the cattle industry in Canada were estimated at well over $10 million annually when the brucellosis infection rate for cattle was calculated as being between 8 per cent and 9 per cent.

Brucellosis control in Canada was started about 40 years ago in the early 1930s with the introduction of the voluntary brucellosis-free herd program. While the program was effective, primarily in closed pure bred breeding herds, it did little to reduce the national infection level. Therefore, in about 1950, following a national survey which showed an infection rate of almost 10 per cent, it was decided to institute a national program directed in the long term toward eradication of the disease. The first step toward this eradication was the establishment of the federal-provincial calfhood vaccination program. This program was the combined effort of the Department of Agriculture and the provincial departments of agriculture, with the federal department providing the vaccine and the provincial departments carrying on the program.

At this time it was recognized that actual vaccination itself was not the answer. We knew at that time that it would not completely eradicate the disease, but would lower the percentage of infection. I think the problem today is that some people have placed total reliance on the vaccination program in order to eradicate the disease, and the program will not do this. The fact of the matter is that we must have a test and slaughter program if we want to get rid of the disease completely. In addition, vaccination is only about 66 per cent effective and only two out of every three calves that are vaccinated are protected.

Despite this, the program was to a certain extent a success. In 1950-51 there were almost 150,000 calves vaccinated. By 1963-64 almost 1½ million calves had been vaccinated. By 1973-74 the number had gradually dropped off to almost 27,000 calves. In 1957, when the infection rate had come down approximately 4.5 per cent, we decided that a test and slaughter policy was the only way we could completely eliminate the disease. This test and slaughter, or eradication program called for the establishment of brucellosis areas throughout Canada with all cattle, excepting calves under eight months old, steers, spayed heifers and official vaccinates up to 30 months old being tested by the agglutination test, and reactors were slaughtered, with compensation being paid. By the fall of 1966, all of Canada had been brucellosis tested and, where necessary, retested to reduce the infection rate to .2 per cent. As a result, areas were considered brucellosis accredited for five years. During the period 1957 to 1966 approximately 191,000 reactors were slaughtered, with the high point being 33,000 in 1960-61, gradually reducing to 12,000 in 1965-66. During the same period, some 10,700 cattle were blood tested, with a total of $13 million being paid in compensation.

Again recognizing that total eradication could not take place in conjunction with mass calfhood vaccination, together with the fact that the national infection rate was below .2 per cent, it was agreed that the next step toward total eradication should be taken. This next step was a gradual de-emphasizing of calfhood vaccination which was commenced in 1971. It was pointed out by others that de-emphasizing vaccination was not in any sense the elimination of vaccination, because the elimination of vaccination would have to come gradually. Even at this, it was recognized that there would be difficulties in eliminating the last vestiges of infection, inasmuch as we would have to go through a period of vaccinal withdrawal. This means that as herds in which infection was being masked by calfhood vaccination gradually discontinued vaccination and developed susceptible cattle, the residual infection rate did begin to show up. In addition, as active infection showed up in these problem herds, it followed that there would be minimal spread to other herds, for we now had the bulk of our cattle totally susceptible.

A number of countries throughout the world have eradicated brucellosis, namely, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland and West Germany. As vaccination was withdrawn, these countries experienced difficulties in the elimination of the last vestiges of infection, similar to our present problem in Canada. However, they are now free and prohibit use of brucellosis calfhood vaccine. These countries reiterate and continue to report that in their view brucellosis vaccination causes confusion of the picture when eradication measures are in fact the goal.

Throughout Canada, in the fiscal year 1970-71 we had 3,884 brucellosis reactors in 170 herds. In 1971-72, these figures were 3,806 cattle and 153 herds, but in 1973-74, as the number of susceptible cattle increased and as the endemic herds began to show up, these figures rose to 8,849 cattle and 297 herds. When the 1974-75 figures are completed it is expected that the cattle number will be up slightly but the herd number will be up considerably because of herds having single reactors.

There has been a problem of complacency both in the veterinary profession and among livestock owners. Brucellosis being reduced to less than one-tenth of 1 per cent was unheard of or was very rarely seen in herds, and when abortions did take place one of the last things that herd owners thought of was brucellosis. I am just as guilty as anybody else in this regard. In my last three years of practice I never thought of brucellosis when I had cases of abortions, much to my sorrow when I found out by testing that brucellosis was the cause.

In addition to this complacency, less care was taken with respect to the movement of cattle from one herd to another. Less care was also taken in the purchasing of cattle, which meant, in fact, that infection did take place through movement of cattle. In days when the infection rate was high and everyone was conscious of brucellosis, infection did not take place.

What is being done in an attempt to eliminate this problem that we are facing today? What are we going to do about it, and how are we trying to combat it? First of all, in community auction sales, of which I have had two or three, all cattle going back to farms are being tested and, of course, backtagging of slaughter cattle is being done at these community auction sales. We are also ordering the slaughter of calves from infected cows and encouraging owners to get rid of reactors promptly. The cleaning and disinfecting of premises quickly and effectively has also been advocated. Again, this has been part of the complacency problem: there has been some difficulty persuading owners to dispose of reactors and they have been left in the herd. Perhaps it can be said that there has been too much leniency in letting owners keep these reactors in their herds to the point where they have spread infection before being removed and in the meantime additional cattle have been infected.

All livestock owners should take every necessary precaution possible with respect to brucellosis. No owner should add cattle to his herd unless the animal has been tested beforehand, held under isolation for 30 days and rested. It is imperative that owners report any abortions immediately and take precautions with respect to visitors to his herd. If these simple precautions are taken, the spread of infection from one herd to another, we can be assured, would almost be eliminated.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we are now faced with a choice with respect to brucellosis, having gone through national calfhood vaccination schemes, national testing schemes, a gradual drop in vaccinations and a gradual increase in the number of susceptible cattle in the country. We can keep the disease at a low infection level by carrying on with the present methods and continuing vaccination. This will not eliminate the infection, as I have said, but it will permit us to carry on with a low level of infection. This choice provides that if mass vaccination takes place throughout Canada, it will involve approximately three million calves a year, if we vaccinate all the calves in Canada, at a total cost of $12 million to $15 million annually.

The second choice which has been proclaimed—I certainly agree with it—involves the decision that brucellosis should be eradicated. In fact, brucellosis can be eradicated. As I have said, this has been done in other countries—and I mentioned them—and it can certainly be done here. With total eradication, I suggest that now or in the immediate future vaccination will be eliminated. It will take a while to do this, but if owners go along with the idea I think it is the only solution we have. It involves totally eliminating vaccination of calves against brucellosis.

In spite of the present opposition, I think we are making progress. With the co-operation and support of the livestock industry, it is felt certain that eradication can be accomplished. But the livestock industry must want eradication and must not want to live with infection. If we can convince the livestock industry of this fact, I think we will be well on the way to totally eliminating this disease. All of us working together in federal and provincial jurisdictions to fight this disease is the only way we can hope to eliminate it once and for all.

Our party supports the principle of Bill C-28, and except for a few changes that may be advocated at the committee stage, which may hold it up slightly, I see no reason for not passing the bill with the minimum delay.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who had to be in his constituency yesterday, would be here in time today to speak on our behalf in respect of Bill C-28. Since he has not arrived yet, perhaps I might say a few words to indicate our support of this bill. Indeed, I hope that it will not take long for it to be put into effect.

As the previous speaker, the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) indicated, there may be some details to examine more closely when the bill is before the standing committee, but in general we welcome this legislation. We are sorry it has had to stay on the order paper for a full year before getting to the stage of second reading.

As the previous speaker pointed out, perhaps one of the significant points to note is that the name of the act is being changed, and I suggest it is more than just a change of name. From now on, instead of this legislation being known as the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, it will be known as the Animal Disease and Protection Act. As the minister put it, and as notes in the bill make clear, this is consistent with the fact that provisions are being made in this legislation to deal not only with diseases that may affect animals but also with things that can happen to them in the process of transportation, and so on.

As the minister reminded us, this legislation has been around for a long time, having first been passed in 1869, and it is understandable that some updating is necessary. One of the ways in which that updating is clear, it seems to me, can be seen when one looks at some of the definitions that have had to be enlarged. For example, we now have a definition of "animals" which, as the minister says, includes a bee. We also have an improved definition of "animal products," "animal by-products," "infectious diseases," "reportable diseases," and so on. It is our view that these are all improvements, technical though they may be, which will make it possible for the department to administer this legislation in the interests of all farmers in this country and also in the interests of the consumers of livestock products.

I note in particular that there is a whole new part of the bill having to do with transportation. This seems both necessary and welcome. We note, also, the parts of the bill having to do with what can happen, or what must not happen to dead animals. This is something that has been of concern. I realize we are not now talking about matters that come under the Department of National Health and Welfare, but we are talking about a related matter. There is some public agitation and concern about this, and it strikes us that the minister's bill will meet these concerns.

Like the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe, I think a further look may need to be taken in the committee at the whole question of compensation for animals that are ordered to be slaughtered under the terms of this legislation. I join with him in saying a few words, particularly about the question of brucellosis. I think the speaker who preceded me, professional that he is in the field, was very much on the beam when he said the time has come to resolve the question as to whether we are going for vaccination or for the eradication of this disease.

As the minister knows, back in in the 1940s a very elaborate campaign of vaccination against brucellosis was launched. I understand at the height of that campaign it reached the point where a million or more animals had been vaccinated against brucellosis. More recently, the government has been de-emphasizing the brucellosis vaccination campaign and emphasizing the greater desirability of eradicating the disease completely. That, of course, means that the slaughtering of animals comes more and more into the picture.

I understand that in most parts of Canada the problem is reasonably well under control. In western Canada, I think it is under control in all provinces but Saskatchewan, and the authorities there are making progress. I understand it is under control in the Atlantic provinces. I am told that the worst problem is right here in Ontario, and perhaps the worst of all right here in the Ottawa Valley. While it is not something to be alarmed about, it is nevertheless a problem that should be conquered.

It seems to me that the criticism is valid when it is said the levels of compensation the government offers for animals that have to be destroyed because of brucellosis are not high enough to encourage the owners of stock to go for the eradication route. If you do not pay these owners enough for the animals that have to be slaughtered, then they are more interested in vaccinating, hoping they can gain by that economically. I suggest that the previous speaker was quite right in saying that the vaccination route is not a good one, but that eradication of the disease is what we must seek to achieve.

If this is the case, the amount of compensation must be sufficient to encourage stockowners to support the eradication program. To offer the owner of a good herd $500 per animal, when some of those animals may be very valuable breeding stock worth several thousand dollars, is not to encourage cattlemen to support the eradication program. I know that the government's approach to this problem is to suggest that owners of valuable breeding stock take out insurance against disease. Let me get my lick in by saying that is a good idea if the government will provide the insurance arrangement, but to leave it on an ad hoc or helter-skelter basis, I suggest, will not solve the problem, especially when such insurance is very costly or perhaps not even available.

I gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe that his party will support the bill generally, and in fact that most of the details are acceptable. I agree with him that there needs to be a good deal more discussion in the standing committee about the rates of compensation for slaughtered animals, and I hope such discussion will take place. I join the hon. member, on behalf of my party, in supporting the eradication route with regard to brucellosis as better than the vaccination route. But if we expect the farmers to join in supporting such a program, I believe we shall have to do a lot better than this legislation provides in respect of providing compensation. With those few remarks, I am happy to indicate that this party will be voting for second reading on Bill C-28.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-28, the amendments to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. This bill has been on the order paper for over a year now and I think it is important that it be dealt with now. This is very important legislation. As previous speakers have mentioned, its predecessor was one of the first acts passed by the new parliament shortly after confederation in 1869.

An hon. Member: Stanley Knowles should know.

Mr. Foster: There is an important change in the name of the act which reflects the change in direction. I refer to the change from an act of parliament that was essentially introduced on the premise of contagious diseases to one which deals with other aspects such as the protection of animals, especially during transportation.

As I understand it, the control and regulation of the shipping of animals has been limited in the past by a section in the Criminal Code which specifies that every 36 hours animals must be unloaded, rested, fed and watered. However, there is no provision under this act or through the Health of Animals Branch of the Department of Agriculture to control transportation of animals. However, there has been co-operation by the transportation companies with the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture in exercising control in this regard. Important research studies have been carried out in regard to transportation and the results of those studies which are still being carried out will be reflected in the new regulations which will be written when these amendments are passed. This really adds another important dimension to the regulation and control in respect of the health of animals moving from the narrow limits of contagious diseases into the matter of the protection of animals, especially during transportation.

I am not sure people in this country fully appreciate the importance of our animal contagious diseases control program as it is carried out by the Health of Animals Branch of the Department of Agriculture. In 1973, over 120 countries received either live animals or animal products worth some $700 million that were stamped "Canada Approved". This stamp indicates approval by our veterinarian inspectors under the authority of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. It became apparent to a recent parliamentary delegation which recently visited Cuba that perhaps the most important trading link Canada has with that country is the exportation and importation of many thousands of dairy cattle. This has improved Cuba's whole economic situation and the nutritional position of that country. The co-operation in this regard, I must say, is very much appreciated. Other countries such as Ceylon or Sri Lanka have benefited because of co-operative programs involving exchange of our professionals and information, as well as the supplying of a veterinarian college to Ceylon several years ago.

Few Canadians are aware of the fact that we have two quarantine stations in the mouth of the St. Lawrence River. There is one at Grosse Isle and one at St. Pierre Island. At these two points we regularly inspect and carry out a quarantine program in respect of the importation of cattle from other countries, especially western Europe. This involves the breeds that are not so familiar to us here in Canada. In this way we are in a position to test these animals and bring them in with an assurance that really serious diseases such as foot and mouth disease will not infect our Canadian livestock. At the same time, we have an opportunity to bring these breeds in for breeding purposes and thereby improve our general livestock population.

It seems to me there are three or four important aspects of this bill. One is transportation. Another is the change relating to compensation and the technical changes that are applied in this bill. I have already mentioned the important changes that are proposed to control transportation of animals. Surely, it is more appropriate that these be carried out under the Department of Agriculture than under the Department of Justice, and the Criminal Code.

I should like to refer briefly to the compensation sections which the hon. member, my colleague in the veterinary profession, the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) has mentioned. He referred to the importance of this change in the compensation program and that it will be more adequate for ensuring that the agricultural community is adequately compensated for animals which must be slaughtered. I think the present system provides that the livestock owner who has an animal which is condemned for slaughter receives a fixed amount plus the salvage value of the animal that has been ordered to be slaughtered. This creates inequities, because if the animal is slaughtered and the meat is suitable for human consumption, the farmer receives a fixed amount plus the value of the animal, but if the animal is condemned he merely receives the flat compensation amount.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is one o'clock. Perhaps I could call it one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, before we adjourned for lunch I was talking about the compensation provisions under Bill C-28. The present method of compensation for livestock owners who have animals which are condemned because of disease provides a fixed amount of compensation. In some cases, on top of this the owner is able to realize the salvage value of the animal. However, this varies a great deal depending on the circumstances and whether the animal can go for food purposes or whether it has to be condemned for food purposes. Under the bill before the House, the livestock owner will be compensated to the fair market value. It seems to me that this method of compensation is much more fair to the livestock owner.

Also, there is provision in the bill for compensation for fodder or feed which has to be destroyed because of the diseased condition of the animals on the premises. I think the committee should look at other aspects when a complete herd must be depopulated and income is curtailed for short periods of time. This is something which requires much more study, but I think the committee will want to look at the idea of making provision for this in the act. At some time in the future it may be deemed advisable to write regulations in this regard. That is not to say that the livestock owners do not have a responsibility. It seems to me that they have a responsibility, when purchasing animals, to take adequate precautions related to sanitation and disease.

Good assistance is available from the Health of Animals Branch with regard to the testing of samples of blood or whatever biologic is used to examine the animal for disease. The bill also clarifies many parts of the existing act which perhaps are not as clear as they should be in light of the existing health programs and disease control programs which are now in effect in the country today. These relate to the designation of areas for disease control. There is further clarification of definitions such as concerning animals, birds, bees and domestic animals which are covered by this act, as well as veterinary biologics which have been covered previously, but the terminology is further outlined.

I think one of the important parts of this bill relates to the section concerning deadyards and rendering plants. In the past year we have had a great deal of publicity in this country concerning dead animals which were diseased finding their way back to the human food chain. This bill makes provision for the regulation of deadyards and rendering plants right to the construction, operation and maintenance of animal deadyards and rendering plants and the regulating of packing and marking of products of deadyards and rendering plants. Surely this is a very important addition to our health of animals program and further identifies the reason for changing the name of the bill, which refers to animal and human protection, as well as the infectious aspect of the bill.

Another aspect which is covered by the bill is the regulation and control of semen for artificial insemination purposes. Surely this is a very important aspect of Canada's export program. I understand that two million vials of semen are exported to some 30 different countries each year. It is important that there be control of diseases which might be spread in this manner.

I think it is important to recognize how much progress has been made in the control of disease in humans and animals because of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act over the years. Some 40 years ago, the program for control of bovine tuberculosis was initiated and it has been very successful in controlling the disease in cattle and in humans, too, because the disease often came from the reservoir within domestic animals.

In the past few years, a great deal of progress has been made in the control of brucellosis in cattle. This is called undulant fever in humans. In 1951, 8 per cent to 10 per cent of our cattle population was infected with brucellosis, with an annual loss, in terms of milk and calves aborted, of some $9 million. By 1956, as a result of the vaccination program, infection from brucellosis in the cattle population was reduced to 4.5 per cent. The test and slaughter program started in 1957 and the first testing was completed by 1966. The effect of the program can be seen in the reduction of the infection to .2 per cent of the total cattle population of 15 million. This is a dramatic success story.

As one who was engaged in the practice of veterinary medicine when the program was introduced, I must say I was a Doubting Thomas. I did not think a disease as infectious as brucellosis could be handled so effectively through a test and slaughter program, as tuberculosis had been in previous decades. That is not to say that we do not have infected herds in Canada today; obviously, with a .2 per cent rate, there are still some. It seems to me that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and his advisers in the Health of Animals Branch will have to decide in the next year or so whether to go completely for the test and slaughter program or continue with vaccination.

I was very pleased to hear the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) support the idea of the complete elimination of the Calflood vaccination program. I think this is the direction we should move in, and that the continued vaccination, although it may be encouraging and useful to the individual cattle owner, is not as useful in the over-all picture of disease control in Canada. Continued vaccination only complicates the testing procedure and masks infection in animals. I hope in the next year or so the government will move to discontinue the vaccination program which some provinces still encourage. If we do eliminate vaccination, I think we will have to provide a more extensive compensation program, especially when a complete herd is depopulated and the owner's income curtailed.

I believe that the people who administer the Animal Contagious Diseases Act are among the unsung heroes of the public service in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and should be congratulated. Thanks to them, we have one of the most healthy and active livestock exporting countries in the world. They make it possible for us to trade in livestock with 120 nations around the world. They are one of the most important factors of our livestock industry. I believe this bill will strengthen the powers of the government to carry out the contagious diseases aspect of the work of the department and the new area of protection of animals in transit, as well as the other aspects of public health.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to participate in this debate on the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) indicated that Canadians have little appreciation of the bill, and I think that is quite true. If we were confronted with an epidemic of undulant fever, tuberculosis or foot and mouth disease, as in 1952, the case would be different. The bill is important, however, and deserves the attention of this House. Therefore, I am pleased to add my comments.

I was interested in the minister's opening remarks when he reviewed the history of the bill. I am sure he would want me to add one or two points to what he said. The bill was introduced in 1869, as he indicated, but I think he would like to know that was the first agricultural bill introduced in this House, and it was introduced by the Conservative government under Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Whelan: With the co-operation of the opposition.

Mr. Holmes: And we are interested in co-operating with the government on this bill, which we believe is excellent in principle although we have reservations about certain aspects of it. I want to deal in a general way with the bill and then come to some of the specifics, particularly the transportation section, which is new. The bill has been introduced as a vehicle to maintain the country free of serious animal diseases and to eradicate those that can be eradicated and bring under control those that cannot be eradicated.

The minister earlier indicated some amendments to the act. These are in regard to regulations which existed in the past: they are questioned as to their validity at the present time. I think we must realize this is an important feature of the bill before us. In addition, we have a new section dealing with transportation—clauses 31 to 34. I will deal with them in more detail in a few seconds. I am concerned about the issue of regulations. I have mentioned my concern in the past. In effect, the operative part of the bill cannot be analysed by the House, nor in committee. I saw the same situation earlier this week in connection with the environmental contaminants bill and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act.

The operative parts of this particular bill cannot be analysed in detail. I agree that orders in council are important and must be introduced from time to time. In cases where regulations are to be enacted—and I strongly suggest that the government will enact many regulations affecting the operative parts of the bill—I suggest that those regulations should be made known to members of the House so that those who are interested in and affected by the bill will be aware of the regulations when the bill is approved by the House. I suggest that a mechanism should be established to this end. This would remove some of the apprehensions of some hon. members, and some individuals who will be affected by this type of legislation. I suggest that the minister should seriously consider amending the bill in such a way as to enable people more readily to assess the impact these regulations will have on them in the future.

The hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) spoke this morning about evidence taken before the Senate agriculture committee in connection with Bill S-2. In this regard, the presentations made by Mr. Charles Gracey of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, and Mr. C. G. Munro, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, to the Senate Standing Committee on Agriculture on April 24, 1974, are germane. Mr. Gracey stated in testimony:

> While we support the obvious intent of sections 31 and 32, we cannot state unconditional support for the various clauses, in ignorance of the regulations alluded to but not stated.

I think the presentations made before the Senate agricultural committee are relevant to the present debate and it will be useful to summarize and perhaps paraphrase a portion of the testimony relating particularly to sections 31 and 32. Generally, the regulations relevant to those proposed sections ought to embody two fundamental principles. First, the regulations ought to ensure the safe and humane transportation of livestock. Second, they should promote maximum efficiency and speed in livestock movement. As the minister knows, total time spent in transit has a most important bearing on the welfare of livestock, but this matter has not been defined in the act and is not defined in the bill.

I suggest that proposed new section 32 will need to be considered carefully in committee. The discussion will interest many who are following the progress of this bill. Proposed section 32(1), on page 14 of the bill, proposes regulations—> —requiring, in such circumstances as may be prescribed, the examination of animals before being loaded on board any aircraft, railway car, vehicle or vessel for transport.

This section clearly refers to the preloading examination of animals. Where there is general agreement that animals should be loaded in good condition, excessive regulations may be impractical and have an adverse effect. At present, cattle originate from more than 150 points in western Canada and there is an obvious need to clearly define the regulations and the inspection procedures contemplated by the government.

Second, to a great extent there is a built-in safeguard in the routine transportation of cattle in that livestock producers buying feeder stock in the west are very conscious of needing to load animals in safe condition. Proposed section 32(b) proposes regulations——respecting the transportation of animals affected with or suffering from an infectious or contagious disease or incapacitated by reason of age, infirmity, illness, injury, fatigue or any other reason—

Again, it is possible to support in principle this subsection, but the language and implications are such that a more thorough examination of the regulations will be necessary in committee. Proposed section 32(c) proposes regulations—

—establishing the area to be allocated to each animal being transported in relation to the mode of conveyance—

Again, this is an extremely important section and the Canadian Cattlemen's Association have been advocates of "safe loading levels" for various sizes of cattle. This principle should be given careful consideration in the formulation of regulations. A point frequently repeated is the importance of air space, which may be as critical as floor space if decks are too low. If there is to be a standardization in terms of area per animal, it becomes necessary to have the breakdown into various sizes and weights of animals. We should pursue this in committee. Proposed section 32(d) proposes regulations——requiring animals to be segregated during transport according to class, age and sex—

This section refers to regulations with respect to segregating livestock as to class, age and sex. Again, it is necessary to ascertain if in fact the proposed regulations are practical and within the spirit of the legislation. Bulls should not travel loose with females, otherwise the major consideration should be size and weight. For example, while it is not common practice to move steers and heifers in the same car, provided their weights are uniform there is in fact no hazard to such movement and arbitrary regulations prohibiting such movement would be undesirable. Proposed section 32(e) says that the governor in council may make regulations—

—requiring any railway company or the operator or owner of any aircraft, vehicle or vessel, when engaged in the transportation of animals

(i) to disinfect and clean any aircraft, railway car, vehicle or vessel that such company, operator or owner uses for the transportation of animals, and

(ii) to maintain any facilities for the loading and unloading of animals, including such rest and feeding stations as are necessary—

We recognize the importance of this section and, indeed, I have had representations from sheep producers in my area regarding inadequate care in some yards. In this regard, there are sheep producers who maintain that sheep in transport will fare much better if they are shipped straight through rather than being unloaded within a specified time. There is an obvious necessity to define the specific regulations dealing with disinfecting and maintenance of facilities. New subsection 32(f) calls for regulations—

—(f) specifying the standards of care of animals, including the provision of feed and water during transit, that are to be observed by any railway company or the operator or owner of any aircraft, railway car, vehicle or vessel when the company, operator or owner is engaged in the transportation of animals;

This is another extremely important section dealing with standards of care of animals during transit. Such regulations should be understood by all parties, and because of the obvious importance to shippers and receivers their practical experience should be considered in the formulation of regulations. New section 32(g) calls for regulations—

—establishing the maximum number of hours that animals may be transported in any particular means of conveyance without being unloaded for rest, feed and water—

This is an extremely important section which requires careful examination of the proposed regulations. As the minister knows, section 404 of the Criminal Code establishes 36 hours as the maximum time in transit that animals may be loaded in cars without being offloaded for rest, feed and water. The first point that must be made is that the inclusion of the present section in this bill and its removal from the Criminal Code is indeed a positive step. The second point is the difficulties and dangers in establishing the maximum number of hours in transit. Surely the major consideration should be the safety and humane treatment of livestock. I suggest very strongly that if the only consideration is "X" number of hours, invariably the emphasis will shift from one of humane transportation to one of enforcement of a regulation. Of course, this may well not be in the interests of the stock.

As the minister undoubtedly knows, there are variances between cattle, hogs and sheep in their ability to withstand prolonged periods in transit. I also believe that from the investigators' studies to date this particular issue has not been resolved. We are, therefore, anxious to review this aspect of the regulations regarding time in transit, acknowledging the importance of safety and humane treatment but questioning the benefits of the stated number of hours.

The final point of this section is the delayed time in transit due to the poor co-ordination of transportation systems. I have no intention of getting into the whole area of the transportation system, but I think it is important to note that such a cargo as stock should be considered as a priority project. In this regard, it should receive very special attention by the transportation system. I suggest that this very simple measure would add substantially to the well-being of livestock that are in transit. Subclause (h) reads:

(h) establishing, where animals are unloaded for rest, feed and water, the minimum number of hours that may be allowed the animals for those purposes—

Again, the emphasis is related to the minimum number of hours for rest, feed and water. Therefore, it will again be necessary to assess the specifics of the regulations. Earlier, I mentioned receiving a representation regarding inadequate care of sheep during offloading. I was surprised and somewhat shocked to learn at that time that herds of sheep arriving in my constituency from the west had been abused on offloading, with obvious injuries and, indeed, with death of the stock at times. Although it is not clear in the language of the bill that it is covered, surely the intent of the legislation would call attention to this particular problem in some demonstrable fashion. Subclause (i) reads as follows:

(i) establishing the manner in which stalls, containers, pens and fetterings in aircraft, railways cars, vehicles or vessels used in the transportation of animals shall be constructed, equipped and maintained.

Again, there is no objection to regulations for construction standards, providing the intent is for the safe and humane treatment of livestock. However, there is a risk in government circles to promote uniformity for the sake of uniformity. Of course, we will be very anxious to assess the proposed standards and determine if in fact they are in keeping with the intent of the legislation.

I have dealt in some detail with clause 32 because it is a new and extremely important feature of this bill. I have also attempted to demonstrate the difficulties experienced on this side by interested parties who will be involved in assessing such a bill without a draft form of the regulations or some indication from the government or the department as to what the regulations may include. I certainly recommend to the Standing Committee on Agriculture that there be a clause calling for the establishment of an advisory committee of appropriate groups to assist in the formation of regulations which will apply to the transportation sector.

Before turning from this new and important section on transportation, it should be noted and emphasized that the legislation allows for transportation of all animals. We will obviously be interested in the minister's proposals for the transportation of animals for research purposes, the regulations which will be required for the containing and handling of a large variety of animals, the recommendations regarding the safety and well-being of the animals, as well as the protection of aircraft from unnecessary and dangerous contamination from natural wastes and infectious and contagious micro-organisms. We will also be interested in knowing the priorities which will be established for the transportation of animals, the types of facilities at airports envisaged under this legislation, and the training of personnel associated with the care of animals in transit. I would simply say, with respect to this entire section on transportation, that there are numerous areas we will pursue in the standing committee. I am sure we will have the co-operation of the minister in pursuing these particular avenues.

I want to make a few comments on those parts of the bill that extend to surveillance and increase the mechanisms to keep reportable and non-reportable contagious or infectious diseases in check. Again, I wish to indicate my general support for these measures, but as I interpret the legislation there appear to be some inconsistencies in the penalties. I seriously question whether the desired results will be obtained with some of the restrictive features. I refer to page 8 of the bill, clause 6, which reads as follows:

"9. (1) Every owner of animals and every breeder of or dealer in animals, and everyone bringing animals into Canada shall, on perceiving the appearance of any reportable disease among the animals owned by him or under his special care, give immediate notice to the nearest veterinary inspector of the Department of Agriculture of the facts discovered by him as aforesaid.

This clause implies that the average producer should have the ability to recognize on sight all of the reportable diseases defined in the act or subsequently defined by the minister. With all due respect, I seriously doubt whether the average breeder could pronounce the 26 diseases listed in the act, let alone diagnose their presence. I suggest that the present legislation is unrealistic and the associated penalty excessively severe.

Clause 6 continues:

(2) Every veterinarian in Canada shall, immediately on ascertaining that an animal has a reportable disease, give notice of the existence of the disease to the nearest veterinary inspector.

In my view, this should be more closely interrelated with the previous subclause. During the examination of miscellaneous estimates on November 28 of last year, I asked what I considered to be a very key question as it relates to the total problem of control of contagious and infectious disease. I inquired as to the communication that exists between the veterinary inspectors and the department and the practising veterinarians. The answer clearly indicated there is no line of authority in transmitting this information to the professionals in the field, the veterinarians. At that time Dr. Wells had this to say:

We are, however, developing now and we hope to have very shortly the first issue of a publication which will go forward from the health of animals branch to all practising veterinarians in the country and this will list areas in which these diseases are found.

It is not my intention at this time to list instances in which reportable diseases have been present in a district and where the practising veterinarians have had no knowledge of its existence, but I wish to emphasize in the strongest terms possible that this practice is wrong and is not in the best interests of controlling infectious diseases.

I have no difficulty in accepting the principle that this is a confidential matter between the owner and the Department of Agriculture. But surely there is an overriding principle here, and that overriding principle must be the dissemination of information rapidly and accurately to the professionals responsible for the care of animals. Medical ethnics dictate that the present practice should stop and common sense makes it clear that all practising veterinarians must be involved in the control of infectious and contagious diseases. I want to tell the minister that I will actively pursue this matter when the bill is before the standing committee.

I want, now, to turn to the area of compensation which has been alluded to by other hon. members in this debate. The principle that I believe should be embodied in the legislation should be that of replacement value. Again, I suggest that the minister give consideration to establishing a mechanism whereby there is participation by those affected in developing and updating regulations to conform with changes in the industry. The section of the bill dealing with compensation is a very important one. It is an area I have discussed on many occasions with my colleague, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), and he certainly shares the view that the market value approach is an improvement. However, I know he feels it would not be satisfactory or as equitable as compensation payments made on the basis of replacement value. If this latter approach could be adopted, particularly for dairy cattle, by using a reasonable base price figure plus an index formula dealing with breed, age, type classification and production records or potential, I know the hon. member feels there might be a much more accurate and acceptable form of compensation payment.

I know the hon. member for Elgin has met with dairy producers in Ontario and that he has in his possession proposals based on this particular theory prepared by Mr.

Arnold Stansell in co-operation with the joint dairy breeds organization. The Minister of Agriculture and many members will recognize Mr. Stansell as one of North America's most successful breeders of Ayrshire cattle. It is my intention and the intention of the hon. member for Elgin, when the bill is before the committee, to request that he have the opportunity of appearing as a witness to explain this proposal in detail to all members of the committee.

On November 27, 1974, the minister officiated at the opening of the Animal Diseases Research Institute and graphically described the 1952 experience with foot and mouth disease. As I indicated at the outset, for this type of debate perhaps we need this kind of experience to generate interest in the importance of this legislation. The minister described at the time the cost in terms of cattle lost, taxpayers' money spent to eradicate the disease, loss of exports of livestock and livestock products for a full year, resulting in a bill totalling approximately $900 million. That experience is a constant reminder of the necessity to have legislation that will keep this country free of serious animal disease and to eradicate those diseases that remain with us.

In light of this, during the examination of the Supplementary Estimates B, 1974-75, on November 28 of last year I made reference to the problem of Johne's disease which, to my knowledge, has affected at least four herds in my area. As part of the testimony, Dr. Wells, the veterinary director-general, Health of Animals Branch of the department, stated:

> Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, all infectious and contagious diseases are reportable. However, the specific list of diseases that are in the act and listed as main diseases are these for which we have national programs such as brucellosis, tuberculosis, hog cholera, foot and mouth disease, where action is taken to eradicate the disease from the country. In the case of Johne's disease, it is an infectious and contagious disease, and therefore reportable, and if the owner wishes to have the infection cleared up, we are prepared to provide the program to that owner.
> If and when the time comes that a better system of eradicating the disease comes about, and when we can clear some of the problems facing the department with respect to disease, it may be possible to move into a national program with respect to Johne's.

I want to emphasize that it is my impression that in my area this disease is highly contagious, consisting of what appears in many instances to be a virulent organism. Responses to my questions at that time indicated that the method of treatment is herd eradication, which is similar to the procedure adopted for brucellosis and tuberculosis. It seems to me that if the minister is desirous of retaining an animal health status that is the best in the world in his view, then Johne's disease should be added to the list of diseases outlined in the bill. Again I ask the minister to give serious consideration to this particular program and to see that it is pursued during the study of the bill by the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

During the same meeting, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) and I raised the very serious and important question concerning income tax on moneys received for herds destroyed as a result of brucellosis, tuberculosis or Johne's disease. As the minister knows, if these herds are not replaced in the same calendar year, then the money received from the government by way of compensation is taxed. I am well aware that it is the government's intention to encourage the farmer to reinvest these sums in establishing his herd, but in many instances this is impossible to accomplish in the calendar year. For example, the lapse of time between the slaughter of the herd and the procedures that must be followed to ensure a healthy environment, free of disease, for housing the new herd may well extend beyond the calendar year, and in many instances the replacement animal that the farmer wants, particularly in the case of dairy herds, cannot be procured during the calendar year. I know the minister is concerned about this problem, and on November 28 he indicated that he was negotiating this point with the departments of national revenue and finance. Since this is an important component of the compensation problem, I urge the minister and the government to correct this present inequity before the bill receives third reading. I know we will be anxious to pursue this point at the committee level.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that we support the importance of this piece of legislation, and I commend the minister and the department of their interest in maintaining healthy animals in Canada. But again I re-emphasize that we believe the present bill can be substantially improved and I have attempted to define some areas of concern regarding various components. We will also be making some constructive proposals during committee stage. Finally, may I say it is our intention to work in a positive manner and as rapidly as possible to implement the improvements I have suggested.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, before I make a few comments about this particular bill I should like to refer to something the minister said just before lunch when he introduced the measure. He alluded to what I am sure was the foot and mouth disease outbreak in Regina and the tremendous loss that took place back in 1952. Let me say to the minister and his staff who are here in the House of Commons at this time that his words took me back very vividly to that time. The minister spoke about the tremendous cost to this country. He did not put a dollar value on it, but somebody behind me mentioned $1 billion. It could well have been that amount. Even if it cost that much to clean up the outbreak, I would suggest that is peanuts—and I mean it—compared to the loss in inventory value to the cattle industry in Canada at that time.

In October, 1951, fed cattle and feeder cattle were selling for $35 and above—at that time the highest price by far in our history. I can remember selling feeder yearlings going at 800 pounds for $36.20 a hundredweight. That foot and mouth outbreak occurred when an immigrant whose first name was Willie came over to that Regina farm and threw out some dried-up sausage. Within a few days the value of the cattle dropped by half. Fed cattle dropped to $18 a hundred and feeder cattle to about the same. It was a great loss. I only remind the minister about this to show the tremendous importance of the Health of Animals Branch to the Canadian economy as a whole. His remarks took me back a few years and prompted these opening comments.

By and large, this is a good bill in that it updates many obsolete portions of the act. It incorporates many new developments, procedures and techniques that are now part of our total Canadian livestock industry. Perhaps the most critical thing I could say about the bill at this time is that it is two years overdue. I suggest that the minister must, surely, take the blame for this. The tragedy is that agriculture apparently has such a low priority on the legislative ladder and the order paper of the House of Commons.

Mr. Stanfield: Controls are the thing now.

Mr. Hargrave: I want to make some opening comments on the transportation aspects covered by this bill. First of all, I should like to again commend the government and the minister for transferring the authority for the transportation of livestock from section 404 of the Criminal Code to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, under the Department of Agriculture. This is an excellent move and is long overdue.

Most of my remarks will relate to the movement of cattle, especially from western Canada, to so-called central and, occasionally, far eastern Canada. I want to refer, first of all, to a very important brief that was presented to the government back in 1973, entitled "Statement on Livestock Transportation". Even though it was presented on January 17, 1973, I think portions of it are very applicable today. Therefore, I should like to quote from it briefly.

The brief was presented to Hon. Otto Lang, then minister of justice, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). It was put together by a joint committee of the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the Ontario Beef Improvement Association, with the assistance and co-operation of Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. I shall read just a short part of it as follows:

> Our purpose is to seek the creation of the type of federal legislation which will permit development of a more efficient and humane system for transporting livestock and specifically feeder cattle. It is our view that the Criminal Code is not the most appropriate legislative vehicle for legislation of this kind. What is required, we submit, is legislation that will control the conditions under which livestock are transported, while at the same time providing sufficient safeguards to satisfy public concern.

Later in the statement we read the following:

> Our interest, therefore, is to speed the cattle to final destination as quickly as is reasonably possible and to do so requires some progressive amendment to the Criminal Code.

The statement continues:

> We were well pleased with the experience in 1972, and the non-stop run from Winnipeg to Toronto and points beyond brought with it many benefits.
> The total elapsed time in transit was reduced in many cases.
> Because cattle were kept moving, the rail and stockyards system was less burdened with backlogs and delays.
> Rail cars were tied up with one load for a shorter period of time and availability of cars was a less crucial problem.

I think that last point represents the most practical advantage of the faster runs which started back in the fall of 1972. The statement ends with four recommendations which I think are still most important and I propose to read them:

> We respectfully wish to close our statement with the following recommendations.
> 1. That the Minister of Agriculture be requested to establish a special committee to develop guidelines for the humane, efficient transportation of livestock.
> 2. That the committee be formulated to include representatives designated by the railways, the producer organizations (i.e. Canadian Cattlemen's Association and the Ontario Beef Improvement Association) and the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies.
> 3. That new legislation based on these guidelines, governing the transportation of livestock, and to be administered by the Canada Department of Agriculture, be developed and introduced as soon as is practically possible.
> 4. That the procedures for shipping cattle employed in 1972 be repeated in 1973.

Although these recommendations are outdated, they refer to prior runs of non-stop shipments of livestock from Winnipeg through to Toronto. The report is dated January 17, 1973, and now, almost three years later, we are just getting around to making these recommendations part of the act.

I think there are special comments on rail and truck movement of calves to Ontario which need to be made at this time. I might add that these comments are based on my personal experience of well over 25 years. During that period I have been associated with cattle sales at Walsh, in southeastern Alberta. On average during those 25 years we loaded and shipped 25 to 50 carloads—sometimes more—of calves and feeder yearlings per sale to Ontario points. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) was the auctioneer at most of those sales, so he knows very well what I am referring to now.

The greatest concern of Ontario buyers always has been the risk of death, and sickness losses. These are sometimes very expensive. At times these deaths number from 3 to more than 20 animals in a car. This represents a considerable loss. If the animals are not dying, very often the sickenss is considerable and it takes weeks and even months to get over such a loss. Our experience over the years as producers and shippers of feeder calves and yearlings would suggest the following: first, we should load only healthy animals, subject to veterinarians' visual inspection. We should watch for signs of fever, pneumonia and scours, to name only a few.

Calves should not be shipped the day they are weaned if at all possible. As a matter of fact most of them are shipped the day after they are weaned. Second, calves should be offered water before loading on to the stock cars. I think that is most important.

Third, and of the utmost importance, is the fact that the total time in transit, which includes any rest stops, should be kept to a minimum. I think what I should like to stress more than anything else about the shipment of calves from the prairies to Ontario is that the total time in transit should be kept to a minimum.

Fourth, one feeding and water stop only in Winnipeg should be necessary. This implies that a non-stop route from Winnipeg to Ontario designation points should be a reality.

Fifth, a further implication is that the old 36-hour release regulations be changed to at least 48 hours. I hope this specific item will be discussed with the cattle producers in western Canada, with the feeders and buyers from Ontario, as well as with the railway people when that decision is formulated in the regulations. It is well known that a reduction in the total time in transit means that sickness loss can be dramatically reduced. The Winnipeg-

Toronto non-stop run is now reasonably well accepted, but this amendment to section 31 and section 32 is needed for the final authority.

Still on the matter of transportation I wish to make a plea for a speed-up of railway modifications at Midhurst, Ontario, north of Toronto, to facilitate the transfer from railway to trucks and hence to the final destination. This, I am told, will bring about further savings in time and, of course, increased efficiency. This Midhurst decision made by the CPR sometime ago for some reason or other has seemed to have bogged down, and it was only recently that work started again. It is doubtful if it will be completed this fall so as to be availabe for the heavy run of feeder cattle which is now well under way. That heavy run of cattle traditionally amounts to something like 300,000 head every fall in modern times. Some years ago it was much higher. I suggest that the railways have a definite responsibility here in having vastly increased the livestock freight rates.

I think it is appropriate to point out here that another rate increase has now been indicated in livestock rates to be effective November 14. Since January 1 of this year, since the freeze was lifted, the cumulative increases in respect of livestock rates have reached 64.4 per cent for single-deck livestock cars and 86.9 per cent for double-deck livestock cars. This is what the increases will be when this last increase becomes effective on November 14. I think there is an obvious aside I should make. Surely the government's new restraint program should be involved in this.

I wish now to refer to an excellent editorial in the Cattlemen. This is the October issue. The editorial is headed "Railways Should Try Harder". It states:

> The railways have a poor reputation for moving feeder cattle. That message came through loud and clear when we researched the West-End trucking-story for this issue.
> A sample of the comments: 'The railways just don't care about the cattle business'; 'You can't talk to anybody there; they all pass the buck'; 'The railways could do a much better job.'
> Cattle shippers complained about shortage of equipment and wrong allocation of cars. That has a familiar ring to observers of the grain shipping system. But behind these impressions are some examples of real hardship. Extra time in delivering cattle costs producers money. Although some changes have been made recently in Ontario, more must be made to reduce time from ranch to feedlot.
> Cattle cannot be treated like bulk cargo. The railways know this. It's just amazing that both CN and CP Rail have done so little to adjust their cattle shipping systems to the demands of feeder cattle transport.
> Rates cannot be an excuse for this situation. Rates on double deck 40′ livestock cars from Winnipeg to Toronto have increased 49.4 per cent since last December. Rates on single deck cars moved up 43 per cent over the same period.

These figures include the extra rate increase that is coming.

> Truckers have now had a taste of the business at these new rates. It's time producers received the benefits of real competition in this area.

As a further aside I might add in respect of that editorial that it seems obvious that the railways are making changes in their livestock rates without the danger of a ceiling being imposed on them, such as is the case with statutory grain rates. The result is rather obvious.

I wish to say a little more about the newer aspects of livestock transportation which is now becoming more important, such as the trucking of cattle over long distances, for instance, from the prairies and even from British Columbia to Ontario. There is a definite increase in this movement. Right now approximately 2,000 head a week are being trucked from the west to points in Ontario. This is the greatest volume ever handled in this way. The delivery time of from 50 to 55 hours from Alberta to Ontario is impressive indeed. That represents about a day and one-half to two days faster than shipment by rail. This again promotes the health of calves and reduced losses although the rate is higher. The rate is approximately $1 higher per loaded mile but there are advantages, especially in time saved, which more than compensate for this.

I should like to commend the truckers for their enterprise in this regard and hope that they will meet their 10 per cent objective in respect of the total cross-country haul. Before leaving the subject of transportation I should like to make a comment about what is an annual situation almost every fall. I refer to the shortages of livestock cars for shipment from west to east. This occurs every fall. I feel this could be helped by two factors. One is the shorter turn around made possible by the non-stop run by rail from Winnipeg to Toronto. The other, of course, is the competition by trucks and the faster turn around also made by the trucking industry.

Now I believe it is appropriate to make some practical comments, as a practising cattleman, about the brucellosis controversy. We have heard much about this over the last year. I should say that these are my comments as a rancher from western Canada. I will go back a few years to the time when the program started.

The vaccination program was introduced in 1950 when we had an infection rate of 8½ per cent. By 1957 through the use of this program the rate dropped to 4½ per cent. Finally by 1966 after the completion of the first general test and slaughter program the rate decreased to .02 per cent. This was quite an accomplishment.

Then the period 1968-1969 was the start of what has been called the de-emphasis of the vaccination program. In this connection I want to recall again one of the factors relating to that vaccination. We were finding out, when we were shipping out vaccinated calves, that those which were vaccinated with strain 19 used in calfhood vaccination had a tendency to be stressed far more than other calves which were not vaccinated. While we were anxious to follow the program that was laid down in co-operation with provincial and federal programs, we developed a feeling against vaccinating calves just before they were loaded into stock cars for eastern Canada, and we were relieved when this de-emphasis program came into being.

I am sure that the use of strain 19 before the calves were loaded into stock cars has contributed to increased losses and strain factors that resulted in sickness. We are now moving through the so called withdrawal symptoms of the whole brucellosis program as we shift to a final clean up. My understanding is that it is the government's intention to try to discontinue calfhood vaccination by the end of 1976 when it is assumed that the vaccine will be outlawed permanently.

It is unfortunate there has been some split in the veterinary profession over this issue. There seems to have been a division between some of the private practitioners and some Health of Animals veterinarians. In many instances private veterinarians have supported the vaccination program in this withdrawal period and they are hoping that it will continue. One can only feel that perhaps sometimes their feelings in this regard are dictated by rather short term considerations. Also, what I think are unfair comparisons have been made with the brucellosis situation in the United States, where it is my understanding that the situation is considerably worse than here in Canada.

My own personal view is that the Health of Animals policy of test and slaughter is the right one and the only one. We have to live with that policy. We can never completely eradicate the disease by vaccination, and surely our objective must be complete eradication. I want to say that I fully support the consistent and long range policy of Health of Animals on this matter.

Now I should like to make a few comments about another subject that has made the news recently. I am referring to the disease blue tongue. The minister recently made an announcement calling for a double test of all cattle imported into Canada from the United States for the disease blue tongue. I know from personal representation that this has caused concern with some U.S. exporters of breeding stock to Canada. I know of some from the state of Montana who have been exporting excellent breeding stock to Canada for many years and who feel that it will almost put an end to that type of specialized breeding program. It will also affect the imports of U.S. feeder cattle coming to Canada, but on balance this is a very small quantity. Because of other tests required and the nuisance value of these tests, in total there is very little likelihood that the volume of feeder cattle coming into Canada will be significant.

I am assured by department officials that there is no blue tongue in Canada in either sheep or cattle, and following on newspaper reports of reactors to blue tongue in southern Saskatchewan I must say I was relieved to be informed that all of those that were found to be reactors were imported cattle from the U.S. and were detected and slaughtered. So again I say it is reassuring to note that there are no infected herds in Canada.

I am told that the decision to call for a double test was arrived at after appropriate consultations with animal health officials from Washington. Of course this is the way it should be. It was considered necessary to protect our own status and our trade avenues, not only for the protection of our own industry in Canada but to assure sheep producers in Australia and New Zealand that our trade avenues with them would be protected.

I want to make a brief comment about warble control. The warble control program in western Canada is well advanced thanks to the excellent co-operation among the provinces, the producers, and the federal government. There has been real progress in western Canada although I am sorry I cannot report about eastern Canada, but I am sure there is equal progress there. This was made possible because of the new systemic insecticides. I mention this only to call for continued support of this policy, which mostly involves the provinces, and I hope that the environmentalists here will not get any ideas against the use of this excellent insecticide.

I want to switch to another topic now which caused a great deal of concern in the House and in all of Canada early this spring. I am referring to the dead meat scandal which took place in Quebec and even overflowed into Ontario. I hope it is not a dead issue, and no pun is intended. I want to repeat what I said at the time of the scandal when it made the headlines day after day.

In those provinces that have provincial and federal meat inspection under our Health of Animals Branch—and this includes most of our provinces—I feel very strongly that it should be the responsibility of the senior government, that is, the federal government, to ensure that all meat sold for human consumption is adequately inspected by some level of government. I am saying that the federal government should co-ordinate this important function, I am not suggesting that it should do it all. Surely the ultimate authority should be that of Canada's Department of Agriculture to ensure the program is properly co-ordinated. In making this comment I hope that the regulations are not so severe as to limit or prohibit the operation of the small town or rural slaughter houses. I say this since their most severe critics are their own neighbours who have to be their customers, and such outlets would not dare sell bad meat.

In closing I want to commend the federal government for its support of our three veterinary colleges and their recent special financing. I want to draw attention in particular to the excellent work of the western veterinary college, the Saskatoon college, and especially their work on calf scours and respiratory diseases. I think they should be commended for this. I know they have had additional financing from the federal government and from the cattlemen themselves who have put up a generous amount of research money for that college. In the animal research departments of these institutions and other federal institutions I have been told there is some concern about the proper authority to deal with the increasing use for animals for public research. Ultimately, of course, it is for the good of the general public. I am not sure whether or not this bill covers this item, and if it does not perhaps it could be covered because this is a most vital part of any research.

The amendment of the agreement with France for a second maximum security staging on the Island of Miquelon is noted with considerable interest. It suggests three things. First, it suggests that exotic import interest is continuing and will likely continue, in the opinion of the government, in spite of the currently depressed national commercial cattle industry. Second, it suggests that Canada must have made a good deal with the government of France to get this service. This is not surprising in view of the value of trade that will come through that security station. Third, it suggests that there are good long range indications of continued and even improved export relations with the United States cattle interests in exotics, since it seems to me that a good many will come through our station and then go to the United States.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I want to say that I fully support the broad concept of the bill. I commend the minister and the Health of Animals branch for their courtesy in holding advance consultation with representatives of Canada's cattle industry, humane societies, and the railways for the background needed to bring this bill to its present point. I sincerely hope this will continue in the development and promulgation of the regulations that will be so important in its implementation.

In 1952 I had the privilege of meeting the present Director General of Veterinary Services when he was in charge of the outbreak of foot and mouth disease. It has been my good fortune to maintain an excellent association with him over the years, and I hope it may continue. I look forward to having the bill in committee for examination in detail.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS COOPERATIVE MARKETING ACT

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT FIXING OF INITIAL PRICE FOR PRODUCTS

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-21, to amend the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. Did I hear correctly? I wanted to make a short presentation to the House, but you say Bill C-21 has gone to the committee?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Bill C-21 has been referred to committee.

Mr. Whelan: May I ask a question on the procedure we are supposed to follow. I think it is most important that we have an opportunity—maybe I was not listening closely enough, but I had a presentation to make on the bill and I think that is the right of a minister. It is important. I waited over a year for an opportunity to make a presentation in the House. I do not think that is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In future I will pause a few minutes to let the hon. minister speak on the bill.

Mr. Whelan: I wish Your Honour had been in the chair sooner—maybe a year ago—then the bill would be law by now.

FEEDS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN DEFINITIONS AND CONTROL OVER MANUFACTURE, SALE OR IMPORTATION

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill S-10, to amend the Feed Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Madam Speaker, I should like to introduce second reading of Bill S-10, an act to amend the Feeds Act, as passed by the Senate on March 6, 1975, and as read for the first time in the House of Commons on March 10, 1975. Since the bill was not a money bill and since there was a backlog of legislation in the House of Commons, Bill S-10 was introduced directly into the Senate and received intensive study before being passed.

The feed industry in Canada does approximately $1½ billion worth of business annually, and is the sixteenth largest industry in Canada. It employs approximately 10,000 persons and produces about nine million tons of feed each year for use by livestock producers in this country.

The present Feeds Act provides for the regulation of livestock feeds as to composition, packaging, and labelling. The provisions of the act include requirements for registration of feeds prior to sale and other measures designed to prevent the marketing of feeds that are not known to be consistent with current nutritional and health standards for livestock. This form of regulation also prevents feeds from causing adulteration of meat products used for human consumption.

The last major revision of the act was made in 1960. As most hon. members realize, there have been many advances in animal nutrition since that time, as well as in manufacturing, distribution, and testing of feeds. There are many new products now used in feeds that are not included under the present definition of feed and hence are not subject to regulation. Bill S-10 extends the definition of feed to all those products and ingredients used or able to be used, in livestock feeding. However, the new definition of feed is not intended to bring veterinary drugs subject to the Food and Drugs Act, or products subject to the Pest Control Products Act, under its control.

The definition of livestock has also been expanded to include fish, because fish are now being raised by commercial farmers for human consumption.

There is increasing evidence that the public interest or that of the feed users cannot be adequately protected with respect to feed quality without regulation in some situations at the farmer or mixer level. Just as with meat quality, effective regulation must involve plant inspection and regulations applying to the manufacturing process itself. This is necessary to prevent harmful adulteration of meats, for example, which may not be easily detected in time in the finished product.

Feeds can be carriers of disease-causing organisms, such as salmonella, and act as a reservoir for reinfection of animals. Eradication of such infections cannot be accomplished by checking feed for sale only. It is important that manufacturing plants be inspected and clean-ups be done. The changes proposed in Bill S-10 will give authority to inspect manufacturing plants and to require certain levels of sanitation.

In passing this bill, the Senate made an amendment regarding penalty clauses. Perhaps, hon. members will recall that the former minister of justice, the Hon. Otto E. Lang, reported to the House of Commons on March 27, 1975, that in his opinion this amendment was inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights. I am happy that this opinion was expressed because it is important that all legislation be consistent with the provisions of the Bill of Rights. I would ask that this amendment be dealt with by the Agricultural Committee of the House of Commons when this bill comes before it.

I note that there was a good deal of discussion about pet foods in the Senate debates on the bill. I would simply say that pet foods have not been named as such in this bill. It will be noted that feeds for any species of livestock have not been named either. The definition of livestock provides the opportunity for pet foods to be brought under the act.

I may say, in conclusion, that the proposed changes have been supported by the various sectors of the feed industry affected by this act. My department held extensive discussions with trade, universities, colleges, and producer groups during the drafting of this bill, and I can report that those sectors directly affected are in agreement with the bill as originally submitted to the Senate.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my comments on the bill will be brief. The bill is short, and basically we support its contents. I understand that the Canadian Feed Manufacturers Association which represents some 400 feed manufacturers transacting business to the approximate value of $1.5 million, supports and welcomes this bill. Basically this amending bill is designed to protect livestock producers and consequently consumers of livestock. Technological changes of the past ten years have made it necessary to introduce these amendments, to cover some of the chemical substances and exotic matters fed to livestock.

I note that the definition of livestock has been widened to include fish, rabbits, and mink, and such other creatures as may be designated by order in council or regulation. One wonders why pets such as cats and dogs were not included in the regulations. Their inclusion was suggested when the matter was debated in the Senate. I understand that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is reluctant to see pets included in the definition, as it is felt that it would take considerable manpower and staff to supervise the pet food industry. I ask the minister to consider amending the bill in order to include pet foods under the regulations. It is important to ensure the high quality of pet foods fed to pets in this country. in order to avoid health hazards to our population.

I note, from reading the debates of the other place, that the Senate spent some time considering the penalty provisions. I will not comment on these at this time, but we reserve our right to consider them in committee. I do not anticipate that this bill will take too much time in committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, this bill, which is to update the provisions of the Feeds Act, is a necessary one and we gladly give it our support at this stage. I am interested of course, in the reference to the Senate's insertion of certain penalty clauses. There may be some question about those provisions in the light of the Canadian Bill of Rights. I appreciate the point the minister made. I suggest the standing committee to which the bill is to be referred should look at these provisions. It seems to me that the point may come at which we may need to do something more than just look if any provisions of this bill run counter to the Canadian Bill of Rights. It seems to me that there ought to be a firm ruling on that point.

Mr. Whelan: That was put in by the Senate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was being polite and not making any reference to the Senate as such. Since this has been done, I suggest that we may need to call on the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to give his opinion on the bill or perhaps on the Chair to give a ruling.

Mr. Paproski: Why are you supporting it, then?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROTECT HUMAN HEALTH AND THE ENVIRONMENT FROM CONTAMINANTS

The House resumed from Friday, October 24, consideration of Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions concerning the minister, her representatives, and myself, and I understand that the parliamentary secretary is to move an amendment to motion No. 3 appearing in my name. I ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the motion in my name, and to the withdrawal of my motion, if that is necessary.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Madam Speaker, we propose to amend the hon. gentleman's amendment by striking out all the words following the word "out" and substituting therefor the following—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, should you not first put the motion, then the amendment?

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): I merely intended to indicate that we wish to amend motion No. 3.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) moves:

That Bill C-25, an act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be amended in subclause 4(6) by striking out line 4 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"or imported during that year; and, where he has reason to believe that such a compound or quantity constitutes a danger to human health or the environment, he shall notify the Minister of the nature of that danger.".

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I move that motion No. 3 be amended by striking out all the words following the word "out" and substituting the following therefor:

"lines 3 and 4 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"compound, of the quantity manufactured or imported during that year and of any information in his possession respecting any danger to human health or the environment posed by the compound".

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I wish to speak briefly, to say that the concern that had arisen was that there was no requirement for a manufacturer who was introducing a new quantity or new compound, and who knew that there might be some danger to the environment, to report his knowledge of that danger to the department. The original motion in my name was designed to impose the requirement to report. The amending language introduced by the parliamentary secretary is more specific and effective than mine, and we are happy to accept the motion as amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Clark), as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The House will now consider motion No. 4. Mr. Woolliams, for Mr. Brisco, moves:

That Bill C-25, an act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be amended in subclause 5(1) by striking out line 17 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"reasonably practicable but no later than fifteen days after the said Ministers are so satisfied to consult with".

● (1540)

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Madam Speaker, I might just speak briefly in the absence of my colleague who has to be in British Columbia on constituency business today.

This section of the bill relates to a requirement on the part of the government to consult with other provinces or other departments or agencies before taking action. We were concerned in committee and are concerned now that the language of the bill as it emerged from committee might raise the danger of delay. The minister might conceivably use the requirement to consult to avoid bringing the machinery of the bill into play.

What we are proposing here, and I understand that this proposal is acceptable to the government, is that a time limit be established during which time consultation must begin with the provinces or other departments or agencies. In other words, if this amendment is accepted, that kind of consultation must begin within 15 days. There is no danger of delay by that means.

[Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate).]

Motion No. 4 (Mr. Brisco) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 5.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain) moved:

That Bill C-25, an act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be amended in subclause 5(3) by striking out line 18 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Any person, except his cause of objection is shown to be unreasonable, frivolous or vexatious"

He said: Madam Speaker, there is a principle involved here that has to do with who can participate in bringing into play the provisions set out regarding environmental contaminants in the Canadian environment. There is a general principle that it is going to be important to have as broad a participation as is possible in questions relating to possible contamination of the Canadian environment. The disagreement has to do with the legal interpretation of a word. The word that appears in the bill limits the right to participate to those persons who have an interest.

Our concern is that the word interest is subject to very narrow and specific legal definition, such as would mean only a legal interest, excluding two categories of people we believe should not be excluded. First, it would exclude that very large although perhaps undefinable portion of the Canadian public which can be called the environmental public, those Canadians worried about environmental questions. They are often very well-informed about the potential dangers to the environment that can arise from specific actions. Our concern is that this language would not allow a member or an organization in the group broadly called the environmental public to engage in proceedings under this bill unless they had a specific legal interest that was being affected. We believe that is too narrow.

In our view this also excludes the possible participation of communities or individuals who might be affected later by a case similar to the one that would now be under consideration by mechanisms established in this bill. The concern is simply that the language of the bill is susceptible to narrow definition in a way which would exclude the participation of people who should have a right to participate in matters concerning the Canadian environment.

There is a danger which we recognize. If the door is open to participation by anyone, there could be a number of frivolous persons wasting the time and money of the taxpayer, and wasting the time of the agencies established here. For that reason we have placed in the amendment the right to exclude the participation of anyone whose reason for wanting to participate can be described as frivolous, vexatious, or as unreasonable behaviour. That is the purpose of the amendment. It speaks not simply to the mechanism of this bill but to the much broader public question of who has a right to participate in proceedings relating to the preservation of the Canadian environment. We are concerned that the bill as it stands limits that right to participate to people with a narrow, legal interest. We want it broadened. We believe this amendment will achieve that broadening without inviting a flood of frivolous participation.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, we recognize the hon. member's point. It is a matter of opinion. We cannot accept the amendment.

There are two types of interested persons, those with a legal interest, and those whose interest is a concern, to be decided by the minister. Those persons covered under subclause 5(3) have a particular legal interest. Subclause 5(3) should be read with subclause 6(2) which provides that the board of review shall hear the person filing the notice of objection and any other interested or knowledgeable person. "Any concerned person" means that the minister will have to appoint a board at great public expense, even if it is clearly not justified. However, as the minister is more likely to be criticized for not appointing a board than for doing so, she will tend to appoint one on notice of receiving an objection, even if it appears frivolous.

Who is to say that a person's objection is unreasonable, frivolous or vexatious? This could lead to serious argument. To some degree it would restrict the rights of the public. Therefore our position is that we cannot accept the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion negatived.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion No. 5 (Mr. Clark) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The House will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 6.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain) (for Mr. Wenman) moved:

That Bill C-25, an Act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be amended in subclause 6(1) by striking out line 33 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"persons representative of industrial and non-industrial interests and whose chairman shall not be a member of the Public Service of Canada; and shall refer the proposed order".

He said: Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief in pointing out the reasons behind the amendment introduced in the name of my colleague, who is unavoidably away on parliamentary business. Again the matter deals not simply with the particular practice in the bill but also with a principle of much broader application having to do with the representative nature of the board established under government legislation. What we are dealing with here is an environmental contaminants board of review having the powers set out in the bill. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that this board is a representative board, that it will not be captive either to a particular point of view, whether industrial or anti-industrial, or to a bureaucracy that might be less sympathetic than it should be to some of the representations that will be made to the board.

We believe that the important principle of ensuring an adequate public hearing has two elements. First of all, all those individuals or groups who have something important to say should have the right to have it said. Secondly, the board should be given sufficient breadth and fairness that all reasonable points of view also receive a fair hearing. We think it is important to build this principle into the legislation.

We believe the best way to do that is to add the amendment in the name of my colleague, and this would have two effects. First, it would ensure that the board which deals with questions often of conflict between the industrial and non-industrial sectors of Canadian society reflects both sectors as a matter of statute. Secondly, we suggest that the chairman of the board be a person whose non-partisanship and independence are beyond question.

Since the Public Service of Canada, as an enforcing agency, is often regarded as something other than independent from time to time in circumstances of this kind, we think it important, in the interests of guaranteeing independence, that at all times the chairmen of boards of this kind come from outside the Public Service of Canada.

I would point out to the House that this is not a new procedure; it is a procedure accepted by the House by way of amendment moved by this party when dealing with the ocean dumping bill. Perhaps it has particular relevance to environmental questions where the government, because it plays a regulatory role, is not in a position to be regarded as as independent as it might be in other circumstances. It is an important practice to continue to bring into our law, a practice that is already in the law in the ocean dumping legislation. I hope it is one that the House will accept at this time.

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that in selecting the people who will be on whatever board is appointed, the very points the hon. gentleman has made will be taken into account. If they are not taken into account, it probably would not be a very representative board.

There are problems with some of the matters that could be brought before the board. It is possible that we would need experts to evaluate danger. The composition of the committees must reflect the complexities and nature of specific substances. So, as I say, the members of the board would need some flexibility, and this is why we cannot accept the amendment proposed at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. Wenman) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Motions Nos. 7 and 8 will be grouped for debate, and division if required.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw) for Mr. Brisco moved:

That Bill C-25, an act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be amended in subclause 7(1) by striking out line 4 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"may, by order wherein is the reason therefor, published in the Canada Gazette, add to the schedule the sub-"

And:

That Bill C-25, an act to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be amended in subclause 7(7) by striking out line 16 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"no longer necessary, he may, by order wherein is the reason therefor, published in the Canada Gazette,"

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Madam Speaker, again the principle involved here has to do with making the Canada Gazette as informative as possible. I hesitate to bring up a revolutionary principle like this late on a Friday afternoon, but this is what we are trying to do with this amendment.

I and my colleagues would have immensely preferred to have required the minister to publish much more broadly than just in the Canada Gazette, which no one but the eccentric reads, any changes to the schedule, whether additions or deletions, relative to substances that might be dangerous in the Canadian environment.

We lost that amendment in committee and there is no question that we will lose it again, but what I want to do now, and what I hope the House will seriously consider in the interests of having a Canadian public informed on environmental matters, is to have the minister tell us why she is adding a new substance to the list of dangerous substances. More important, when she takes a substance off the list and thus takes it out of the category of substances to which the act applies, she must tell the Canadian people why the danger has passed and why she is taking the substance off the list. I think this is an important principle in terms of ensuring not only the better working of the bill but that fuller information is given the Canadian public in connection with environmental matters.

[Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate).]

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman has some good ideas but we feel that the Canada Gazette is not the place to start. It just simply is not done. Some of this information might be part of a major report, for example. Therefore we would have to vote against this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those in favour of motion No. 7 please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motions Nos. 7 and 8 (Mr. Brisco) negatived.

Mr. Clark: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, as a result of conversation that I had with the Minister, and some of the developments that ensued from that conversation, I request the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the amendment appearing as motion No. 9 in my name.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that motion No. 9 be withdrawn from the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Clark) withdrawn.

Hon. Jack Cullen (for Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: With leave, now.

Mr. Cullen (for Mrs. Sauvé) moved that Bill C-25 be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order, if the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) will indulge me for just one minute. During the course of the proceedings at the report stage there were a number of amendments referred to as having been seconded by Mr. Baker. I want to make it clear for the sake of the parliamentary secretary that the Baker therein referred to is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and not the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

CANADA SEA COAST CONSERVATION AUTHORITY

ACT TO PRESERVE COASTAL BEAUTY AND RECREATIONAL USE

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie) moved that Bill C-253, to provide for the establishment of a Canada Sea Coast Conservation Authority, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill which is entitled "An Act to provide for the establishment of a Canada Sea Coast Conservation Authority" is to preserve for all Canadians the seacoasts of this country on the east, the west, and perhaps even in the Arctic, although at the moment that is not a pressing need.

The object is to protect the beauty of our coastlines and to oversee the conservation for public recreational use of those seacoasts of Canada that are accessible to the general public. In carrying out this objective I feel it is totally essential that a number of things be done.

First, we should carry out an inventory of the seacoasts to determine which are relatively easily accessible to the public, and which have recrational potential. We must determine the cost involved in either acquiring the areas outright or protecting the environment of these desirable seacoast areas.

When I refer to protecting the environment I mean that where there is agricultural land in use we should pay the owner of that land to maintain his land in its present state. If a fisherman is farming as well as fishing we should pay him to leave the land in its existing state instead of selling his plots to somebody who might want to put up poorly designed cottages.

The authority I envisage would be required to collaborate with not only the provinces but, if there were provincial consent, with the municipalities in such provinces. To make the thing work in the way it must if it is to be successful we would require very major citizen involvement through the various local associations such as historical societies, conservation associations, and other local groups who would join the effort to keep these beautiful areas beautiful. The bill allows for a wide variety of collaboration with governments and groups of private citizens.

As the bill indicates, it would be useful for such a conservation authority to take over all existing federal Crown sea coast lands. The authority should also be empowered, if it can work out agreement with provincial governments, to take over the provincial Crown sea coast areas. As I suggested earlier, the authority would be albe to enter into agreements with the municipalities concerned, with provincial consent, to assure the existence of whatever local regulations and by-laws are necessary for the kind of environmental and aesthetic protection we seek.

If we do not have the support of the local public in something like this the thing just will not work. All of us who have travelled to the coasts of Canada, and perhaps even more so to the coasts of the United States, will realize what can happen when there is a total lack of planning and a disregard for the original beauty of the sea coast areas. In this case human greed takes over. Private developers and other groups determine what kind of landscape future generations will face, and that is a pretty miserable and awful prospect. This is the situation now being faced by most citizens in the United States along the east coast, and I suspect along the west coast as well, although I have not visited there. I do not want to see the same thing happen here in Canada.

We still have huge areas of coastline that are relatively unspoiled. We have many thousands of miles of coastline that have retained their beauty, and this bill provides one way by which we can prevent the spoilation of what is unquestionably one of our most important heritages.

I hope no one is under the impression from a first glance at the bill that it is designed to create tourist preserves for the benefit of central Canadian tourists to the disadvantage of the local inhabitants of the sea coast areas. To the contrary, it is designed to prevent our sea coast lands falling into the hands of fast-buck operators from central Canada, the United States, and sometimes from outside North America, to the detriment primarily of the local inhabitants, and to the detriment in the long-term of all Canadians who value the beauty of our seascapes.

While the beaches themselves are and always will be public, it is the area immediately behind these beaches with which we must concern ourselves because they are now threatened in many parts of Canada with the same kind of unplanned and unco-ordinated construction which afflicts the road approaches to practically every town and city in North America.

Whether it is thoughtlessly located or designed commercial building, a third-hand house trailer, or a school bus converted to a seasonal or permanent dwelling or even, in some cases, an attractive summer cottage, it all will contribute to the spoilation or our coastal areas if we do not have better control than we have had up until now.

I said earlier that I envisage a situation whereby we would be paying people to leave land in its existing or original state. It would be a situation in which we would indemnify farmers and fishermen adequately in a way that would make it well worth their while to agree to preserve their land in the form in which it is now providing them a living. It is all very well to suggest that we would not prevent anyone making money through the sale of his land to someone who wishes to build cottages. Individuals have and will continue to have a right to sell land for these purposes, but, in an area of particular scenic beauty we should be prepared to put up the necessary money to make it worthwhile for the owners to preserve the area for future generations rather than sell out to individuals who obviously will benefit from beautiful cottage locations.

If we continue to let this happen in all the beautiful areas of Canada there will not be anything left for the public to enjoy. Unfortunately many of the most picturesque areas have already reached the point where it would be very expensive to back-track and to try to put things where they were 10 or 15 years ago before this movement to our sea coasts really began to take hold. I am encouraged now by the attitude of Canadians toward the preservation of our past.

Certainly when it comes to a public appreciation of the furniture or our past, of the 18th and 19th century produce of Canadian craftsmen, particularly in Nova Scotia, Quebec, and Ontario, there is major public interest. Our museums are promoting this as well as our historical societies, and the historical societies are doing it as well with respect to our early architectural forms. With the exception of a few areas in the centres of Montreal, Quebec City, now Ottawa and a few other areas like Kingston, our governments have not been encouraging the preservation of our architectural heritage. These architectural forms took many generations to evolve and were based on a fantastic amount of thought.

One needs only to be in one of these older homes for a while to realize how much more thought went into them than into any of the homes being built today. While we have been spending all this money preserving the architecture in the centres or our cities we have been ignoring the early architecture of many parts or our sea coast area which is extremely typical of that part of Canada, and which is almost unique in the world because of the combination of the architecture and the building products that were available at that time.

Certain combinations of architecture and material are unique to the east coasts of Canada and the United States. We have done absolutely nothing to encourage the preservation of this. We should be encouraging the use of the architectural forms, which would not cost more, and would blend with the landscape. Yet, we have done nothing in this regard.

The government should consider granting a lower interest rate to encourage people to build the kind of houses which, for example, in Quebec are traditional to a given landscape, and which on the sea coast of Nova Scotia blend into the scenery. Although this would not represent a great expense to the taxpayers it would preserve for future generations a form of scenery which is unique to our country. My God, Madam Speaker, it seems that wherever one goes in this country one sees the same kind of construction, the same kind of houses from Montreal to Vancouver. Where we have uniqueness why should we not provide some encouragement?

This bill provides for collaboration with CMHC and Heritage Canada to evolve programs designed to encourage the use of these original forms of building and material, as well as the colours which characterize these coasts. This would not in the least restrict some of the newest developments in architecture which, because a great deal of thought has been put into them, have evolved forms of buildings which do integrate well with seascapes.

There is no need for anyone to feel in respect of this bill that they would not be allowed to build summer cottages. That would not be the case. I have often repeated that one of the tragedies in this country is that CMHC has never used its power as a lender to require across Canada, wherever it lends money, the kind of planning which involves not only construction but green space, architecture, aesthetics and land use, the kind of planning that maximizes the use of all available technology and knowledge.

We have had the ability to build useful suburbs since the Second World War, and yet most of our suburbs do not and will not stand the test of time. Sure the houses are well built, but the context in which these houses are built is a poorly designed one. There are no pedestrian or bike paths, there are not enough green spaces.

We could have done everything far better with the technology that was available had CMHC imposed the ideas they had. Deliberately government after government did not give CMHC that kind of power. Successive governments felt that it was a constitutional infringement on the powers of the provinces. It has been my view, and still is, that we should use the leverage instruments we have with CMHC to push provinces and municipalities into doing the things which will assure for future generations the kind of living environment which they deserve. We have all the physical assets in terms of landscape beauty that any country could wish for, and yet we are not taking advantage of them. We have the people in this country who are capable of telling us how to do it. Let us give them an opportunity to do it.

I believe that the bill before us will achieve this aim. I know it has found sympathy among officials in two or three government departments, and I hope that hon. members here will see fit to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that we can put additional pressure on the government to bring forward a bill similar to this which would provide us with the means to achieve what I hope hon. members will agree is a necessary objective.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to commend the hon. member for bringing forth a bill of this nature the purpose of which is found in one of the words of the title of the bill, namely, conservation, and I am delighted to see that really he is a Conservative at heart—

Some hon. Members: No, conservationist!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —because there can be no more important thing for us to consider than the importance of preserving all kinds of things in this country, preserving a reasonable economic system, preserving values, and preserving natural resources. But, perhaps more important, we should be preserving the quality of life, and I think that is perhaps what the hon. member intends by this bill.

The hon. member mentioned the fact that there seems to be a difficulty in Canada in this kind of preservation in that quite often these things are sacrificed on the altar of profit. I think that he is right to a great extent, that perhaps we had leaned in the direction of sacrificing everything on the altar of profit. However, I would not want to stand in this chamber, representing the interests that I do, and say I am opposed to the operation of the profit motive in our society. Indeed it is the reasonable and enlightened operation of the profit motive that has built this country.

On the other hand the job of legislators, I think, is to find the balance somewhere between the legitimate operation of the profit motive in the business life of the country and the protection of the public interest. That, I think, would be one of the objects of the authority, not to interfere wilfully with the rights of Canadians to pursue what has been traditionally given to us by our heritage—that is the right to own and develop property—but to temper that right in some way with an obligation that is growing, even in the field of private property, the obligation to consider the larger public interest.

This is the difficulty that faces municipalities when they zone property, restricting the right of people to deal in property; it is the right that comes to play before planning boards and commissions of provinces, so they can in fact accomplish within their sphere what is the object of this bill, namely, the preservation and conservation of Canada's sea coast.

The concept of the bill is not new, it has been with us for some time, and I hope I can be forgiven if I refer, in support of this bill, to the excellent work being done in this province by the conservation authorities of Ontario which are analogous in object and intent to what, as I gather from the hon. member's remarks, he would consider for the sea coasts, of Canada.

The Ontario conservation authorities are in fact now engaged in the development of parks for public use, for the travelling public, and for the public who want to go there for rest and relaxation to get away from the hurly burly of life, and in the preservation of the great forest areas and the development of the banks of the rivers. They are involved as well in assuming the title to property for access to the banks of our rivers, lakes and streams, just as I would imagine the hon. member would like his authority to have authority to deal with these in the case of our sea coasts.

The hon. member mentioned the preservation of our past in terms of retaining for the future historical buildings and places. That has been the job of this kind of authority, in all parts of Canada and the best instance within the national capital is the work of the Rideau Valley Conservation Authority at Manotick in their preservation of the Watson Mill and the Dickinson House. I had the privilege of being there for the opening of that institution and I think all hon. members should go there and visit it. I think they would be quite moved by the work of preservation that has been done.

All too often our sea coasts, our river banks, the centres of our towns, the concession roads of our townships where there are things worth preserving in the urban and rural setting, are set aside because we have been too busy to stop a while and look to see how important these things are to the preservation of our heritage. We have been too concerned with what is ahead rather than looking to the foundation stones upon which our society was built. It is in that sense I think that the hon. member has raised the matter.

The hon. member spoke about the work of historical societies, and I am sure this would fall within the objectives of this bill. I see he is nodding his head in agreement.

I am to have the honour of attending the unveiling ceremony of a historical plaque commemorating the forwarding trade on the St. Lawrence River erected through the auspices of the Grenville Historical Society. In every part of my constituency there is an active group of people willing and able to ensure that the heritage of our past is not forgotten. I think there could be co-operation between groups of that sort and the kind of authority that the hon. member has proposed.

It would not be the first time for the federal government to be involved in such things. The federal government works actively on the preservation of historical places, and that is commendable. The work should be supported in this House and by all members promoting such things within their constituencies.

Fort Wellington at Prescott is in my constituency, and I have always been grateful for the minister's co-operation with the local people in that undertaking. The Department of Transport has co-operated with the local historical society in the preservation of the locks on the Rideau Canal at Merivale.

The National Capital Commission is another example of co-operation. The entire matter is under study by a committee of this House and it is not being treated on any partisan political level. We all hope that machinery will be developed for the consultation between the national government and the local authorities which is so valuable to that committee. It has the grave responsibility for the very things which are the object of this bill as they refer to the sea coasts of Canada.

I am concerned that the economic difficulties which face us in this country mean that projects important in our history and in the spiritual sense and conservation sense will have to be abandoned or delayed. The blame lies with the government for failing to control inflation. As a result, commendable projects such as suggested by the hon. member must be put aside.

In the House yesterday the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) asked members on all sides not to call for programs that needed extra funding because the government intends to cut back, to slice the fat off the estimates by curbing the size of the public service. Many worth-while projects will be set aside as a result, and perhaps this is one of them.

For the last five years in this country we have been tempted to live beyond our means, and now the government says that many of these worthy projects will fall by the wayside. In face of what the President of the Treasury Board said yesterday about cutting back, I do not see how we can honestly support the creation of another bureaucracy such as would be required to carry out the objects of this bill. I think there is general agreement on all sides of the House that the intention of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) for the preservation of those things precious to us is commendable, but surely we cannot support another bureaucracy.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I appreciate having some time this afternoon to comment on this bill. I congratulate the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) for his good work, and my friend across the way for his attitude.

As a member of the Standing Committee of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I am interested in this subject, and I have also done research work on the environment as it affects many of the points the hon. member raised. I think all members in the House would support the objectives set out in the bill, mainly the preservation of our sea coast. There may be some difference in approach to these objectives, however. One question is whether the hon. member would want to establish a new authority or use existing authorities and government agencies. At this time of restraints perhaps we should opt for the latter. I hope the hon. member for Laprairie understands that I am not in any way questioning his objectives or viewpoint when I say that there could be cheaper and perhaps more effective ways of accomplishing this.

I am rather concerned about the constitutionality of what is being proposed, but of course I am not a constitutional lawyer. I understand that the management and sale of public lands is in the hands of the provinces, and I agree with the previous speaker that if the provinces owning coastal waters have conservation authorities already, perhaps it would be best to add to their funding in order to accomplish the things that are desired. In Ontario, conservation authorities are involved with municipal councils not only on an input basis but also in the financing of the authority. It seems that in some provinces we already have certain bodies which combine the provincial and municipal arms of government. Perhaps some of the objects set out by the hon. member can be handled that way.

We should not overlook the work of Canada's historical societies. In my riding there is a tremendous new awareness of our historical heritage and many people are involved in identifying and recording matters of historical interest. I, too, spend much time in this way. I should mention Heritage Canada. I am impressed by some of the work they have done in identifying historical areas which are of National significance, and in promoting public awareness.

I think we should be particularly proud of the job that Parks Canada has done. Parks Canada is a well established government agency and has done many of the things about which the hon. member talked. Probably in the past five or six years we have established more new parks in Canada than were established in the previous 50. At least nine parks are coastal in nature. They have been primarily established for the purpose of preserving coastal zones for conservation and recreation purposes.

The shoreline protected by these parks is approximately 400 miles long. We have, for example, Pacific Rim National Park, with approximately 70 miles of coastline proposed for inclusion; Auyuittuq, which takes up 112 miles of the Baffin Island coastline. I suggest that there we have some of the most precious coastline left in Canada. In addition, Prince Edward Island parks account for 30 miles, Fundy National Park for 11 miles, Kouchibouguac for 18 miles, Cape Breton Highlands for 11 miles, Forillon for 22 miles, Gros Morne for 70 miles and Terra Nova for 56 miles. I placed these figures on record to indicate the extent to which Parks Canada has established parks in coastal areas. Of course the primary purpose for which the parks were established was that of preserving the coast.

It is also interesting to note the action taken by a number of provinces with jurisdiction over coastal areas. They have ensured that their coastal land stays within Canadian ownership and is not available for sale to non-Canadians who might perhaps develop it for uses not compatible with the aims set out by the hon. member for Laprairie.

I am interested in most of the aims set out by the hon. member, and I am especially interested in preserving many buildings around the sea coast as these obviously are among the oldest in Canada and, architecturally, are some of the most precious in Canada. They should be preserved if possible.

As the hon. member suggested, we must ask who is to pay for these properties to ensure that they will never be sold or used for any purpose except that of history? Once a building or historical site is identified, if it is important to Canadians it ought to be preserved and maintained by the use of already existing agencies. I suggest that the federal government can help in this regard by providing funds on the condition that the aims set out by the hon. member are met. I think the hon. member's aims are worth pursuing.

I spoke for a few minutes this afternoon to congratulate the hon. member for his work on the bill, to say that I agree with its objects, but to suggest that it is not necessary to refer the bill to committee for consideration, as what the hon. member has in mind can be accomplished by agencies already in place.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) for this bill. If ever any kind of bill justifies the retention of private members' hour, it is this kind of bill. It is a good bill, embodying sound principles. As its mover is a government supporter one would expect the bill to commend itself to the government, even though the bill commends itself to the House. But being cautious, the government will allow few private members' bills to be read the second time. I suppose that is understandable, as such caution is a safeguard against badly drafted legislation and the possibility that badly drafted bills will become law. Yet the principle of referring the subject matter of a bill like this to committee for study is commendable and should receive the favourable consideration of the House.

I was interested to note that three hon. members representing land locked constituencies, namely, the hon. member for Laprairie, the sponsor, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne), spoke in favour of preserving the great heritage of Canada's massive coastline, and rightly so. Often people who live near the sea do not appreciate the sea but tend to take its benefits for granted.

The coasts of Canada are a great heritage. The Newfoundland coastline is over 6,000 miles long. Until fairly recently there were 1,300 towns and villages along that massive coastline. I am sorry to say that their number has been reduced, because of the declining inshore fishery and other economic factors favouring centralization, to about 900. Nevertheless, Newfoundland has a magnificent coastline, with its great bays, beautiful fjords, magnificent coastal panoramas, and bird sanctuaries where one will find nesting many of the great sea birds of the world.

The great danger to our coasts, both in the east and the west, and in the Arctic, comes not from the intrusion of man, not from the commercial exploitation of resources. In a sense the chief enemy is the sea itself, the sea which is rapidly becoming polluted. We remember only too well the accident of the tanker Arrow and the consequences of that accident.

Hardly a day goes by without some oil slick being washed up on some shore somewhere in Canada. Where does the oil originate? It comes from the many ships at sea which disobey maritime laws and dump ballast, bunker fuel, etc. at night when detection is almost impossible. The oil is washed ashore as an oil slick and does irreparable damage to the environment. We have not as yet devised technology to clean up this kind of pollution, especially in Canada where the climate is cold. The colder it gets, the more difficult it is for this kind of oil pollution to break down and disappear into the environment. It is a very serious threat. The further north you get, the more complicated and serious it becomes.

We are probably on the eve of another disaster where somewhere at sea a tanker will run ashore, or an oil well that has been sunk and tapped will start to leak. This happened off the coast of California in the Santa Barbara area with disastrous results. It also happened in the Gulf of Mexico and off the coast of Florida. It is a great danger.

One of the things I like about this bill is that it would put into place in Canada an authority which could provide contingency plans which could be brought into force in the event of such a disaster. Imagine the consequences of an accident in the Gulf or the Bay of Fundy on the magnificent beaches of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick. Think of the damage which could be done to these beautiful beaches, some of the finest in the world. It makes us wonder why we do not have such an authority already.

I believe that the hon. member has brought forward a good idea. It is a good bill. The subject matter would provide a standing committee of the House with the necessary vehicle to look into these questions and make recommendations to the government as to the feasibility of putting into place such an authority as is called for in this bill.

With regard to the preservation of some of the architecture on the east and west coasts of Canada, this bill may not meet that kind of situation. The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) referred to the great work of historical societies, Heritage Canada, and Parks Canada. I certainly agree they are doing tremendous work in preserving our architectural heritage.

The beaches of Canada belong to all of us. We have an obligation to ensure that they are protected from the kind of pollution which is perhaps most difficult to control, that which comes from without. I refer to tankers that are allowed to operate along our coastlines and in our territorial waters without proper navigational aids, such as was the case with the tanker Arrow. We can pass all the laws to govern pollution that we wish, but it will not prevent these tramp tankers which fly flags of convenience from traversing our coastlines, running the risk of going aground and dumping their cargoes. They not only do irreparable damage to our beaches, but to the fisheries and marine life which find sanctuary within them. This bothers and frightens me.

I love the sea. I was born on the east coast of Canada. I was raised with the sea in my blood. To walk on the clean, wholesome beaches of eastern Canada is a tremendous exercise, a tremendous advantage. I hope that we as a parliament will take steps to put into place some kind of authority, perhaps not exactly as envisaged in the hon. member's bill, but at least set up some kind of authority to preserve this great resource, protecting it from the polluters of this world and ensuring that the quaint villages that are found, especially on the east coast of Canada, are preserved for generations to come. I hope the House will allow the subject matter of the hon. member's bill to go to the committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise for less than a minute. I should like to join with all others who have spoken in commending the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) for introducing this bill. I am sure that all who have been here during this hour feel it has been a most worthwhile discussion.

The other comment I wish to make is that there seems to be general agreement that the subject matter of the bill ought to be referred to the standing committee. I should like to make it unanimous. I suggest that a way be found to do that before this private members' hour concludes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened to what my friend has said. I hope there will be unanimous consent within the House to do that. I can certainly say for the Official Opposition that there would be unanimous consent to refer the subject matter of the bill to the standing committee. On the same point of order and alluding to what the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has said, we should consider the importance of the subject matter of private bills generally and consider a procedure by which the subject matter of more of these bills can be referred to committees of the House for consideration.

Mr. Watson: On the same point of order, Madam Speaker. If we could have unanimous consent I would move that the subject matter of Bill C-53 be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member has already moved second reading. This would require unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, while I certainly agree with the points expressed, I think we are asking something of the House and the minister without him knowing exactly what is going on at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where are the ministers?

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): There are some ministers here, but not the minister responsible. We are asking him to accept something without any indication from him or his parliamentary secretary as to whether they agree to it. While the subject matter is certainly one that deserves consideration—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame!

Mr. McGrath: You just killed it.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): I am sorry, but I think we are talking about a situation and we have no right to take advantage.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FAILURE OF FRANCE TO INVITE CANADA TO ECONOMIC SUMMIT CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the motion I would like to move will, I hope, receive the support of the House. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the inexcusable decision and determination of the Government of the Republic of France denying to have Canada represented at the Paris Summit Meeting November 15 to 17, which will be convened to discuss the world's financial problems. I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House strongly protests such decision, which creates a precedent, in that it denies the right of Canada, for the first time since the Second World War, to be invited to an international conference, and no less inexcusable, having regard to the historic relationship of France to our country in peace and war.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of this motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF ACTIVITIES OF WESTON IN THE FOOD INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the recent seizure of the records of the United Fisheries and Allied Workers Union pursuant to the Combines Investigation Act, and in view of the fact that the Weston conglomerate continues to dominate the purchase and marketing of food and fish products in Canada without apparent investigation, as well as being the principal purchaser of west coast salmon, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs investigate the activities of the Weston conglomerate in the food industry, and further, that the minister advise the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry as to the extent of inquiries by his department within the past ten years into the Weston conglomerate.

SUGGESTED PARTICIPATION OF WORKERS AS SHAREHOLDERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the increasing problems faced by the labour market, which is ever more perturbed by unemployment and strikes, since this situation causes considerable prejudice to all those involved in this vicious circle, and since we must at all cost find means of restoring real balance and prosperity in the industry to support effectively our economy which is now faced with severe problems, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House of Commons consider forthwith adopting legislation which would enable workers to share in the profits of the industry by holding shares, the revenue of which would be partly deductible for income tax purposes on the same basis as revenue from the stock market, a measure which would immediately and directly stimulate production and reduce the need to strike and would create a healthy climate in the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE IN CANADA'S DECISION ON HOSTING UNITED NATIONS' CRIME CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing concern, namely the disturbing allegations in the latest issue of The Canadian Magazine concerning the role of the executive of another country in Canada's decision regarding the Fifth U.N. Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders. The seriousness of the charge being underlined by the fact that the author, Mr. Noel Moore, was the official U.N. spokesman for the congress, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House, viewing with concern any reflection upon Canadian sovereignty in the realm of foreign policy, invites the Secretary of State for External Affairs to find an early opportunity to make a full statement in the House concerning the allegations made by an experienced United Nations official which reflect upon Canada's independence of action and decision regarding the hosting of the Fifth U.N. REQUEST FOR DELAY IN GRANTING LEASE TO SKY SHOPS AT DORVAL PENDING INVESTIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. This matter concerns a lease between Her Majesty and Sky Shops Export Limited, or its assignees, granting an exclusive concession for a duty-free shop at Montreal International Airport at Dorval. The matter is urgent and pressing because the renewal of the lease takes effect on December 1, 1975. It touches this House, this parliament and the government because shortly before the government authorized the lease Senator Louis de G. Giguère, then and now a Member of Parliament, became a shareholder of the company and, shortly after authority for the lease was granted, sold his shares for a very substantial profit.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacKay: I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury:

That the government amend, revoke or stay the concession to operate a duty-free shop at Montreal International Airport at Dorval, granted to Sky Shops Export Limited, to commence December 1, 1975, until and subject to an independent investigation into, and report upon, the negotiations leading to the grant by the government of the said concession and the role, if any, of Senator Giguère therein.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be put in the absence of the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS BY "TIME CANADA" TO PARENT ORGANIZATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Time Canada in 1973 and 1974 paid twice as much in dividends to its parent company Time Inc. of the United States as it actually earned in profits—a practice obviously designed to milk the Canadian company of as much money as possible—and in view of the relevance of Time's corporate behaviour in connection with Bill C-58 which some day, presumably, will be coming back to the House for further debate, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant:

That this House instruct the government to initiate a thorough investigation of all circumstances surrounding the payment of dividends by Time Canada to its U.S. parent and to make the results of such investigation available to members of this House at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the motion cannot be present without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent.

DORVAL—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN GRANTING OF LEASE TO SKY SHOPS PENDING INVESTIGATION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport pursuant to a matter of which I have given him notice and which I intend to present in the form of a petition later this afternoon. Is the minister aware of all the circumstances surrounding the renewal of the lease of Sky Shops Export Limited at Dorval, and will he undertake at this time to stay the renewal of the lease until he is fully satisfied that the renewal has been properly obtained?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I am not sure I can state categorically that I am aware of all the circumstances surrounding anything but I am glad to tell the hon. member that I looked at the question of the original lease and was satisfied that a judgment was made about its merits on the basis of its value and the terms of alternative proposals. I shall, of course, follow up the representations of the hon. member as usual.

Mr. MacKay: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he will give the House an undertaking that he, in concert with his colleague the Minister of Transport, will thoroughly investigate the circumstances surrounding the granting of leases and concessions to Sky Shops Export Limited both at Dorval and Mirabel?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have just received a copy of the petition the hon. member intends to present to the House later, and I should like to read the petition before I answer his question.

SUGGESTED EXPEDITING OF INVESTIGATIONS INTO MIRABEL CONTRACTS AND DREDGING CONTRACTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. At a time when the working people of this country have very great restraints placed upon their incomes by a law now before this parliament, is it the intention of the Solicitor General to expedite the investigation into alleged wrongdoings concerning the Mirabel airport contract in addition to the investigation currently underway into alleged wrongdoings concerning government dredging contracts, so that these rip-off artists can at least have restraints placed upon them too?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I reported to the House the other day, the allegations with respect to Mirabel airport have been passed on to the RCMP, and they are evaluating them to see whether an investigation is necessary. The reported story that the investigation is not going ahead because of a shortage of personnel is completely false. I checked that once again this morning and they say that if, in their estimation, an investigation is necessary they will proceed as quickly as possible. With respect to the dredging investigation, that is proceeding as quickly as possible.

CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRCRAFT—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION ON RECOMMENDATIONS OF CORONERS' JURY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the unequivocal call by the coroner's jury following the inquest into the Panarctic Oil company plane crash for a full public inquiry, as well as the request by two fathers of victims and the sister of the pilot for a full public inquiry, can the minister now announce to the House that he intends to allow a full public inquiry without further delay?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House earlier that I thought the question of transport issues involved and those of safety were satisfactorily canvassed in the investigation and the report made to me within this department. Other issues that may arise are really more properly the concern of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of specific recommendations that have now been made by that particular jury—in particular, the request that radio operators should be licensed, a fairly fundamental request, I would expect, and the whole question of seat belts and emergency procedures in a crash—would the minister now advise whether these specific recommendations that the jury made have been taken in hand by his department, and that we can expect immediate action on those specific recommendations?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have previously told the House that the issue of safety in relation to flying in the private sector had been under examination, and that some number of months ago proposals regarding changed regulations were in fact put forward for discussion to the industry. These involved a whole range of questions concerning facilities and qualifications in the private flying sector. Comments on these are all expected to have been received by the middle of this month, at which time formulation of specific regulations will go ahead.

NEED FOR UNIFORM RECIPROCAL RECOGNITION OF SUBPOENAS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the problems the coroner's jury had regarding subpoenaing witnesses outside the Northwest Territories and the general problem of subpoenaing witnesses between one province and another, which, as the minister knows, has been a continuing difficulty in Canada, would the minister consult his counterparts or take action to consult his counterparts so that we can have legislation covering the broad range of subpoena powers in order not to run into this problem constantly with inquests and juries who do not have the capacity to subpoena witnesses, which means that the whole story does not come out?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I asked my advisers to consider the coroners' ordinance in the Northwest Territories and examine the effectiveness of that ordinance both as to the powers of coroners in the north generally and with specific reference to the powers of subpoenaing witnesses outside the territories. That review is underway. The same problem exists, as the hon. member has pointed out, between the north and the provinces and between provinces. The solution to that problem is the enactment by the provinces of a uniform reciprocal recognition of subpoenas, which was recommended a year ago by the uniformity commissioners. I urge provincial attorneys general to consider that report carefully and to act upon it. I would be happy at my next meeting with the provincial attorneys general to raise this issue with them.

OPPOSITION OF UNIONS TO ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Since the majority of union leaders in Canada are considering combating the government's anti-inflation measures by investing large sums of money in advertising, can the minister inform the House whether he has been in touch with the union leaders to dissuade them from their pursuit?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that I have certainly been in touch with union leaders, but not to advise them not to invest funds. It is their right to invest their membership funds in the ways they consider proper, and they are accountable to their membership for that. If this is one of them, I do not believe any advice from me on that question would be at all helpful. I would just advise the hon. member that as far as I am concerned, I think most labour leaders are adopting the view that they should oppose this legislation in every legitimate way prior to it becoming law, and then they are going to work within the law.

INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGED DRUG TRAFFICKING AT DORVAL AIRPORT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would address my question to the Solicitor General. Will he inform the House on the status of the RCMP investigation into drug trafficking at Dorval International Airport?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure in respect of what investigation the hon. member is referring.

An hon. Member: There are so many you can't keep up to them, Warren.

Mr. Allmand: That is right; drug trafficking is a serious problem in this country and there are many investigations going on. Perhaps the hon. member could please inform me to which investigation he is referring.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Get with it.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I was unaware that the Solicitor General had more than one investigation going at the same time into drug trafficking at Dorval airport. Could the minister inform the House of the fate of Sergeant LeDuc, the RCMP officer who informed the press of the alleged activities?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the hon. member is following up on an investigation that was referred to before the House adjourned for the summer. I will have to get the report on that and give it to the hon. member as I do not have that information with me right now.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO STIMULATE EXPORTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce; that is trade and commerce. As Statistics Canada in its report of last Thursday stated: "The volume of imports into Canada increased by 4 per cent in August, to a level of 41 per cent above 1971." and, "The volume of exports continued to decline, dipping below the 1971 level", would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to give an outline to the House of what he intends to do to bring our exports back to the plus side?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but whether it will be on motions or by some other means, I will be very happy to do that just as soon as I have had a chance to examine the statistics thoroughly and understand what their real implications may be.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—DEGREE OF INDEPENDENCE BOARD PERMITTED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister who I am sure will have been informed of the statements made by Mr. Pepin during the weekend with regard to the degree of independence his anti-inflation review board should enjoy. Will the Acting Prime Minister clarify what independence the government feels that board should enjoy, particularly with regard to analyzing and speaking out about the root causes of inflation from time to time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the government's intention that the Anti-Inflation Board should be an independent board, indeed, free to comment on the actions of the government itself. For example, in respect of any wage settlements proposed by the government the Anti-Inflation Board would have the opportunity of reviewing and commenting on those. It is also our hope that the Anti-Inflation Board will give some general leadership in the fight against inflation by talking about its causes and what seems to be required.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of Mr. Pepin's expressed desire to have the right to express strong views on why we have inflation, and also as to the reform which is needed in some major Canadian institutions, will the board be free to do that in respect of the general level of government expenditures, for example? Would the government welcome or accept statements from the Anti-Inflation Board in respect of the general level of these expenditures?

Mr. Sharp: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we would have no objection if the board wants to comment on that. The government intends to make this work. I imagine it will be very strongly criticized by the opposition in doing so and we would like to have some support.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF DENIAL OF ACCESS TO COURTS TO SETTLE INDIAN CLAIMS—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF MR. HUNT'S TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He has notice of the question. It concerns the announcement by him of the intention to involve his department directly with the question of native land claims by appointing Mr. Digby Hunt as a claims commissioner. I should like to ask the minister if it is now the position of the government that it intends to deal with these most important issues on a political level rather than provide the natives with the means to have their claims adjudicated in court.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government, ever since the statement of my predecessor on August 8, 1973, has been that we are prepared to sit down and negotiate with the native people in the areas where treaty was not entered into by the native people. I have indicated on many occasions that we feel that is a preferable route to going through the courts.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, would the minister be prepared to discuss briefly the terms of reference under which Mr. Hunt has been asked to carry out his duty and make these terms of reference a subject for discussion by the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Buchanan: I will have to consider that, Mr. Speaker, and I will be happy to make a copy of the terms of reference available to the hon. member.

INDIAN CLAIMS IN RESPECT OF ATHABASCA TAR SANDS—POSSIBILITY OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST FOR MINISTER

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary concerns the claim which the Indian Association of Alberta has brought in respect of the Athabasca tar sands. Could the minister indicate what action his department is taking in that regard and whether it will offer the Indian people any kind of assistance to plead their case and whether indeed he may be somewhat in a position of conflict of interest insofar as the tar sands are concerned since he has responsibility for the Indian people while at the same time the government has a direct investment in the area? Could he clarify these matters?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this question involves a conflict of interest. This is an action before the courts and the courts will deal with it.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON EFFECT OF WAGE SETTLEMENTS ON PRICE OF EXPORTS

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of a statement by the Minister of Labour last week at the convention of the Newfoundland and Labrador Federation of Labour that much of the public hysteria over wage levels has been generated by some who intentionally or unintentionally have distorted statistical data, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether that statement indicates that the government has revised its view with respect to the alleged excessiveness of recent wage increases, and particularly, whether the government still holds to the view that such wage increases are threatening to price our product out of international markets.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would just say to the hon. member that I believe he has quoted the paragraph in my speech quite correctly. I have maintained, and so have others, that wage settlements over the course of the last year have not been the primary cause but more the opposite, that wages have been chasing prices. It is quite consistent justification for the policy we are announcing now and carrying through on and he will see my rationale for that position in the speech. He will also see it is obvious to all of us, having stated the general proposition, that some wage settlements have been excessive.

DATE WHEN EFFECT OF WAGE SETTLEMENTS ON PRICE OF EXPORTS IS REFLECTED IN STATISTICS

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Acting Prime Minister could indicate when he expects such effects on our competitive position to be reflected in the statistics. Perhaps in that context he would like to give the House his explanation of the fact that, according to latest figures from Statistics Canada, the prices of the goods we import, including those for finished products which are labour intensive are continuing to increase at a rate that is almost double the rate of increase in prices of Canada's exports, indicating that our competitive position is actually improving.

● (1430)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that what the hon. gentleman has said is true. The whole purpose of our program is to protect our competitive position.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COST OF INTRODUCING LOGO—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CONTROL

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware of the fact that the cost of introducing a CBC logo, that is an identification symbol, last year was more than $390,000 and the cost of the one cocktail party to introduce that logo was more than $3,400 and that the CBC has attempted to keep this expenditure a secret until this moment? If so, can the minister say whether future expenditures of this sort will not be kept secret—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Raines: —and future expenditures of this nature will be deleted from the CBC budget and, if not deleted, that such moneys will be spent on programming rather than fripperies, and whether this matter is under his control and jurisdiction?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think the most germane part of the question was at the end concerning how much came under my direct control. It is very limited, for good reasons, but I will refer the rest of the question to the corporation.

Mr. Baldwin: Tell them to keep within the guidelines now.

DEVELOPMENT OF PORT AT GROS-CACOUNA—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport?

Considering the discussions and transactions that have been going on for many years now regarding the construction of a deep water sea port at Gros-Cacouna, as well as the talks your department has been having for some time with the Quebec trade department, could the minister tell the House what stage the negotiations have reached in that regard? Could he say also whether he expects satisfactory results?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is action on two fronts with regard to this important potential harbour. In the first place, discussions with the province of Quebec have led to the conclusion that some further steps in analysis would be useful, and that is likely to go forward with dispatch. In addition to that, I have taken a special interest in the potential of that particular area and will be endeavouring to ensure that this department is in a position to make recommendations at an early date.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FAILURE OF FRANCE TO INVITE CANADA TO ATTEND ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it has to do with the fact that Canada, despite its expressed desire and willingness to be present at the economic conference beginning on November 15, has been turned down. It was reported in the press that a senior official in the Prime Minister's office said two days ago that there was no indication that an invitation will be extended and that the position of the French government is not that they do not like us but that they feel the conference will only succeed if it is an intimate gathering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the minister has done everything possible to obtain an invitation and was in touch with the United States, West Germany and the United Kingdom. Would he say what is the present position and what is the reason for this extraordinary decision. Apparently France has forgotten about the tremendous service rendered by Canada in two world wars in that country.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the present decision is that as yet Canada has not been invited to participate in the economic summit, but the support for the attendance of Canada has come, as the right hon. gentleman mentioned, quite strongly from the United States and from the Federal Republic of Germany. Also, the possibility of our attendance has been sympathetically received by Japan and the United Kingdom. The host country has not yet agreed to the attendance of Canada. We believe we have the economic position in the world to justify our attendance and we believe that our presence would help to counter-balance the very heavy European attendance at the conference. We are still putting forward our claim and we have not yet given up hope that we will be invited to attend this summit.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is it correct, as stated in the press a couple of days ago, that the reasons given unofficially by France for not inviting Canada are the declining economic importance of Canada in the world and our diplomatic tendency to take a narrowly selfish approach to world problems?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I am quite sure that is not the reason, Mr. Speaker.

EFFECT OF ALLEGED RELIANCE ON UNITED STATES TO OBTAIN INVITATION TO ATTEND ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to that put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Since one of the major objectives of our foreign policy, we have been given to understand, has been to assert our independence from the United States especially in the eyes of our European partners, can the minister explain why this heavy reliance on Mr. Kissinger's efforts should not be seen as running counter to our aims and thereby hurting our chances of gaining access to the conference?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to have the support of the President of the United States. We have received the support of the head of the government of the Federal Republic of Germany and of the United Kingdom. So, we are not feeling we have to rely entirely on the U.S., whose support we welcome very much in this instance.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General regarding the investigation of the SIU which, I believe, started some time in May. Can the minister bring us up to date regarding the status of this investigation and whether any charges are contemplated? When does he believe the investigation will be completed, if it is not already?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I check on these investigations from time to time with the RCMP. I was told recently that the investigation with respect to the SIU is still continuing but in different parts of the country, the west coast, the east coast, Montreal and Ontario, and that it is very difficult to give dates when such investigations can be concluded because during the investigation new evidence appears which has to be followed up. So I am afraid I cannot tell the hon. member more at this time.

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED DRUG TRAFFICKING AT DORVAL AIRPORT—-REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I now have an answer to the question posed by the hon. member for Victoria with respect to the narcotics investigation at the Dorval airport which was started in the spring. It appears that a former Canadian customs officer has been arrested and charged, as well as a former policeman and an Air Canada employee who worked at the airport. These people have all been charged, and since the case is now before the courts I cannot say more at this time.

EXCISE TAX

REFUNDABLE TAX ON GASOLINE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ESTABLISH EXEMPTION CERTIFICATE PROCEDURE FOR BULK PURCHASERS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue in the absence of the Minister of Finance, and it is directed to him because of his experience as parliamentary secretary when Bill C-66 was put through the House. In view of the continuing concern of the school bus system in Canada, of the Canadian Trucking Association as well as of municipalities, construction firms and agricultural producers, about the imposition and collection of the refundable 10 cents a gallon excise tax on gasoline, has the government taken action to establish the exemption certificate procedure for bulk fuel purchasers, for which provision was made in a last minute amendment to Bill C-66?

● (1440)

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know just how far along the path this particular item has gone, but I will most assuredly find out and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Towers: Could the minister tell the House whether the committee was appointed and whether it is working at the present time?

Mr. Cullen: To date my information is that in fact there is a committee of two departments working on this particular problem.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ADHERENCE OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS TO ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the President of the Treasury Board and ask him if he would confirm the general assumption widely held that departments of government themselves will be required to live not only within the letter but also within the spirit of the government's regulations with regard to increases, and that the government will not allow increases in costs for service to rise at a great rate is correct? I am thinking of such fees as licence fees, entrance fees for parks and matters of that sort.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government certainly intends to follow the guidelines announced in the bill introduced by the Minister of Finance. With regard to the organizations that enable the government to collect money, we intend to follow the same guidelines but in the specific case of Parks Canada, and others, we have yet to make a final decision.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION OF POLICE ORGANIZATIONS BY SECURITY DIVISION OF ARMED FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. This matter pertains to the administration of justice. In asking this question I am certainly not supporting any strike in the essential services, particularly of the police forces.

Did any member of the branch of the Canadian armed security division, known also as the security services of the Canadian armed forces, conduct an investigation of police organizations or members of their personnel—in particular the Saskatchewan Federation of Police Association and the Calgary Police Association—as to a possible police strike for any reason, or in particular, as to the reason for the attitude of the police associations in reference to the law governing persons convicted of capital murder of police officers? I put that question to the Minister of National Defence because it deals with his own security division.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I will make inquiries to see if those investigations were held.

Mr. Woolliams: I received this information from the police associations. When the minister is checking this out, will he check whether Major Figley of the Winnipeg western security division and Warrant Officer Kacinia were involved in the investigation, and under what authority this investigation of city and urban police forces was conducted? Who directed the orders and what was the purpose of the investigation?

BROADCASTING

ACTIONS OF UNITED STATES TELEVISION STATIONS IN OBTAINING CANADIAN ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that United States border television stations are dumping advertising inventories to Canadian advertisers—for example, $60 time slots being sold for $22—in order to dry up business for Canadian stations and to force them into a loss position, and in view of the fact that this dumping is circumventing the proposed income tax measures in Bill C-58 dealing with television advertising, what measures is the minister taking or planning to take to protect Canadian television stations?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on the dumping aspect although I will certainly look into it. I think that the remedy clearly lies in a speedy passage of Bill C-58.

Mr. Symes: I hope the minister, along with the Minister of Finance, will investigate with regard to the anti-dumping aspect, and I remind the minister that the income tax provisions in the bill do not cover the selling of advertising at half cost, which in effect circumvents the proposed legislation.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD—POSSIBILITY STRIKE AGAINST VERDICT OF BOARD CONSTITUTES CONTRAVENTION OF GUIDELINES AND MAKES UNION SUBJECT TO PENALTIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. It is supplementary to questions directed to him and to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the discussion with respect to the jurisdiction of the anti-inflation review board, is it the view of the government that a strike against the verdict of the Anti-Inflation Board to obtain remuneration above the guidelines after the appeal period has been exhausted constitutes a contravention of the guidelines and therefore makes the union subject to the penalties envisaged in Bill C-73?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes that he is putting a hypothetical question or seeking a legal opinion, neither of which is permitted.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTED STUDY OF CROWN CORPORATIONS TO ELIMINATE DUPLICATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In the interests of restraint has the government undertaken any study with respect to Crown corporations to see which might be merged, disbanded, or dealt with to ensure that we do not have what appears to be an excess of Crown corporations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know the government has not specifically undertaken any such study. We have been looking for ways of reducing expenditure, and if the hon. gentleman would like to suggest some corporations which he personally would like to see disbanded, we would be willing to consider his suggestions.

Mr. Stevens: Would the Acting Prime Minister at least indicate that he will take this subject up with his colleagues in the cabinet and ask each of them to justify the Crown corporations under their direction?

Mr. Woolliams: Like PetroCan.

Mr. Sharp: We do this constantly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: We are always asking one another questions as to whether the other fellow's activities are justifiable. That is why I ask my hon. friend to suggest which corporations he would like to disband.

Mr. Stevens: Would the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that when I produce the list of Crown corporations to which he has referred, he will in fact take the action I suggest?

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Communications. Can the Minister inform the House whether the growing dispute over the CRTC's commercial substitution policy on cable television was discussed with Dr. Kissinger during his recent visit to Ottawa? If so, could he indicate the position taken by the government on this matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I was not present at those discussions.

Mr. Balfour: Can the Acting Minister of Communications assure the House that the government will not approve any policy which will have the effect of reducing the choice of television programs available to Canadian viewers?

Mr. Lang: The assurance being sought is pretty broad, Mr. Speaker. I do not know of any action by the CRTC which is against the interests of Canadian viewers.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that unemployment is running at the rate of 25 per cent to 30 per cent on Cape Breton Island at the moment, would the minister assure the House that under the policy of restraints no moneys will be cut back with regard to a Crown corporation called the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and indeed, if moneys are being saved in any other areas, that they would be forthcoming to that corporation to expand the economy of Cape Breton, which is badly needed?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I take notice of the representation of the hon. member, and I hope that he will compare his question with the speech of his leader last Thursday.

Mr. Muir: Different situation altogether.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ART TREASURES FROM SOUTH VIET NAM—DATE OF DECISION ON WHETHER OR NOT ITEMS PERSONAL

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. Has his department ascertained whether the alleged art treasures which came from South Viet Nam are actually art treasures, belong to the people of South Viet Nam and should be returned, or whether they are in fact personal items and have as yet been delivered or given over to a person or persons in the city of Montreal?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that particular investigation has not been completed, and a report has not been made to me, so that decision has not as yet been made.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBILITY CONTRIBUTIONS EXCEEDING BENEFITS PAID—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Could the minister confirm whether the employer-employee contributions to the fund are meeting the cost of unemployment insurance benefits being paid out, or whether perhaps they are exceeding the benefits and are accruing to the general revenues of the government?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the premiums are not accruing to any surplus to the benefit of the government. As they now exist they are designed to cover the operation chargeable to the employer-employee premium account and in addition, to reduce, and I think, very soon to eliminate the deficit which was accumulated two or three years ago. Any change in the rate as a result of the passage of Bill C-69 would be based on the same principle, although, as the hon. member knows, the threshold and therefore the basis for the charge to the government, as opposed to premium account, will then be changed.

EFFECT OF EIGHTY PER CENT CANADIAN CONTENT REGULATION ON CERTAIN CANADIAN MAGAZINES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister's ruling that Canadian magazines must have 80 per cent Canadian content to qualify for tax exemptions for advertisers discriminate against Canadian magazines reporting on news beyond Canadian borders, but not discriminate against those reporting events in Canada?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is wrong. It is not a question of 80 per cent content; it is a question of being 80 per cent different, and there will be no problem with that particular guideline.

Mr. Woolliams: Is it not wonderful to have people judging what we can read?

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are not complete. [English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for addressing a question to me for the first time. It is a great pleasure to have him in the House. REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROCLAIM

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Nuclear Liability Act was passed by parliament, received royal assent in June, 1970, but has yet to be proclaimed. Can the minister indicate the reason for the delay in proclamation, and is it related to the unwillingness of private insurers to assume the responsibilities required by the act? Also, can he indicate when the act may be proclaimed?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know that there have recently been discussions with private insurance agencies and I believe they are much closer now to being able to provide the kind of insurance anticipated in that legislation. GUIDELINES ON VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, who is responsible for the CBC. Does the minister intend to introduce legislation regulating the advertising on television of violent movies rated as restricted?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member may remember that this question was raised when the CBC last appeared before the parliamentary committee. The CBC has guidelines on violence. Whether they coincide with guidelines hon. members of the House would like to see is something they can raise with the corporation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will they apply to the Liberal convention this weekend?

DATE OF BY-ELECTION IN ST. JOHN'S WEST

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Hochelaga. Has the government summoned its courage and is it prepared to call a by-election in St. John's West?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been made in this respect, but not for lack of courage.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio, the former minister of transport. Now that he is without a designated portfolio, we miss putting questions to him in the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: In order that we can direct questions to him in the future, will the hon. member tell us his duties in cabinet?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I know I will tell the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO PREVENT COURTS OF APPEAL SUBSTITUTING CONVICTION FOR ACQUITTAL BY JURY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-414, to amend the Criminal Code (appeals from jury acquittals).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to supplement Bill C-71, presently before the House, and delete the provision in the Criminal Code which allows the court of appeal to supersede the verdict of a jury. It would apply to victims now serving terms of imprisonment because they were convicted by a court of appeal after being acquitted by a jury. On passage of this bill, any such victim or victims would be released.

The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has introduced a bill similar in intent and there is also government legislation before the House to amend the Criminal Code in the way I suggest. However, neither bill provides for the release of any victim or victims presently serving sentences of imprisonment. At present, only one person in Canada is in prison because of conviction by the court of appeal. He is Dr. Henry Morgentaler. This public bill would apply to that individual, he being the only person in Canada caught in such circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: I thought the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was doing very well until he reached the last paragraph. The Chair perhaps ought to reserve the right to scrutinize carefully the provisions of the bill before debate on it takes place, to make sure that it complies with the hon. member's description of it, which except for his last couple of sentences seemed to qualify it as a public bill. For the moment, therefore, the Chair will reserve the right to intervene later if it has any misgivings about the procedural regularity of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RENEWAL OF LEASE TO SKY SHOPS AT DORVAL—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 67, I hereby present a petition relating to the renewal of the lease and concession at Montreal International Airport at Dorval between the Crown and Sky Shops Export Limited. The petitioners recite certain matters relating to the negotiations which took place for the renewal of this lease and concession which is to commence on December 1 next. The petitioners pray that this House inquire into such matters and that this House provide such remedy as this House may determine.

Housing

HOUSING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FEDERAL ACTION PROGRAM

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to outline to hon. members the federal housing action program, a series of measures designed to produce one million new housing units over the next four years, with a 1976 target of 235,000. The commitment of the federal government is to ensure production of the kind of good quality housing that lower and middle income Canadians need and can afford and, through these measures, to dampen inflation in the housing sector and stimulate economic growth and the creation of employment opportunities.

In order to achieve these objectives, the government will require private lending institutions to direct mortgage financing to lower and moderately priced new housing. In 1976, this will require an additional $750 million, for a total new housing market of $8 billion. The government will establish a monitoring committee to ensure this target is met. The government will require private lending institutions to restrict their low down payment—high ratio—lending to NHA regional loan limits, and these loan limits will be held down consistent with our price guidelines. We will make the Assisted Home Ownership Program—AHOP—available to any Canadian household of two or more people wanting to buy moderately-priced housing and to keep their monthly payments equivalent to those of an 8 per cent mortgage. The requirement of having at least one child is removed, enabling young couples to purchase a home before starting their family.

For people with children who need help to keep their monthly payments under 25 per cent of their income, grants, which are now a maximum of $600 a year, are increased to $750. For others, assistance will be in the form of a loan which will be interest-free for at least the first five years, and repayable with interest after that time or when the house is sold or refinanced upwards. The loan will be sufficient to cover the difference between market interest rates and interest at 8 per cent.

We will stimulate increased production of moderately-priced rental accommodation. The assisted rental program will make interest-free loans available to builders who will create rental housing at rents controlled by CMHC during the period of support of up to 15 years. Maximum annual loans to builders will be increased from $900 to $1,200 per unit to compensate for recent interest rate increases and to encourage supply. These loans will be recoverable. In addition, we will ask the House to approve continuation of the special capital cost allowance provisions for non-principal business rental entrepreneurs until December 31, 1977.

To improve the liquidity of mortgages as an investment, the government will make the federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation operational by April 1, 1976. To make moderate-cost housing development more attractive to municipalities, the government will make $1,000 per unit grants available to municipalities which approve medium density housing within regional AHOP and assisted rental price limits. The government will now make loans and grants available to municipalities for water treatment facilities and mains where they are needed to open up land for housing, on the same basis as assistance presently given to municipalities under the sewage treatment program for sanitary and storm sewers.

The eight-point program I have just enunciated, Mr. Speaker, is designed to fill the real needs of Canadians who are not suitably housed at the moment by providing them with access to housing they can afford. This will stimulate employment in the construction industry by creating 32,000 additional jobs in 1976. The entire four-year program involves more than a million man-years of employment.

One of the very real advantages of this program is that it directs more private capital into the moderately-priced residential mortgage market utilizing a minimum amount of taxpayers' dollars. This allows the federal government to direct its resources to Canadians in greatest need, such as senior citizens, native people, the handicapped, and others who are socially and economically deprived.

I would also like to inform hon. members that at the federal-provincial housing ministers' conference earlier today, I urged the provinces to institute rent controls consistent with the federal government's commitment to contain inflation and support new housing construction and, indeed, received that assurance. I have also asked my provincial colleagues to requires those lending institutions under provincial jurisdiction to increase their mortgage lending in line with the federal guidelines. I received that assurance.

I believe hon. members will agree that these long-range measures will enable the construction industry to marshall its resources for economic and competitive production in order to meet the most pressing needs of those Canadians who are finding difficulty acquiring adequate housing at reasonable cost under today's difficult conditions. I will be introducing legislation in the House in the very near future for the consideration of hon. members. Subject to legislative approval, the measures will be effective as of today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that we on this side of the House welcome any government initiative to stimulate the residential construction industry, particularly in view of the fact that moves taken by this government in the past 18 months have largely been responsible for the depression experienced by this very important sector of the economy. I was intrigued to hear the minister say that this program is designed to produce one million new units in the next four years. This House is very well aware of the minister's addiction to exaggeration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: We all recall his prediction of a minimum of 210,000 starts this year. The record to date is 12 per cent off target. We all recall the $1 billion of private funds that AHOP was to attract for mortgages. The record to date is $66 million. We are all familiar with predictions that have never materialized; therefore, Mr. Speaker, you will forgive us if we are somewhat skeptical today regarding this latest prediction.

In his statement, the minister mentioned $750 million for new housing starts. If we were to be generous regarding that prediction and work it out, it would come to perhaps 25,000 units per year, or 100,000 units in four years—some 900,000 short of the target the minister mentioned. I am sure the minister will want to elaborate on this shortfall. Perhaps once again he will fall back on AHOP as the catch-all for everything he cannot determine otherwise.

Some of the measures which the minister put forward today are those which we on this side of the House have advocated for some time. We strongly pressed for legislation which would provide assistance for municipalities to increase the amount of serviced land available. I am glad to see that certain aspects of this have been dealt with. We have repeatedly urged the government to set up the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation. I remind the minister that the legislation enabling him to do so has been on the books for three years.

I find several basic shortcomings in the minister's program. First, these measures will not stimulate provision of the amount of mortgage funding required to finance the supply of new housing which is so vitally needed if the inflationary aspect of housing is to be reduced. New money to the extent of $750 million is not the answer to that deficiency. Second, there is nothing in the statement to deal with the major problem presented by the high interest rates which hundreds of thousands of Canadians have been obliged to assume in the last year—a burden which will almost certainly continue to weigh heavily for many years to come. Nowhere is there any indication that the government is prepared to take measures which come to grips with the fact that well over 30 per cent of the income of these individuals goes into financing home buying. Nowhere is there any sign of relief for those who are caught by high interest rates.

Then, again, apart from a brief reference to the minister's action in urging his provincial counterparts to institute rent controls, there is no indication in the statement as to the form and level of rent control the federal government considers appropriate to its over-all restraint program.

Finally, the program fails to deal with the necessity for continuity in housing policy. Instead, emphasis has been placed on unilateral housing programs by the federal government. Scarcely any reference is made to co-operation with the provinces, something which must play a major part in the direction of housing. Thus, I would say there is nothing original about these measures. We have had stepped-up programs, expanded programs and resurrected programs, but still no recognition by the government that adequate shelter is a basic, ongoing right of all Canadians.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party feels that the measures announced by the minister today are unimpressive and will do very little to solve the housing crisis in Canada. In fact, they constitute a typical attempt to appear to be doing something very dramatic while actually doing very little. One cannot deny that the measures will have some effect on the housing problems, but they will not strike at the main problems of housing today, namely, the high cost of land and high interest rates.

I was rather impressed with the statement by the minister when he said the target for the next four years would be one million homes, because as I recall, Mr. Speaker, back in 1970 the same government announced its target as being one million homes over five years. It may be said that they achieved one million homes over five years, but in achieving that target we have experienced the worst crisis in housing Canadians have ever known. That is because the government has used the same old approaches, and it is these approaches the minister announced today. We really need five main features: first, a steady flow of funds; second, a target for homes of a certain type; third, low interest rates; fourth, low land costs and assistance with the servicing of land; and fifth, rental guidelines.

With regard to a steady flow of funds, the minister stated we would require the financial institutions to direct a certain amount of their moneys to mortgage financing. We in the New Democratic Party have recommended this for a long time, and it is high time the minister took such an initiative. But the success of this initiative will depend upon the legislation the minister brings forth in parliament, because the financial institutions have been playing a game of yo-yo with housing in respect of their financial commitment in the past. Unless the minister is direct and forceful in the legislation, very little will be accomplished.

The target of one million homes over four years was mentioned. This will require the close co-operation of the federal government with the provincial governments and the municipalities. It really calls for a strong emphasis upon public housing, more especially rental public housing. It also requires an emphasis on co-operative and non-profit housing. Mr. Speaker, may I remind you that all the public housing we have today amounts to less than 2 per cent of our total housing starts. This indicates the necessity of action by the government.

To achieve the minister's target of one million homes, the minister has adopted a pandering or bended-knee approach to the builders, developers and financial institutions. For example, there are to be interest-free loans to builders who will create rental housing controlled by CMHC up to 15 years, and increased loans on rental units from $900 to $1,200 which the minister says is to compensate for recent increases and to encourage supply. Mr. Speaker, this is a rerun of the minister's legislation of 1974 on private, limited dividend housing where he gave builders generous interest rates and agreements for five years. All he is doing is rehashing and renewing in attempting to encourage builders to build more housing. What is needed is public, limited dividend housing, that is, public housing—more especially on the rental side—and increases in co-operative and non-co-operative housing where there is control over rents, repairs and services.

The minister also mentioned that he would prescribe lower interest rates in connection with Assisted Home Ownership Programs. The main item which is missing from the anti-inflation legislation is control of interest rates. This is what is really needed, because we see ever-escalating interest rates across the board in Canada. This is the type of action which has to be taken, because interest rates are the main component in the rising cost of housing. I am not impressed with the suggestion of putting into line the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation by April, 1976. It will do nothing to bring down interest rates; it will just be doing what CMHC has done in the past. I am impressed with the minister's suggestion that there be grants to municipalities for water treatment and water mains, but the success of this initiative will depend upon the amount of funds allocated.

Finally, the minister told us in his statement that he had urged the provincial ministers of housing to implement rent controls along the guidelines set forth in the anti-inflation legislation. May I say that I do not think this is sufficient. What has to be achieved is a roll-back of rents. Rent review boards should be set up. It is not sufficient to tell landlords that they may increase their rents by only a certain percentage, because one has no idea of the increased costs they have experienced. I thought the minister would adopt the suggestion of the New Democratic Party in Ontario, roll back interest rates to January of this year and, at the most, allow a 6 per cent increase. Further increases by landlords should have to be justified before a rent review board.

There appears to be an absence of leadership in this legislation and there is an absence of meaningful programs. This will result in a continuance of the serious housing problems we have today.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate and to thank the minister who distributed copies of his statement in French. We received ours a few minutes before he made his statement and I thank him.

We of the Social Credit party find the minister is showing a lot of good will. There are seven reasons that prompt us to say so. First of all, the minister states that he will pour more money into low cost housing. I feel this gesture on the government's part is praiseworthy. I notice also in the minister's statement that from now on it will no longer be required to have a child to obtain the reimbursement of the interest rate. The minister is also giving a chance to municipalities in respect of services related to low cost houses, especially single dwellings. I believe this is a step forward and again I congratulate the minister.

As regards interest rates and the establishment of the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation, the minister said that it will be set up by April 1 at the latest. For this, we must wait for the legislation. I should like to see it determine an interest rate which is reasonable and limited, especially for medium-priced housing.

In a speech I made last year, I asked for larger grants to compensate for recent mortgage rate hikes. However, if the mortgage rate under the new legislation is prohibitive or unduly high, these $1,200 will certainly fail to bring about the expected results.

Moreover, I should like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that at a federal-provincial conference this morning, he suggested to his provincial counterparts that provinces should set up rent controls.

In the province of Quebec, we have had a great many difficulties with the Quebec Housing Act, the Quebec Housing Corporation and the CMHC. But above all, I should encourage the minister to meet more often with his provincial counterparts, especially as regards Quebec, to obtain positive results.

By way of a conclusion, I should like to express the hope, on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada, that the minister will introduce this bill and make every effort to bring down mortgage rates in line with standards of quality and price.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would give the House an estimate of the total cost of the program in a full fiscal year. Particularly so far as the 1976-77 fiscal year is concerned, how much of this cost is new housing money as opposed simply to a specific allocation of the funds committed in the June 23 budget?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has really missed the thrust of the whole program. There is substantial additional funding here. The 1976 capital budget has not yet been set. What hon. members have failed to grasp is that there is a direction to the lending institutions to increase their lending for low-cost housing at rates which people can afford. This will be done on a massive scale and will introduce some $750 million of new funding into the program, but for low-cost, good quality housing.

There are, of course, additional federal expenditures of a major type. I cannot give exact figures because the capital budget is not approved, but this will free-up—there is a significant increase over last year—hundreds of millions of dollars to enrich and enhance programs of public housing, non-profit housing, co-operative housing, senior citizens' housing, native housing, and programs for many other sectors that need to be well served.

Miss MacDonald: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the minister would elaborate on how he proposes to require this mortgage financing to be directed to new, lower and moderately-priced housing. Secondly, can he tell the House what assurances he has in fact that $8 billion will be available next year to finance new housing construction? Can the minister assure the House right now that he has those commitments from the financial institutions?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, may I first of all correct the statement the hon. member made a little earlier regarding the amount of money lent on a voluntary basis simply because we established the program. There has been some $300 million within the last several weeks. However, this program gives the Minister of Finance power to require the lending institutions to lend this money. It is not being done legislatively. By practice it has been done by indicating the wishes of government. If necessary, however, legislation will be forthcoming. We do not expect this will be necessary because various lending institutions lend in different ways.

We are not trying to disturb the investment patterns of capital markets; we are saying that we need additional funds and we need them at the rate of 14 per cent above previous commitments. If more than 14 per cent is required, then we will make this a requirement too. The situation will be monitored by a monitoring committee, in co-operation with the provinces and the provincial, chartered lending institutions. I think the provincial ministers have seen the excellence of this program, if hon. members opposite do not.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister indicated that he is removing the restriction that a couple has to have a child or more to qualify under AHOP, is the minister going to remove the same restriction on the purchase of existing homes? Since he is also freeing so much funding, is it his intention to increase funding from the government for rehabilitation purposes, which is so important to many hundreds of thousands of people of low income in this country?

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In so far as existing housing is concerned, we do not intend to seek legislative authority at this time in making that offer. We feel that all the funding that can be channelled into new residential construction is the best use of our resources. If we have an excess, then we can apply it to existing housing; but for the moment our policy remains that of increasing housing supply in a major way. All our programs, of course, will be greatly enriched by the fact that the lending institutions are now being directed.

Mr. Marshall: On a point of clarification, Mr. Speaker, will the legislation provide that certain amounts of money will be allocated to boost the rehabilitation aspects of NIP and the rural native housing program?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not in the legislation; it is in the capital budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up the question raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I am very interested in the proposal to require financial institutions to lend money for this program. Did I rightly understand the minister to say that in the proposed legislation that requires financial institutions to advance money for this purpose, there will not in fact be, at least initially, any mandatory provision; that it will be left simply to telling these institutions what the government wants?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, we feel that this is a much better way to do it. When they are advised that that is the wish of the government, then I know of no occasion when they have not followed this kind of requirement. If legislation is necessary, of course, it will follow; that is quite clearly understood. The advantage of doing it this way is that in legislation one must specify a certain percentage of investment portfolios. We think that rather than be legislated in this way, the lending institutions would prefer to be co-operative in making certain that we get our total dollar requirement.

We must remember that banks have many different practices. Trust companies and life insurance companies are different types of savers and lenders. So rather than get into this sort of distortion of the capital market, I am confident that this program will have its intended effect. If that turns out not to be the case, legislation will have to follow; but there is no question in my mind that that will not be necessary.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to make a passing observation. I thought the minister had already asked the mortgage companies to do this sort of thing, without much success. My last question is this: At what interest rate will these financial institutions be required to advance money for this purpose? Will it be the current interest rate, or some reduced interest rate?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, it will be at the conventional interest rates at the lower end of that market, as is the case with our CMHC program, It is from there that we subsidize the rates down equivalent to 8 per cent, and even with grants below that which bring the effective rates much lower.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might direct a question to the minister. Will he say whether the program involving grants and loans to municipalities is to be administered through the provinces; and, further, is there to be any incentive offered municipalities to process applications for housing developments within a given period of time, in order to remove one of the most serious bottlenecks within the whole housing construction process?

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that this is one of the most serious bottlenecks, outside of perhaps the rate of interest itself. The grant will not be processed through the provinces; it will be made in consultation with the provinces. It is directly because CMHC will retain monitoring over that to make certain that the type of product it is supposed to subsidize is delivered—in other words, low-cost, compact housing or housing in forms that people can afford, and of good quality. We will reach agreement with the provinces on the form that is to take and it will be placed directly by the federal government, as indeed it is with several of our programs.

In so far as the second part of the hon. member's question is concerned, we discussed this matter with provincial housing ministers this morning. They recognize the urgency of this question and are making every effort to shorten the period. The matter has been left directly with the provinces because, as the hon. member knows, the provincial ministers have been very supportive in this regard.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, did the minister put before the provincial housing ministers the form and level of rent control which the federal government considers to be most appropriate to its over-all restraint program, and will he tell us what that level or guideline is?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the provincial ministers of housing and officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs discussed this matter at quite considerable length this morning, that is, if these will be provincially-implemented programs. Our senior officials are meeting at this moment, following the meeting we had earlier today, to work out the parameters. We will be meeting again, I expect, within the next ten days or two weeks, when we will be able to set out the broad parameters which will apply right across the country, but implemented in a way that is useful to the individual provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us whether this Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation referred to in the legislation will be under the responsibility of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? If so, will any individual be able to invest in this Mortgage Exchange Corporation at a previously set rate for the whole term of the mortgage investment?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the legislation for the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation was passed some time ago. This is not for direct investment to individuals, but it makes the mortgage instrument far more liquid and far more attractive to investors, particularly non-traditional investors. Massive pools of capital are available through pension funds, for instance, and I am sure my hon. friends in the NDP would not want to see them take interest rates lower than they can get. So it makes it a more attractive instrument in that respect. It also makes far more attractive the mortgage investment corporations which had legislation passed at the same time. It really creates a secondary market for mortgages. It will create a lot more activity. It will make investment more attractive and will have an influence in bringing down interest rates on household mortgages.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question which was as follows: will the ordinary individual, the one who makes investments, have the chance to invest in this Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation set up to build housing? If so, will this investment be guaranteed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and will the interest rate be previously set for the term of the mortgage?

[English]

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker, it is actually a secondary market, a sort of wholesaling operation for mortgages so that people can buy mortgages knowing they are liquid, and they can resell to the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation; or, indeed, they can buy from that corporation. In CMHC alone we have a substantial portfolio of mortgages which can be used and wholesaled there. So it is not a direct investment for the individual, although it makes investment for the individual much more attractive whether he or she does it through conventional channels or not.

I want to reiterate the connection with regard to the mortgage investment corporation which is a tax conduit for small investors who want to invest in mortgages. It is specifically for mortgages and the corporation taxes; full benefits flow through to the individual and it becomes a much more attractive investment for household mortgages. It should attract capital from many sources. I mentioned pension funds specifically because they have not been active in this field. This proposal makes it a much more attractive field for them to get into.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Keeping in mind those hon. members who were seeking the floor at the conclusion of the minister's statement, and not wanting unduly to restrict the questioning, I wonder if I might have the co-operation of hon. members in putting one rather comprehensive question rather than restricting hon. members who were seeking to be recognized? Perhaps the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour), the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), and the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) would each put one comprehensive question so that we may conclude the matter on that basis.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister is a rather direct one. In view of the fact that the program enunciated by the minister today is inflationary and in complete contradiction to what the government is supposed to be doing to fight inflation, has the minister's department put any proposal to him that, instead of getting at this problem in the inflationary manner he is adopting—and I mean getting at the basic problem that 75 per cent of the cost of housing today is in the form of interest payments—he should try to figure out some way of reducing interest rates, not by negative and inflationary policies of subsidy but by making the capital circulate faster? Were any proposals of that sort put before the minister?

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there were several proposals. We examined virtually every option that exists and found this to be the most cost-effective, anti-inflationary measure that could be introduced. I hardly consider it inflationary when we talk only about low-cost loans for moderate income families, reducing the carrying charges for them and increasing employment by creating 32,000 new jobs this year. If that is inflation, it is the sort of inflation we need more of—that is, a million man-years over the period of four years—making certain that the capital resources of this country are used for the benefit of the people who can least afford to take advantage of them, and having a disincentive for those inflationary factors involved in building expensive houses on large lots.

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Speaker, in respect of the capital cost allowance provisions applicable to rental entrepreneurs, is the minister prepared to give any undertaking regarding the duration of this provision, and does the measure apply to corporate as well as non-corporate entrepreneurs?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, as long as they are already in that business they are getting capital allowance at the present time. This special provision is for those who do not. I believe I am correct in saying this applies to corporate investors as well. You must excuse me; I just have to check that point. It is really trying to attract pools of capital from small investors who are not in that market at the present time. The period has been extended to December 31, 1977.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, my question to the minister refers to the letters he sent to the banks and financial institutions earlier this year. Can he inform the House what type of response he received at that time, and how much in funds was allotted? I should like to point out to him that the president of Monarch Life stated that the housing slowdown is mainly due to lack of housing projects being brought forward by builders and developers. He also stated that they could only lend mortgage money on what is presented to them as opportunities. Would the minister inform us how much money was provided at that time?

● (1540)

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That was advice to the lending institutions concerning a program; it was not a requirement, as is the case now. In the last several years—my information was received about August—the latest information I have is that the funds invested by private investors under the limited dividend, AHOP, and rental programs have been in excess of $300 million, mostly going into rental accommodation. But even with that we are not satisfied. We must have more certainty in what we are trying to establish this year, in respect of continuity in the market, so that builders can plan for four years and municipalities and provinces can plan. Through that we can achieve the economies of scale necessary to gear up for production in a competitive situation, and get prices and costs down. This is a major part of our program, so that people in the building trades will know where they are going for the next several years: I think this is the most important element.

This matter also preoccupied this morning the provincial ministers with whom I have been working over the past year. I think this proposal reflects their view as much as it does that of the federal government. It is a very important issue and has their strong support.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, James Lorimer, a Toronto urban affairs analyst, said in a brief to the royal commission on corporate concentration that land speculation profits are responsible for 24 per cent of the cost of a new house in metro Toronto. He asked what the government intended to do about speculation profits. Mr. Lorimer's study criticizes 24 large developments, first for holding more than 41,000 acres of land in and around metro Toronto in 1973, and second for selling their holdings very slowly to a relatively small number of high income buyers who can afford the prices they set.

Did the minister, in his meetings with the provincial ministers this morning, recommend that they enact tough legislation to control this form of land control speculation, and did he—as he did not do this afternoon—recommend that more effective funds be set aside for land assembly in the provinces?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there will be more funds for land assembly, but particularly important here are services within that land. We have added a new dimension to that by adding water mains and water treatment facilities which will be very much welcomed. The principal problem is one of getting this land on the market.

Although the Lorimer study is interesting, the whole question of land speculation is not addressed specifically in this set of proposals. However, it is one that the Minister of Finance and myself are looking at very seriously. It would appear at this time that the heat has been taken out of the speculation itself. The real problem is getting the serviced land and approvals for the lower-cost type of housing to which this program is directed. They cannot get the funding and approvals unless they go into the type of lower-cost housing we believe Canadians want and need today and which we are determined to supply.

ANSWERS GIVEN TO QUESTIONS PLACED ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order at the first opportunity in respect of order paper question No. 3119, and the answer thereto. The question itself was as follows:

Did the Prime Minister say at the opening of the new Mirabel airport: "The Torontonians will be down on their knees" and, if so

(a) for what reason did he make the statement

(b) what is the full meaning of the statement

(c) was it meant as a public affront to the people of Ontario, and Toronto in particular?

The answer given by the government was as follows:

See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Citation 171 (e).

This citation, at page 147, states that a question, oral or written, must not seek, for purposes of argument, information on a matter of past history. It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) have recently been using references from Beauchesne's that do not accurately apply to the questions involved and this, I submit, is a case in point. I bring this matter up, Mr. Speaker, because I firmly believe that if the procedure is allowed to continue, a mockery will be made of the right of members of this House to put questions to the government.

At the opening of Mirabel airport, the Prime Minister made a very serious statement: "Torontonians will be down here on their knees". As a result, it would seem to me that there is no legitimate reason, nor any ruling in Beauchesne's, which prohibits a member of this House from questioning the Prime Minister on such a statement. Accordingly, I asked the Prime Minister for what reason he made this statement and I also asked him the full meaning of the statement. In reply, a section of Beauchesne's is quoted which prohibits seeking an answer for "purposes of argument".

I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that the question had nothing to do with "purposes of argument". It certainly did have something to do with the right of a member to receive clarification of a statement by the Prime Minister at least in so far as whether it is the policy of his government to create a situation where Torontonians will be running to Mirabel to get down on their knees in front of him, and to know the reasons for such a statement, the meaning of such a statement and, in effect, whether or not it represents government policy. Now, this question also was rejected by the government by the use of a further quotation from Beauchesne's.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to restrict the hon. member in raising what may appear to him to be a point of order. The fact of the matter is that it is well known, without the citations from Beauschesne's to which he has referred, that the rules provide no obligation to make an answer to questions put by hon. members. That citation and that precedent certainly are well known to all members of the House. Whether or not an hon. member is satisfied with the answer he receives or the reason for not receiving an answer, that may be a subject of debate or comment which the hon. member may wish to make at the appropriate time.

I am simply saying to the hon. member that unless he can depart in some way from his present line of argument, he will be unable to satisfy the Chair that there is a point of order involved in the points he has.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree, as I was about to point out in this statement, that a minister is not obliged to answer a question, nor is he obliged to answer a question in such a way that I, as a member of the opposition—or any other member of this House—have a right to question it in so far as the substance of the answer is concerned.

But I think we are dealing here with a different point. I am trying to illustrate that it is not a case of my disagreeing with the answer, as an individual member. Rather, it is a case of the rules being used in such a way as to be a misuse of the rules. If I could continue for a moment, I think I can illustrate the point I am trying to make. For instance, it was also rejected on the ground, quoting again from Beauchesne's, that it is "information on matter of past history".

I find it impossible to see how the conclusion can be arrived at that such a statement by the Prime Minister, made only a day or so before I put the question, has already become something of an historical nature. Indeed, if the government is going to invoke this particular section of Beauchesne's, then it becomes impossible for a member of this House to question anything the Prime Minister says anywhere in so far as it concerns government policy, because apparently this government has now elevated all utterances of the Prime Minister to the historical level.

I would like to make one further reference to the answer given to another question, namely, question No. 2,328 which asks for details concerning the cost to taxpayers of the trip made to London, Paris, and Brussels for a period of 36 days by Mr. Michael Pitfield who is now secretary to the cabinet and clerk of the Privy Council. The government answered, properly and correctly, that the cost of the trip to the taxpayers was a certain number of dollars. It answered, properly and correctly, as to who was the person authorizing the trip. But the third part of the question, asking in what ways the taxpayers benefited from the expenditure of public funds, was ruled out again by quoting Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 171 (b), which reads "trivial, vague, or meaningless".

I submit this is, again, an example of the misuse of the rules of the House. If Mr. Pitfield travels to Europe for 36 days at public expense, then it seems to me a member of the House has the privilege of asking in what ways such a trip was of benefit to Canadian taxpayers, who paid for it. It is a misapplication of citation 171(b) of Beauchesne's because there is certainly nothing trivial about expenditures of public funds by a public servant, there is nothing vague about directly requesting to know in what way the taxpayers benefited from such expenditures, and for the government to further imply that the question is meaningless is, I believe, an insult to the taxpayers who paid for the trip.

In conclusion, if the Prime Minister is going to make unclear statements about the people of a city such as Toronto, if the Prime Minister's high ranking officials in the civil service are going to spend public money to travel hither and yon, then I submit there is nothing to prohibit a member of this House questioning such matters and stating that the government has started a dangerous program of misusing precedents of the House to block an answer to these questions.

Finally, I fully realize—as you so rightly pointed out a moment ago, sir—that under the rules of the House, ministers are not obliged to answer questions. I also realize that a member of the House has no recourse against the substance of an answer to a question with which he disagrees. But I believe it is a legitimate point of order when the government misuses the rules of the House to protect itself from having to explain the truth to the elected representatives of the people, and if this process continues I hope that the Chair will then take the matter under examination.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has raised a point of order concerning answers made by the government to questions, and has already pointed out—as I said a moment ago—that there is no obligation upon the government to answer questions put on the order paper. The Chair will examine the argument put forward by the hon. member to see whether in fact there has been a misuse of the precedents in the answer that has been given. But it seems to the Chair, at the outset, that two things are clear. The first is that if there is anything wrong with making an improper allusion to precedents in failing to make an answer, it is difficult to know if it would establish a point of order, because this gets us back to the point of whether there is an obligation to answer the question in the first place.

In the second place, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), in addition to seeking information also sought the opinion of the government on whether taxpayers were going to benefit from a certain trip, and what was the meaning of the statement made by the Prime Minister. In both these cases there is certainly ground, not so much for information but for an expression of opinion, for a description or for an impression of the person who happens to be answering the question. The difficulty into which I do not want to enter is that since there is no obligation on the government to answer questions, there is a tendency on the part of the Chair to allow wide latitude in questions that hon. members put on the order paper.

If we are to be extremely technical about one side of the matter, it is obvious the Chair will have the obligation to be extremely technical about the other side and will have to take a firm hand in ruling out those questions which are in some ways out of order. The Chair does intervene and examines the questions in a cursory way to try to weed out those that are obviously out of order. I do not think hon. members would want the Chair to intervene frequently and take a hard line in respect of questions put on the order paper, but that might be the logical result of becoming too technical on both sides.

In any case, I will endeavour to examine the arguments put forward by the hon. member to see whether or not a valid point of order exists.

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, has continued to give rise, since we adjourned the debate, to many comments, in both written and electronic media, and no doubt many Canadians have continued to take interest in this vital question.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to resume the discussion this afternoon on the provisions of the bill which exclude persons who are 65 from unemployment insurance benefits. The act through which unemployment insurance was adopted was intended, essentially, to achieve two objectives: the first, to protect the worker's income; the second, to encourage the unemployed to reintegrate the work force.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission learned from experience in the last few years that a large number of workers, 65 or over, do not make the effort, do not give themselves the trouble of finding and keeping a job, that workers in other categories are required to do. I have mentioned before in this House that the inquiries of Statistics Canada in past years have proved that at least half of the unemployed of 65 or more who collect unemployment insurance make no effort, or no visible effort to go back to work and that, as a corollary to this fact, civil servants and unemployment insurance inspectors have quite a hard time applying, as strictly as they should, the rules governing the efforts and steps which a temporarily unemployed worker should make to go back to work.

So we have a difficult situation where, on the one side, it is extremely difficult for controllers to force a worker of 65 to take the necessary steps to find employment and on the other side, where a number of workers who are 65 or more are not really willing to reintegrate the labour market, and this is lamentable.

The solution put forward in the legislation is fairly simple. It is aimed at excluding simply all workers who are 65 or more. The reasons for this exclusion stem mainly from measures passed by the government in recent years, and more particularly since 1952, since the adoption of the old age security plan. Now, we note this astonishing and satisfying fact, Mr. Speaker, that the retired persons, people who are 65 or more, have up to now been able to face the rise in the cost of living thanks to the pensions they could get from the old age security plan, the guaranteed income supplement, the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan. These different programs seem to have been clearly sufficient to maintain the purchasing power of retired people, of those who are 65 or more.

I do not invent this statement, Mr. Speaker, nor do I take it from government documents whose credibility could certainly be challenged. One could surely question the arguments of the government if I asserted, on the strenght of governmental studies, that Canadian pensioners, citizens of 65 or over, have been able up to now to meet the cost of living increase. That statement, Mr. Speaker, is extracted from a study by the firm Towers, Perrin, Foster and Crosby, which has a branch in New York and has done a similar study on the American market.

It is clearly indicated in this study that higher old age security pensions and allowances, the indexing of allowances, and increases in the guaranteed income supplement allow the Canadian pensioner to benefit from income support which puts him in a position nearly 100 per cent better than in 1952. Indeed the financial position of senior citizens has greatly improved in Canada thanks to the adjustments the federal government made through the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan. When the Canada Pension Plan was introduced by the federal government in 1952, a pensioner aged 70 was entitled to a monthly allowance of $40.

Those who were the first to benefit under this plan are now entitled, provided of course they are still alive, to $125.76 a month, that is 214 per cent above what they received in 1952. From 1952 to 1975, the increase in consumer prices has been 101.3 per cent. Which means, Mr. Speaker, that between 1952 and 1975, on the whole, the position of senior citizens, the position of those Canadians who have received old age pensions has significantly improved. Therefore the real purchasing power of the Canadian pensioner has jumped 50 per cent, since what he could buy in 1952 for $40 costs about $80 in 1975.

The survey by Towers, Perrin, Foster and Crosby on the comparative increases in the prices of rent, food, clothing and related needs, infers that not only did the first years of the Canada Pension Plan allow people to catch up with the rise in the cost of living, but also paved the way for improved living standards. So the basic pension which amounted to $40 a month in 1952 rose to $55 six years later and to $75 after the 1963 amendments. In other words, since the indexation of old age security, the claimant, the Canadian pensioner, gets a revenue supplement which allows him to live twice better than the 1952 pensioner. But since the establishment of the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan, other benefits are paid, besides old age security.

The findings of this study on the American market are nearly identical. Indeed, the pensions paid to the American pensioner have been increasing steadily and show that the current revenue of the American pensioner is in line with what the Canadian pensioner gets. However, Mr. Speaker, anomalies still continue to exist which allow us to think that the proposed amendments in Bill C-69 are not enough. Indeed, the calculation of the income supplement as done by the Quebec Department of Social Affairs indicates a basic inequality.

Indeed, instead of taking the special needs supplement, the amounts of $219 a month paid out as old age pensions and the guaranteed income supplement as a base, the Quebec Department of Social Affairs takes $195 as a basic figure and adds the additional amounts which may be calculated for special needs. That means that every Canadian pensioner who gets the guaranteed income supplement in addition to the old age pension is relieved of an amount of $28 for all special needs, or for any test of special needs he can prove to appropriate institutions. Thus, a retired Canadian who lives in Quebec and must claim additional needs in terms of medical care, in terms of related care, must have his guaranteed income supplement cut by $28 before he can get an additional amount.

The situations to which this calculation can lead give staggering results. For example, a couple aged 80 who get $349 a month as their pension and guaranteed income, the husband being blind and an amputee, is not entitled to a supplement from the Quebec Department of Social Affairs before they spend virtually all allowances they get to support their primary needs. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the income supplement is to be reviewed, if the legislation affecting the retired is to be reviewed, those anomalies that exist now in respect of related needs should be corrected.

Mr. Speaker, another anomaly still continues to exist and it was corrected in part by federal legislation. It has to do with that application of the means test to people who come under the Quebec Pension Plan. In a previous amendment the Parliament of Canada did away with what the legal jargon called the means test. At the present time, anyone who applies for a pension under the Canada Pension Plan does not have to submit to a means test to get a pension, to get the maximum pension. This government, this Parliament, are the ones which in the last few months did away with the application of a criterion that no longer corresponded with the true situation of Canadian pensioners.

Now, the Quebec Pension Plan still provides for a means test which contributes to perpetuate this inequality added to the other needs I mentioned earlier.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, if the Canadian pensioners throughout the country are to be on an equal footing, we must make sure that all the income support provisions of the various programs give similar results.

Some colleagues have pointed out that the number of claimants now eligible for benefits as of January 1, 1976 would total from 20,000 to 25,000 and that to this cumulative number would be added from 10,000 to 15,000 claimants during 1976. This means, Mr. Speaker, that if the provisions of the bill were passed word for word by the House, some 40,000 Canadian claimants would not be covered by unemployment insurance.

Mr. Speaker, I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks that the object of unemployment insurance was to protect the income of workers. Now, the amendments before the House are designed to deprive a 65 year-old worker of the protection of his right to work. It is not true, as pointed out by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), that the bill is aimed at depriving people of 65 of the right to work. I think that no Canadian law could, in a free economy such as ours, abolish the individual right to work.

This bill removes rather the protection of the right to work. Now, we must ask ourselves at this stage, following the inquiries made by Statistics Canada, whether those figures are sufficient to prompt us to stop protecting the right to work of workers between 65 and 70, a right which was recognized in the 1971 bill.

Some editorial writers and some previous speakers have shown that the philosophy of most government programs now designed for older persons aims at integrating them into community activities. The budget of programs such as New Horizons has tripled in the last two years, precisely with a view to integrating Canadian pensioners into community activities. These programs have been very successful, and nobody would think of excluding from them citizens of 55 or 50.

The eligibility criteria has been greatly extended and a large number of Canadians nearing 50 take advantage of these programs.

It would be illogical at this time when there is an attempt to integrate pensioners into community activities, to exclude without exception the pensioners who wish to remain in the labour force.

● (1600)

Undeniably a person who has reached age 65 and quit his job, either because the clauses of a collective agreement force him to retire or because, being 67 years old he has decided to retire, cannot logically be still subsidized by Canadian taxpayers through a plan aimed first of all at protecting the right to work of people who do not want to be on the labour market.

On the other hand it would be illogical to exclude out of hand all citizens aged 65 who still have the energy, the capability and most of all are available for work. There are Canadian businesses whose manpower reserves are mostly people over 60. How would they be affected if the pensionable age was lowered to 60? My hon. colleagues in the opposition have often pointed out that lowering the age of eligibility for old age security would result in freeing a certain number of jobs and therefore absorbing some unemployed whose number is much too great in the present economic conditions.

I believe there is a middle course that would allow us to maintain within our laws the protection of the right to work for all pensioners or 65 year old people. I think that a Canadian of 65 should have the choice either to remain in the labour force and keep paying unemployment insurance contributions or simply to opt out of the unemployment insurance plan. Our legislation has never given the Canadian worker the option of withdrawing from the unemployment insurance system. It was a compulsory universal plan which was supposed to apply to all Canadian workers without exception.

The government proposal aims at excluding from the scheme all citizens aged 65. It does not give them the choice, the option to continue receiving benefits and paying premiums. If it is to remain an insurance scheme, I feel the unemployment insurance plan must allow citizens aged 65 to opt out if they want to withdraw permanently from the labour force. So, a person of 65 could notify the Unemployment Insurance Commission of his intention to opt out of the unemployment insurance scheme and to collect, as provided under the bill, a three-week severance benefit as compensation until his readjustment under the various income support programs I mentioned earlier.

Thus, we would end up, Mr. Speaker, with a plan which I feel would maintain for workers of 65 the incentives to return to the labour marked needed by the Canadian economy. It would also allow the Unemployment Insurance Commission and plan to unload a number of workers who, at 65, decide and really wish not to go back to work, and who anyway do not want to make the effort and take the steps required to find a job under difficult economic circumstances.

I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who proved he is really open-minded by introducing at least five amendments which substantially improve the unemployment insurance program, that he consider giving workers of 65 the opportunity to advise the Commission that they want to opt out of the plan and to receive three weeks of benefit provided for in the government proposal, and allowing those who want to remain in the labour force to continue to contribute, with all the responsibilities and obligations this implies. And if, unfortunately, as a result of the severe controls which must be made by UIC inspectors and officials, the conclusion was reached that those workers are not taking the steps nor submitting to the controls provided for in the act, we would have no other alternative than to disentitle them to receive benefits payable to workers under 65.

I feel that to provide this option under the legislation would show that we acknowledge that the worker of 65 is still making a useful and effective contribution to the Canadian economy and would remove the disincentive to work that other pieces of legislation and government programs seek specifically to compensate.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the bill we are debating is one of the many dubious pieces of legislation following from the document tabled last June which the previous minister of finance was pleased to call the budget. That budget proved to be a launching pad. Indeed, it should have been called that in the first place. The previous minister of finance who introduced that budget has since been launched to the middle benches on the other side and is the latest of the long list of cabinet ministers who have played the role of sacrificial lamb as the government blunders from crisis to crisis. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should have made the ex-finance minister a gift of the budget when he made his grand exit, in the way some companies give retiring employees a gold watch. We could then have made a fresh start from square one. We might even have offered the services of our able finance critic—on a consulting basis, of course. This government is all too familiar with the role of the consultant. There are more consultants on the present government's payroll than there have been at any time in Canada's history.

The Liberal government of Quebec seems to have learned a lesson about hiring consultants from the federal Liberal government, or possibly it was the other way around. According to the reports now being circulated about consulting services for the Olympic site in Montreal, the consulting bill alone on the first phase of the project will amount to about $23 million. Of course, there is the matter of the criminal nonsense concerning the payment of more than $30 million to the architect of the domed stadium at the Olympic site.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that members of this House, whatever party they represent, have a very personal stake in this proposed legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. From my own experience, I say that the average member devotes more time and effort to solving UIC cases in the constituency than to all other types of problems put together. This should give some idea of the magnitude of the problem both with respect to the unreasonably high rate of unemployment in Canada and the difficulty experienced by many legitimate claimants in getting their UIC benefits.

Part of the problem in getting UIC claims settled stems from the fact that there are just too many professional UIC cheats. These people tie up the employees of the local UIC offices, drain the UIC fund and force sympathetic UIC employees to adopt a cynical attitude to all claimants, legitimate and otherwise. A couple of years ago the government announced the hiring of an army of ex-policemen, private eyes and other investigative personnel to track down UIC cheats and restore some credibility to the UIC program. Since then I have not heard anything about the project and I have to assume that it has been a dismal failure; also, that most, if not all, those people are now drawing their own unemployment insurance benefits.

Let me stress that the problems we encounter with the Unemployment Insurance Commission are not with the employees of the local UIC offices. My staff and I have always found these people to be courteous, co-operative an helpful. Employees in local offices appear to be just as anxious as the rest of us to see that the program works the way it should, and they are sympathetic to the plight of legitimate claimants. I find that they are also diligent in their efforts to identify and to apprehend the chisellers.

It is interesting to note that UIC employees, especially in local offices, are not awed or overwhelmed by inquiries directed to them by members of parliament. They are responsive and courteous, do not hesitate to point out that some cases of overpayment raise on the basis of false information supplied by claimants, and that the money must be repaid. By the same token, they will not hesitate to admit an error on the part of the UIC office and will often make payments to claimants to cover periods where disentitlements were imposed in error. Mr. Speaker, we cannot fault employees in UIC offices for the failure of the program to work the way it was intended and the way we must ensure it will work.

In order to find the culprits responsible for one of the most expensive boondoggles in the long list of blunders committed by this government, we must go to the top of the bureaucracy and the top of the political ladder. That is where we must go if we are to find those responsible and at the heart of the appalling mess in which the UIC today finds itself. We knew three or four years ago that the Unemployment Insurance Commission was mismanaging the UIC program, and we were alerted to the fact some incompetent people were parachuted into senior positions in the commission, people who had failed miserably in their former positions.

We knew as long ago as 1971 that the government did not intend to take steps to replace the incompetents in the commission. The Prime Minister tried to restore some semblance of order in the UIC house by using his majority to railroad through parliament a bill which would remove the ceiling on UIC pay-outs. In that way UIC could continue in the same old way and would have an abundance of money under which it could hide its inefficiency and blunders. The Prime Minister also undertook to make up any deficits in the unemployment insurance fund while unemployment remained in excess of 4 per cent of the labour force. Under this new legislation, the Prime Minister has raised his sights to a figure of 5 per cent. In other words, he is prepared to accept 5 per cent to 6 per cent unemployment as equivalent to full employment. This only compounds the travesty of looking upon unemployed Canadians as numbers in a set of filing cards.

The mere idea of 800,000 unemployed Canadians being an acceptable rate of misery and deprivation in our country is deplorable. When it becomes a policy of government, that government does not have the moral right to remain in power. I wonder whether the government would have the courage to go to the electorate on a platform that contained such a policy, combined with a history of flip-flopping on the question of inflation.

Just over a year ago, the Prime Minister spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on television and radio time telling the Canadian people that the Conservative proposal for price and income controls would not work. Today we have the most restrictive and wide ranging controls in peacetime history. I invite the Prime Minister to call an election and campaign on those two issues.

It is typical of this government to try to save money by cutting back on the level of benefits paid to the legitimately unemployed. Surely the Prime Minister knows that cutting the level of benefits will only add to the misery of those families without their accustomed level of income. To say that the difference will be made up with family benefits is complete and utter nonsense. There are thousands of families with one or two children. There are others with no children, especially young and middle-aged couples. In some cases, a couple that has already raised their children will need to have an adequate income if the breadwinner loses his job through no fault of his own.

For years the Prime Minister and his cabinet have been doing everything in their power to discourage business and industrial expansion, the very lifeblood of employment, especially with regard to the creation of new jobs required every year based on additions to the labour force. It is as though the government is swinging a double-edged sword at the working people of this country, discouraging expansion in job-creating areas, raising the premium for unemployment insurance and then cutting back on UIC benefits. There is a classic case of confusion and indecision if ever I saw one.

To get back to the question of abuses of the unemployment insurance program, I would like to deal for a few minutes with the remarks of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) concerning people who quit their jobs and those who refuse employment when it is offered to them. I accept the fact that when as many as 250,000 people quit their jobs in a given year, it is a serious matter, one that all of us are anxious to see explained and one we would like to see cleared up. The minister did not have a breakdown on that enormous figure, but I have to assume that he would not have given the figure if it did not represent people who had made application for UIC benefits. The minister did not say how many of those people quit their jobs because they could not continue because of health or other legitimate reasons. He did not say how many quit because their working conditions were intolerable and they could not take it any longer.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the minister simply threw that figure at us as though he was using it to justify the drastic provisions of this bill, the main purpose of which is to make it look as though the government is deeply concerned about its expenditures. The same might be said about the figure of 26,000 jobs refused by people who were drawing UIC benefits in the period noted by the minister. How many of these people actually turned down jobs for which they were qualified? How many of those jobs required the people to uproot their families and move to job sites hundreds of miles from their place of residence? What I and, I am sure, my colleagues would like to know is whether the minister was actually giving us exact figures of those who sought to abuse the UIC program, or whether in fact there were extenuating circumstances in any or most of the figures he gave us.

I am aware of certain cases that fit into this category. It makes me wonder whether some of them, mostly wives, should be entitled. In some cases, a husband and wife work in the city, the husband with a much better job, or he decides to go into business for himself in a rural area. The family moves with him and the wife then immediately applies for unemployment insurance benefits.

All of us are interested in shutting out the cheaters and the rip-offs in the UIC program. We also want to see better and faster service for those who are legitimate claimants for UIC benefits. However, Mr. Speaker, if the government is simply throwing large numbers at us in the hope that we will get alarmed and demand an immediate crackdown on UIC claimants, across the board, they do not have a hope. We want honest figures and we want an honest appraisal of the problem of UIC cheating. It would also be helpful for us to know to what extent legitimate claimants are being penalized in the government's attempts to uncover and apprehend UIC cheaters.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said that the government hopes to collect an additional $490 million for the UIC fund through the provisions of this bill. If that money is to be raised by penalizing those who are already burdened with the premiums for the UIC program, and by reducing the benefits to those legitimate unemployed people who qualify for benefits, then the $490 million will have to be considered under the heading of ill-gotten gains.

Considering the way in which the present government throws money around, and considering the amount of money wasted in inefficiency and bungling by this government, I cannot accept such measures as are contained in Bill C-69 to enable the government to raise more money. Let them clean house, bring some order and efficiency into the UIC upper echelons, and cut out some of the appalling waste in other government programs that serve no other purpose than to reward Liberal losers and hacks and the mere party faithful. Let us save money in that way; then we will not have to keep squeezing it out of the overburdened workers of Canada and we will not have to raise it by penalizing those who are the legitimate beneficiaries of government programs.

Recently the Ottawa Journal ran a story on the bill under the headline "Workers to bear heavier UIC load". Under the new legislation, maximum premiums for employees would rise immediately from $1.40 per week to $1.70 and could go as high as $3.40 by 1977. Employers premiums will rise from the present $2.40 to $2.80 and, again, in 1977 could be $4.80. The minister says that the new regulations will require employees and employers to pay $490 million into the UIC fund and will allow the federal government to save $600 million in 1976. That is certainly a switch. It is a shabby way for the government to create the impression that it is interested in saving money. What it is really doing is doubling the load borne by those who have been carrying the load all along, the employees and their employers, while not doing anything to ensure that the UIC cheats are shut off from the program.

The new legislation will double the waiting period applicable to those who quit their jobs, making it six weeks instead of three. This might discourage some of the abuses, but there must be more careful scrutiny of those who quit their jobs and more strenuous efforts to screen out those who do so simply to draw UIC benefits.

I repeat, the program must be made to serve the interests and welfare of those who support it with their premiums and who become employed through no fault of their own. Also, it must be administered in such a way as to screen out those who are professional UIC cheats. One way of doing this would be to lengthen the period of insured employment required as qualification for benefit. Right now, a person can work for eight weeks, get fired deliberately and then draw benefits for about half a year.

Mr. Alexander: Longer.

Mr. Darling: This is obviously an abuse of the UIC principle and it must be ended. Let me remind the House what our spokesman on this bill, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said when he compared the cost in the United States with the cost in Canada, with a population one-tenth the size of that in the U.S. The United States spent $4 billion on unemployment insurance in 1973 and, as most of us in this House are aware, Canada will spend about the same amount in 1975 in that area.

Mr. Alexander: No question about it.

Mr. Darling: Unemployment insurance came into effect in Canada in 1940. In the first 30 years we spent a total of $6 million on the program.

Mr. Alexander: Billions.

Mr. Darling: That was the total sum expended during 30 years, Mr. Speaker. Now, figures show that between January of 1971 and December of 1975, our unemployment insurance costs, as predicted, will amount to some $10 billion.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Mr. Darling: The breakdown, the year to year payments and the contributions by employer and employees, were outlined in that speech given by my hon. friend on Monday, October 27, a week ago today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I put it all on the record.

Mr. Darling: Unemployment insurance was set up on a cost basis of $10 per capita, later doubled to $20. It has now reached the staggering figure of nearly $200 per capita. An independent commission should be set up to look into this situation. A few days ago the Globe and Mail questioned the staggering annual cost of unemployment benefits, commenting:

> All Canadians are aware that this program has become a national scandal to which Ottawa closes its eyes. Surely the time has come to bring a halt to the massive cheating and moonlighting which goes on, costing the taxpayers millions a month. Some strict screening, individual investigation, regular monthly reviews, effective penalties and allowance cuts when reasonable work is refused are long overdue.

It is high time we gave serious consideration to the position of those who earn substantial incomes on a seasonal basis and then relax in luxury during the off season. I am not talking about the many seasonal workers whose incomes are much below the average, or even average; I am considering, for example, captains on the Great Lakes whose income, I am sure, would be in the $25,000 bracket—

An hon. Member: All 30 of them.

Mr. Darling: —or highly paid construction workers, machine operators who, I will admit, work long hours during the season and who earn an annual income of the same bracket. Surely the time has come to give this aspect serious thought. These people are very fortunate to be able to earn an annual income in an eight or nine-month period, whereas a great many working people make considerably less and have to work the full 12-month period for it.

It might also be an idea to give serious consideration to the treatment of combined family income, that is, to the income of both the husband and the wife. It often happens that wives work for a period of the year, not because they need to but because they are bored or have an interest in working. At the same time, their husbands are earning substantial salaries. I know this will raise a hue and cry among the particular group concerned, but it does seem most unfair that present provisions should apply in cases where the husband is earning $25,000 a year or more and has a wife who works. Surely, in such cases when the wife decides to take a month or two off, or happens to be laid off, the total income concept should be applied; if the total income is over a specified figure, the wife should not draw unemployment insurance benefits.

One of the most controversial changes in the legislation put before us involves the termination of benefits at the age of 65. I am informed that only 10 per cent of the labour force is 65 or over and, therefore, facing disqualification. I am aware that there certainly are people in this age bracket who are working every angle and taking every advantage in order to qualify. My hon. friend from Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) pointed out that even if the entire group received benefits at the average Canadian rate of $74.61 a week for 15.9 weeks—and it would be almost impossible for this to happen—the total saving to the government, to the taxpayer, would be $2.77 million, or .7 per cent of the deficit for the present year, which is just a drop in the bucket.

Mr. Andras: That is wildly inaccurate.

Mr. Darling: The great majority of those affected will be people in the lower income brackets who choose to work after 65 rather than retire and live on a greatly reduced income. What the minister is saying is, "We do not want you in the labour force any longer. Go home put your feet up and live on your old age pension and any savings you may have." A great many workers who are in good health do not wish to retire. In many cases, they are much better workers than men and women many years their junior. They take a pride in their work, they have an excellent record as far as time loss is concerned, and in view of these circumstances I am hoping the minister will reconsider this particular change. Last night I was discussing this particular clause with a person who said, "Oh, that is easy to remedy. All these workers will now retire at age 64".

I am aware that a great many people who pay into the fund feel that some time or another, by hook or by crook, they should be able to collect in order to get their money back. For many years I was a general insurance agent. Time and time again, especially when trying to collect old accounts, I would be told that clients did not have an accident, or didn't suffer from a fire and were therefore justified in not paying an insurance premium. Old age pensioners feel they should be eligible for unemployment benefits because they have paid for them. They have contributed to the economy down through the years and they feel they are now being cast aside like an old shoe, no longer wanted. Many of them, having been forced to retire at age 65, want to continue to work and, of course, register with Manpower. They are being eliminated from the insurance rolls against their will.

We have learned during the past few days that the cost of the unemployment insurance program increased by 40 per cent during the first eight months of 1975, and that the pay-out in that period was about $2.4 billion. This means we can expect a total bill for UIC payments this year or well over $3 billion. At this rate, UIC could mushroom in the next few years to become the most costly single item in the Canadian budget.

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-69. I am going to have some criticism, not of the minister or these amendments but of the act itself. I hope to make some useful recommendations for the consideration of the minister which perhaps will be implemented in the future. I agree with the principle of the bill in general. I think very few of us here would not agree that the act does need tightening up. We have been besieged by all kinds of complaints over the past three to four years regarding facets of the act that required amendment, and I am glad the minister has finally taken the bull by the horns and come forward not only with necessary but with useful amendments.

I think very few people in Canada would deny that the unemployed need financial assistance to look after themselves and their families. But although I agree with the primary principle of the act in general, I continue to disagree with the secondary principle. When the policy was being shaped for the new legislation, I recall we had great difficulty with the old act in deciding whether it was an insurance program or a welfare program. So we said to ourselves, "Why don't we try and make it an insurance program, or a welfare program, one or the other; but let us not have a composite program that meets both concepts." Finally, when the policy reached the stage of legislation, the program was still a mixture of insurance and welfare. As a result of this, confusion has been created, and as long as the program creates confusion among claimants—who are not experts in the insurance or welfare field—and the general taxpayer, there will be repercussions. Since the public does not understand the program, claimants will continue to abuse it and continue to be a burden on their fellow taxpayers.

In my view, the act is much too complicated for purposes of proper and reasonable administration. I understand it costs in the neighbourhood of $170 million a year to administer the act. With half a million unemployed in Canada, this means that for each person unemployed it costs the government $350 to administer the act. Let us also bear in mind that UIC recipients get a cheque every two weeks, and each cheque issued costs the government $14. I am not saying that it costs $14 to issue the cheque, but to administer the program it costs $14 for each cheque issued.

I remember in Timmins that when the Manpower and UIC departments were split, they were occupying a large area of floor space above the post office. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of 15 people remained to administer unemployment insurance, and the place looked like an empty warehouse. There was lots of room for these people to work, and the employment situation in Timmins at that time was much worse than it is now. My area is experiencing an economic boom at the moment, yet the number of people employed in the unemployment insurance office has reached 80. So although there is less unemployment in Timmins at the moment, the number of staff required is 10 to 11 times that needed to administer the old act. In other words, there is no doubt that the act is cumbersome to administer, and I would urge the minister to review it with a view to simplifying the procedure.

Mr. Benjamin: Where is the minister? He is not here.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): I am assuming that the minister can read just as well as the hon. member across the way. With regard to benefits, the previous speaker said these had increased to well over $3 billion. I was recently in Australia and was interested to learn that a single, unemployed person in that country receives $36.50 a week. That is equivalent to about $47 Canadian. I am not arguing the point whether our benefits are too high, but compared with the benefits received in Australia ours are away above theirs.

One way in which we could reduce this very costly bill is to eliminate the indexation of unemployment insurance. I can understand the indexation of old age security payments or benefits under programs that aid people on low, fixed incomes, but I cannot understand indexation of the unemployment insurance program. If there is one thing that is detrimental about indexation, it is that every time you index something it becomes easier to index something else. By the time you are through with indexation, Mr. Speaker, you have built so much inflation into the economic system of the country that it is difficult to support. Thus, I urge the minister to consider eliminating the indexing provision from the Unemployment Insurance Act, perhaps replacing it with a section providing for a yearly review. I think removal of the indexation feature would be welcomed.

Mr. Benjamin: Why don't you try living on UIC for a couple of weeks?

Mr. Roy (Timmins): I see our former engineer across the way is still running down the track with his locomotive, not knowing where he is going. No act or program should rely on a huge bureaucracy for its reasonable application and proper implementation. Nor should it depend upon a Big Brother system of reporting indiscretions. No unemployment insurance program that I would like to see would depend upon an employer, a friend, even a relative, bringing indiscretions of people defrauding the act to the attention of the authorities. I think the incentive to remove oneself from the unemployment insurance rolls should be implicit in the program itself.

With this in mind, I have on several occasions made a proposal to the minister and I make it once more for his consideration and the consideration of his officials. I refer to the proposition of diminishing returns. Let a person receive full benefits for a period, say, of three to four weeks. Following that period, if benefits were reduced by 20 or 25 per cent, and then after another two weeks by 10 or 15 per cent, I think we would find that no one would stay on unemployment insurance for 40 or 50 weeks. Reduced benefits would soon put them into the labour market, which is where they should be.

Mr. Speaker, if we continue to consider this program generally as a welfare program or partly as a welfare program, then it is necessary, wise and advisable to limit the yearly earnings of claimants. Since we limit the premiums under the act and the level of salaries on the basis of which the payment of premiums is made, I think it would be just as acceptable to limit yearly earnings. I think we must place a maximum on the earnings one can have and continue to receive unemployment insurance. It would be better, as a general principle, to distribute a universal guaranteed income than to have thousands of people taking advantage of their tax paying neighbours and Canadian citizens.

An hon. Member: Hogwash.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): We are creating a social attitude with some of our programs which will make it difficult for us in the future. It will be difficult if it becomes fairly acceptable for someone to cheat the government. Perhaps it is not acceptable to cheat your neighbour, but it may become generally acceptable to cheat the government in this way. If it becomes acceptable that individuals should receive unemployment insurance rather than looking for a job, then I think we will have created a social attitude that will be very detrimental to Canadian society.

We all know of the terrible abuses that take place under this act. I am sure most of us have been personally involved with individuals who complain about their neighbours and friends in this regard. Employers are often accomplices in this fraud. How many employers use the unemployment insurance system as a means of staff planning? How many employers let their people go in the wintertime with an agreement that they will collect unemployment insurance for a certain period of time and be compensated for the balance when they return to work? These are the same employers who criticize and complain to me about the overgenerous benefits of our system. They suggest we should cut half these people off benefits. Let me remind these employers that they can start at home by cutting the people they do not want receiving unemployment insurance benefits, and by making sure they do not have this type of agreement which is favourable to some employees and unfavourable to others.

How many employees who are receiving unemployment insurance have full-time jobs? I suggest there are many of them. Not only are they illegally receiving unemployment insurance benefits, but they do not pay tax on the added income they get from the full-time or part-time job. With that sort of activity becoming acceptable, I say we are creating a very bad social system and a very bad attitude among the population.

While it is true that there are many abuses by claimants, it is also true that there are many abuses to those claimants carried out by officers of the unemployment insurance service. This works both ways. I am under the impression, and I think there is some validity to this, that promotions in many instances are given in the unemployment insurance department on the basis of the number of convictions or disentitlements an officer has under his belt or can effect, rather than on the basis of the service he can provide the claimant or unemployed individual who seeks his service. This is something that should be looked into by the minister and changed.

I have made representations to the minister regarding abuses by officers. The one that has bothered me most relates to statements by claimants. I am pleased to see that the minister in his wisdom has decided to change that regulation, making sure that such a statement does not become a statement of evidence on the part of the claimant. These statements can be misinterpreted by an officer. I remember the case of one chap who was asked how much money he would like to earn in a new job if one was found for him. He said: "Well, I have a family of six kids and I can hardly support them under $100 a week". The officer put down on the statement, "Will not accept under $100 a week", disentitling the claimant immediately.

That is the type of thing I want to see stopped. I think it is the type of thing that will be stopped under the new procedure of obtaining a report from the officer, rather than a signed statement by the claimant. It seems to me the board of referees will be much better served by having both sides of the story before making a decision on the appeal, rather than just the side given by the officer as well as, perhaps, a misinterpreted but signed statement by the claimant.

I completely agree with the amendment in the bill that doubles the period for people who leave work without just cause or, indeed, refuse suitable employment. With regard to the 65 years of age clause, I know it is difficult to take away from people something you have given them and to which they have grown accustomed. However, I am sure our 65-year old people will understand the reasoning and thinking of the minister, his officials and the government as expressed in this clause. I simply cannot believe that a good insurance scheme can function when someone who pays $1,500 into the program can at a later date, when he reaches age 65, take $6,000 from the fund. This is economically impossible. I know our 65 year olds will understand this. You just cannot pay $1,500 in and some years later take out $6,000. If everybody did that, you would require four times the money to make the fund self-sustaining. So this part of the program is impossible to continue.

Let us remember the alternate benefits which accrue to those 65 years of age, including three weeks' unemployment insurance with no questions asked, old age security with no questions asked, the guaranteed income supplement—with an income test—and Canada Pension Plan benefits with no questions asked. We must also remember the additional income tax exemption of $1,307 for people over 65. While these alternate benefits may not completely supplant or replace unemployment insurance benefits, I think if people aged 65 will look at them closely they will see they are reasonable when compared to unemployment insurance.

I am in full agreement with the minister regarding the sickness provision. How many people have great difficulty in continuing to receive benefits as claimants when sick for a second time, even being sick for two or three days on the first occasion and seriously ill for an extended period the second time? I am in total agreement with, and commend the minister for, that particular change.

In conclusion, I hope the minister will continue to review the act. Personally, I am not satisfied that these changes will make it a perfect act, far from it, but I commend the minister for having had the courage at this time to bring forward the changes. I am convinced that he will find more beneficial amendments in the not too distant future.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would have a few remarks on this piece of legislation which is very important I think, and if I refer to the speeches I have just heard, it seems clearer and clearer that the minister will have to recognize some shortcomings in this bill and in the legislation on unemployment insurance as a whole. I understand hon. members on the government side who are very careful but, if you listened well to them, they try did to invite the minister to bring some corrections. I will refer later to the comments I heard.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us a piece of legislation which is important, I say it again, and which stems I think from an act which has been ill-administered for too long. I must say right away that I read carefully the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), who traced back the history of the legislation, and considering of course the credits being applied, it seems quite clear—and I did not hear anyone criticizing the allegations made by the hon. member for Hamilton West—that those previsions have always been wrong, which explains the loss of credibility towards the government only regarding this legislation. One could talk about so many other measures that have been put forward by the government for some time and which do not meet the needs and do not correct the situation.

Anyway, we are before a government which has been governing for ten years and we are once again before a legislation that is far from being popular and just. Yet, ten years ago, they were talking about a "just society". And most Canadians did believe it. Considering the inadequacy of that legislation, we feel increasingly that the public is losing confidence in a government that cannot manage to introduce acceptable measures which of course, we must criticize, exactly what we are doing. There is talk of savings of $500 to $600 million through this legislation, of which the workers will have to assume half. The worker will have to pay 50 per cent, which will mean an increase of 30 per cent. Still, one bill tells us the increase must not exceed 10 per cent in the case of salaries. Some revel in fine words, while accepting that the worker's premium go up by 30 per cent: we feel that is unfair. Mr. Speaker, if the government made the wrong forecasts, if it erred completely, that is no reason why the workers should pay the consequences.

This bill provides some worthy steps we will not question; for instance, we accept that the penalty be doubled for those who leave their jobs too easily; basically, we are not against that but, as one of my hon. colleagues pointed out, we feel that whoever left his job for what he considered just reasons, I suppose, and who appeals to the court, should not be the only one to appear before it: the employer should also be called upon to appear and prove that the report he made on the employee is acceptable to the court of appeal.

It is unfair and intolerable to pay benefits to workers who have once more quit their jobs for reasons the court will surely be interested to know. The employer ought to be compelled to give evidence to permit double checking, which is not at present provided for in the act.

The administration of riding offices was also questioned. I hasten to say—and to say it in the minister's presence—that the office in my riding can boast of a very competent director and highly-qualified staff. However, in spite of the greatest efforts and the best of intentions, it does happen that some applicants encounter difficulties. For example, becausee the claim procedure is initiated in my riding office, the cheque must be made outside. Right now, as is so often the case, postal workers are on strike, which results in applicants experiencing a great deal of problems. Therefore I would like to urge the minister to provide ways and means whereby applicants can receive their cheques without delay. It is precisely the one who cannot afford to wait for his pay cheque that most needs the unemployment insurance benefits. Is it possible to improve this system to prevent claimants, once their form is duly completed and their acceptance acknowledged, having to wait 24 hours to get their cheque? All members hope to see this mechanism sufficiently well organized in order that justice be done to claimants in such circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, some provisions of this legislation are valuable. We regret and criticize the general administration and the estimates made some ten years ago, particularly because they were wrong or badly prepared.

A while ago I noted the member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) clearly requesting the minister not to deprive persons of 65 and willing to go on working from the possibility of drawing unemployment insurance benefits.

And at this point, Mr. Speaker, we of the opposition, and the New Democratic Party as well as the Social Credit Party of Canada, made suggestions, representations to the minister about that particular clause. We believe that those people want to remain in the labour force. And God knows, Mr. Speaker, since the government made its intentions known a few months back already—and I am convinced that other members think as I do—that representations have been made by the people concerned who want to remain in the labour force and qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. And the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont is one of the few members of the party in power to express his views clearly. That is a good thing and I congratulate him for it. The opposition did not wait until today to do that.

Since that legislation was introduced in the House, we have asked the minister to review that proposal, and I dare hope other members will do the same. The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) made a few very appropriate remarks on the administration in general, and I think it is important that members, whatever party they represent, tell the minister that there is a shortcoming and a proposal that is unacceptable.

So, in the circumstances, I hasten, Mr. Speaker, to urge the minister to lend an attentive ear about that particular clause. I feel it is my duty to ask the minister on behalf of those people to reconsider his decision and allow those who still want to remain in the labour force to qualify once again for unemployment insurance benefits. Of course, we must try today to amend a piece of legislation that was passed more than 30 years ago and also underwent certain amendments. I might ask why once again we have to deal with estimates amounting to millions, billions rather, why we have to find that kind of money and collect more from the worker in the present increasingly difficult situation.

As I said, in the unemployment area, there has been an attempt in the last ten years to mislead members of the House as well as the Canadian people in general with measures designed to reduce unemployment. I must remind this House, for the tenth time I believe, that unemployment rose from the 175,000 figure in 1968 to the current 600,000 or 700,000 level. I believe there is an attempt to have us live with a high unemployment rate, but we do not accept that.

As opposition members, we have a duty to ask for much more significant measures than those proposed until now. Not so long ago, not more than a year and a half ago, we were told that action was being taken to slow down inflation and reduce unemployment at the same time. Those were formal commitments. A vote of confidence was obtained from a majority of Canadians, but, as has not been realized for a few months in the face of this government's about-face in any areas, its credibility is jeopardized.

There are still shortcomings in this legislation. It is totally unfair to the worker and it is not only our right but our duty to urge this government to listen to reason and come forward with measures that are much more practicable and fair, and more in keeping with the just society that was sold to us ten years ago but did not materialize.

I urge the minister to show real understanding and much more compassion for the workers, the people that want to remain in the labour force and to qualify for the program by paying premiums. In this way, the government will not only win the public's confidence, which is beside the point, but fill the pressing needs of those Canadians.

I refer again to the statement of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont who said earlier that he feels that the people are concerned and worried, that they are fed up with pieces of legislation inconsistent with their needs. In view of the lack of credibility of the government and the criticisms of the public and the opposition which are quite justified, he decided to ask the minister to reconsider his decision concerning the proposal, but why is he the only government member with enough courage to do so? It would be ridiculous to think, Mr. Speaker, that he is the only government member who had representations to make in this regard. In my opinion, it is time to prove to the Canadian people that even if you are part of a team, you still have the sacred duty to bring the minister to reason when he is wrong. I feel it is important to stress this.

I therefore avail myself of this opportunity and of the invitation that he made to the minister to express my views. Of course, I could use the statements made earlier by my colleagues and the opinions expressed in the last few days, but I know that the government could reply: Of course, you are in the opposition and you have criticized, and that is all you can do.

We do not criticize because we like it, we ask for an amendment to a legislation which, I repeat, is obviously unfair to a certain group of Canadians. That is why we keep up this fight. We want to show the minister that we are right in hoping that others will take a stand as did the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont this afternoon. To my great surprise, this is the second time in a few days that the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has made justified criticisms or serious recommendations to the government.

Last week, during the debate on price controls, he stated in the House that the ministers themselves fail to control the expenditures within their department. So, how can one imagine that it is possible to control prices and wages the ministers do not control expenditures within their own department? I am not the one who said so, it is a Liberal member. Today, he urged once again the minister to amend this clause in particular.

I insist on this clause, Mr. Speaker, as it is definitively the most harmful for those people and certainly the most unfair provision in this legislation. Of course, there are some amendment. We certainly wish that the administration will be better than ever and that claimant will get better services. There are more rigid measures, of course, and they are also justified, but we ask that this measure, this legislation be fairer than it is now. We should particularly eliminate this injustice where people aged 65 who wish to stay on the labour market are not entitled anymore to unemployment insurance benefits.

So Mr. Speaker, I repeat that it is unfair to try to recover those $250 million from the worker's pockets as it is unfair to deny those people the right to benefits. My comments will not be any longer but once more I encourage the members from government benches to show some guts and not only the members of the opposition but also a particular member. I saw some members that agreed before with the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) and I hope that we will show to the minister that we do not agree with this measure in its totality and that if this legislation is not amended at the committee stage to bill the loopholes we can foresee, these hon. members will also have the courage to vote against a piece of legislation that is unfair for a particular class of people.

I hope that the minister will take note of all the remarks made from this side of the House and that there will be similar comments to bring the minister to his senses so that Parliament will give Canadians a legislation that really meets the needs of workers and Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert Parent (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this afternoon we are being treated, as we are on many days, to a parading of all the injustices and abuses that are going on in the UIC. My colleague, the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy), mentioned earlier that often people collect unemployment insurance for a period of 51 weeks. I would remind him, and members of the opposition, that the average person draws unemployment insurance for only 16 weeks and very few indeed collect from the full period. I would refer specifically to the provision in the bill lowering to 65 the age at which unemployment insurance coverage ceases.

[Translation]

The decision to lower the maximum age to get unemployment insurance coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act stems from a number of fundamentals. One of them is the very nature of the plan. The Unemployment Insurance Act provides a protection against income losses in various circumstances and for a certain amount of time. It is not a retirement fund, but a temporary insurance against possible salary losses. When protection ends, premiums are in no way refundable. Fron that point of view, unemployment insurance is similar to a fire protection policy. If a fire breaks out, compensation is paid, but if there is no fire and the house is sold or torn down, fire insurance premiums are not refunded to the policyholder.

Anyway, there is no direct financial relationship between the cost of premiums and the amount of income protection under the plan. For instance, a person who would have been working since the plan was introduced in 1941 and always had the maximum insurable earnings would have contributed a total of $1,500 to the plan in September 1975. If this person came to lose his or her employment because of compulsory retirement at 65 and submitted a claim, he or she would be entitled to $6,373 over the maximum period of 51 weeks during which benefits a payable, provided the national and regional employment rates are high and he or she cannot secure employment.

[English]

A three-week retirement benefit is payable to major attachment claimants when they reach age 65, and this will remain under Bill C-69. The benefit is an acknowledgment of the reduced protection available to workers in the final year before their sixty-fifth birthday. Third, the principle of coverage being extended only for the normal working life of the claimant was recognized in the 1971 act when coverage was terminated at age 70. Labour groups, members of parliament and the general public have long advocated that most forms of social security for senior citizens begin at age 65, or even earlier in some cases, in recognition of the fact that the average working person has the right and the need to retire at that age and that other forms of income support should be available to him.

The Canada Pension Plan particularly has been upgraded. The earnings test has been eliminated and the plan itself reaches full maturity in 1976. These were concerns expressed by members of parliament in 1970 and 1971 when the Unemployment Insurance Act was being debated. They felt that the Canada Pension Plan did not provide adequate income replacement because at that time it had not reached full maturity and was earnings-tested. Other programs have also been improved. For example, in 1971 the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan afforded recipients $65. In 1975 we see that this has risen to $130. The old age security was $80 in 1971 and today it is $126.

Mr. Benjamin: Not enough.

Mr. Parent: It is $126, my friend, and the guaranteed income supplement for a single person is up from $34 to $88.

An hon. Member: Don't brag about it.

Mr. Parent: The hon. member says we should not brag about it. I ask him, what should we do; hide our heads because we are helping those who need it? Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the government is meeting its moral obligations with regard to people 65 years of age and over. Hon. members will note that all these programs have been indexed. In addition, a $500 increase in the personal income tax exemption for persons aged 65 to 70 was made in 1972, bringing the total personal exemption for this age group to $1,000 more than for other taxpayers. This exemption has also been indexed.

The government operates its programs on limited financial resources, and time and time again we hear members of the opposition saying, "Cut back here" and "Cut back there."

Mr. Benjamin: Not us.

Mr. Parent: Cutting back is all very well, but in the final analysis, will the cuts hurt the people of Canada to such an extent that they will not be able to operate? This is one of the questions which must be answered in this House. The need to restrain spending is even more urgent now in the fight against inflation. Thus, the government must allocate its money where it will have maximum impact.

Mr. Benjamin: For whom?

Mr. Parent: For those who are unemployed, that is for whom. In terms of unemployment insurance, that need is clearly in the provision of employment income protection for people who are still in the normal working period of their lives. After retirement age has been reached, other programs take over to offer income support.

[Translation]

Apparently a number of people from this age group are using the unemployment insurance plan for purposes other than those for which it was intended. For instance, recent inquiries by Statistics Canada on labour market have consistently established that fewer persons declare being unemployed for the inquiry purposes than the actual number of claimants. That seems to indicate that those persons say to the inquirers that they are not looking for a job or not interested in finding one while they get unemployment benefits and report to the UIC that they actively look for a job. So it is increasingly difficult, from an administrative point of view, to ascertain whether the unemployed 65 or more are actually willing to work.

We must also recognize that people in that age group have difficulties finding a job. It is not always easy to look for a job when there are much younger prospects who report daily—these days anyway. The usual requirements for actively seeking employment with which all claimants must comply are excessively difficult for elderly workers who have serious employment problems. As the commission must apply the same requirements to all claimants, people of 65 or more do experience significant problems.

[English]

I submit that this amendment will be understood. I suggest that it will be accepted by people 65 years of age and over.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to confine most of my remarks to clause 34 of Bill C-69, the clause dealing with social insurance numbers and the issuing of cards. However, I wish to say a few words about abuses generally with regard to unemployment insurance. Whenever someone on this side talks about tightening up unemployment insurance regulations to catch violators, someone opposite always mentions the high level of unemployment in some part of Canada and suggests that we are trying to disallow some unfortunate persons. This is not really the case and that is certainly not our purpose. But there are people who work the system, so to speak, and who have found the key to enable them to milk the fund for all they can get. Those are the ones we are talking about.

For instance, we are aware of certain large retailers who use the Unemployment Insurance Act to their advantage. What they do is quite legal, but in my view it is not very moral. They have a stable of workers whom they hire for short periods of time, lay them off and take on other workers for a short period of time. Then when the clerks are laid off, they apply for unemployment insurance. After a few weeks on unemployment insurance, they will be rehired, continue working for a period of time and then they are laid off again. The benefit to the employer is that these people are temporary or probationary workers, and as such they are not eligible for any of the normal fringe benefits given to regular employees. There is a turnover of thousands of people during the course of a year. The Unemployment Insurance Commission finances this stable of people with benefits. I cannot suggest any way to stop this, but it is happening now and did not happen before. It happens now with more and more companies and it is one of the abuses which somewhere along the line must be dealt with.

The other problem I see in my part of the country has to do with farm labour. A few years ago the available farm labour gathered on the outskirts of the city of Hamilton at Dundurn Castle. The local market gardeners would arrive at 6 a.m. and pick up their fieldhands for the day, delivering them back after the day's work to the same place. Some bright clerk in the Unemployment Insurance Commission office in Hamilton read the fine print in the regulations which said that if a person is employed more than 25 days per year, unemployment insurance premiums must be deducted. This bright lad created havoc in the market garden industry. People used to work for the summer at the market gardens and never worried about unemployment insurance or income tax because they did not earn enough to bother the income tax department: most earned less than $1,000.

What happened to these people? They now pay unemployment insurance premiums, their employers have to pay their portion as well and they must keep records of earnings and deductions. These people would rarely seek unemployment insurance benefits when the market gardening season was over. Many people took it as a part-time job during the summer. They went back to school, or many who were housewives went back to their normal home duties in the fall when the children went back to school. Some of them worked during the summer on farms to earn enough money to take a winter holiday. I suggest that this was the situation in most parts of the country where there was market gardening.

Now we have to import field hands from Mexico and the Caribbean to fill the void, at considerable cost to this country's taxpayers. I might add that the calibre of work done by these imported field hands is high. The farmers like them and want them back. I mention this as an example of government interference with the private sector. It is working to the detriment of market gardens and adding to the cost of the unemployment insurance program.

An hon. Member: Do not forget the tobacco farmers.

Mr. Kempling: I ought not to forget the tobacco farmers. They are important.

I turn now to clause 34 dealing with social insurance numbers and cards issued by central records. I feel somewhat responsible for this particular mendment to the act and commend the minister for bringing it in. We often talked about it when we met in the halls before the bill was introduced. He assured me that the amendment would be included and I commend him for it. He is a man of his word and I admire him greatly.

Mr. Alexander: It is just that it takes him a long time to act.

Mr. Kempling: Leverage is something members of parliament learn to use, to move the bureaucracy of government from its rigid and inflexible position. One must learn where to put the lever and how much pressure to apply in order to obtain the desired movement. It is an art you must learn by experience. You begin from the position that the government thinks it never does anything wrong and that those at the top, the senior bureaucrats, in their wisdom believe they know what is best for the people. Given that fact, you find difficulty in placing the levers in the proper position. But if you persevere, you can win.

Early in March, 1974, a young man named Gary Hapke, from Dundas, near my home town, came to my home one Sunday with a problem. He told me an amazing story, of having had his pocket picked at a circus in 1970 and of someone, unknown to him, using his identity. He explained that he had to justify his income tax claim each year to the officials of the Department of National Revenue because his impersonator was accepting employment in Mr. Hapke's name and under his social insurance number.

Further, the impersonator used Mr. Hapke's driver's licence and, during a series of months, had collected several traffic violations, fraud charges, and a conviction for stealing a car, all in Gary Hapke's name. Here was this young man trapped between three layers of government.

Through the efforts of Hon. George Kerr, then solicitor general of Ontario, we arranged to erase the traffic violations, the stolen car charge and fraud charges standing in his name on provincial records. Frankly, I did not know where to begin. Mr. Hapke and I talked to the local police, and met with Staff Sergeant Smith of the Regional Police of the Hamilton area. He was extremely helpful in the initial stages of the matter, and provided background detail which showed the immensity of the fraudulent impersonation which had been taking place. The problem was that it was difficult to move the bureaucracy in Ottawa and get them to clear Mr. Hapke's records. I had already taken the position that a new social insurance number should be issued to Mr. Hapke so that he could go on his way; then, if more charges arose, the income tax people could know that they were attributable to the impersonator and not to Mr. Hapke. In the meantime Mr. Hapke's name and social insurance number kept turning up all over the country, even as far west as British Columbia.

I wrote detailed letters to four cabinet ministers, the then minister of national revenue, the then minister of justice, the Minister for Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), in an attempt to straighten out this matter. It was necessary to get those four cabinet ministers to act.

It was necessary for the Department of National Revenue to clear the income tax files so that Mr. Hapke could get a tax refund to which be was entitled by virtue of tax overcharge.

The Solicitor General and the RCMP had to act, to apprehend the impersonator. We knew his name and the RCMP, as it turned out, had his fingerprints on file.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration had to act, to clear the UIC files covering Mr. Hapke's name, and to issue a new social insurance number from central records.

The then minister of justice had to act to charge the impersonator, once apprehended, with impersonation and fraudulent use of government documents.

By a stroke of luck we learned, through Inspector Sam Eyre of the Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police, that the person using Gary Hapke's name was one Roger Sasserville, then serving a sentence in Oxford county jail for fraud. I immediately rose in the House and asked the Solicitor General if he would now proceed with charges against Mr. Sasserville for impersonating Mr. Hapke, using his social insurance number, and so on. To my surprise the Solicitor General replied that he did not know whether the matter fell within his jurisdiction. I received the same replies from the then minister of justice and the then minister of national revenue. I only received satisfaction from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who said he would look into it.

At about this time I got in touch with the head of the central records branch of the Department of Manpower and Immigration to see what could be done about issuing

Mr. Hapke a new social insurance number. To my surprise he told me that this could only be done if Mr. Hapke would change his legal name. I questioned this gentleman several times. He told me he had cleared the matter with the legal officers of the department and that this was the only way a new social insurance number could be issued. I was also told that the computer was not programmed to handle two numbers in connection with the same name. This was nonsense, as I was soon to learn.

As a result of the publicity given this matter several people wrote to me. I heard from an employer in Toronto who had several employees who possessed two, three and, in one case, four social insurance cards. He told me that he had recorded their social insurance numbers on their T-4 slips. I do not know whether the Department of National Revenue has looked into this matter. The danger of that situation is that a man might be employed under one number and collect unemployment insurance under another. In one case this could be duplicated three or four times. I merely point out a possible abuse. I hope that the good people in National Revenue have looked into this and will straighten the muddle out, because it could be very costly for the government and the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

An hon. Member: One man in Winnipeg had 15 cards.

Mr. Kempling: The situation, of course, was ridiculous. Here was a young man whose name had been used fraudulently, who had a record on RCMP files not of his own making, who had been harassed for four years by National Revenue for non-payment of taxes on income he had not earned, and whose personal credit record was filled with charges that were not of his making. He was now being asked to change his name legally in order to secure a new social insurance number. It was said that this was necessary in order to straighten out the record.

He was probably the most depressed young man I have run into for years. When he came to me he had applied for a job with a computer company, he having studied computer science at the university. When the firm checked his record with a credit reporting agency it found three or four charges standing against his name. There was a charge for car theft, numerous traffic violations, and other charges that did not relate to him at all. After we brought this matter into the open events began to move more rapidly.

I happened to find out that the man who was impersonating my constituent was in jail in Woodstock in Oxford County. One Sunday I visited him for two hours. He told me a most amazing story of how he travelled across Canada and the United States using the identity of another man. While there, I examined the visitors' book back to the time that this man Sasserville was admitted to jail. I found that no one from any government agency had visited or interviewed him with regard to the fraudulent use of government records and Mr. Hapke's name.

I did this because, after there had been several critical newspaper articles about this matter, someone wrote to the editor of the Globe and Mail over the signature of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). The letter stated that the commission had traced this person and was taking action. I know the minister did not write the letter. The person who did write it knew that this was an outright lie because the commission had not or was not taking any action. That is why I searched through the visitors' book to see who had been there since the man had been admitted. I talked with prison officials as well.

I know the minister did not write the letter. One of his executive assistants wrote it. Every day we see ministers in here with three or four books filled with letters requiring signatures. The minister is a busy man. He probably signed the letter without reading it. Had he read it, I am sure he would not have signed it.

I read the letter in the Globe and Mail. I replied to the editor and straightened out the record. It seemed odd that a minister of the Crown would correspond with a member of parliament through letters to the editor in a newspaper.

We then had some action on this matter. The then Minister of National Revenue responded by refunding the taxes paid. I sincerely thank him for that. He was the first to take any real action. They then refunded the taxes paid by Mr. Hapke on funds earned by Mr. Sasserville. All the traffic violations were cancelled and a new driver's licence was issued to Mr. Hapke.

The money paid for traffic fines was refunded and the fraud charges in Ontario standing in Mr. Hapke's name were cancelled. In fact only two things remained to be cleared. We had to have his record on file with the RCMP expunged, and a new social insurance number issued.

After considerable difficulty we had Mr. Hapke's records expunged by the RCMP. I say difficulty. That is really an understatement. I watched the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) over television one evening. He was telling a reporter that he was endeavouring to have criminal records cleared when a criminal has had no charge for five years. Here we were with a man who had not committed a crime and we could not get his record cleared.

A strange thing happened. The Solicitor General actually sent me a fingerprint card and asked me to fingerprint my constituent, Mr. Hapke. Can you imagine a minister of the Crown asking a member of parliament to fingerprint a constituent who had committed no crime? It was a ludicrous situation. I said the man had not committed a crime, so why should I have him fingerprinted. I said to the minister that he had charges standing in this name and an RCMP detachment in Hamilton. If he was that concerned about it, why did he not have this man arrested. The minister would not do that. I could not understand why the RCMP did not investigate the matter.

After persistent prodding of the various ministers, they finally moved to charge Mr. Sasserville with fraudulent use of government records and Mr. Hapke's name. And after this was completed, we finally had Mr. Hapke's record cleared by the RCMP. Through the RCMP, and I give them credit for this, we got Mr. Hapke's original wallet and records returned.

This chap Sasserville had gone to the United States. He became involved with the Texas state police and the FBI. They deported him to Canada. They removed his wallet and, by God, there was Mr. Hapke's social insurance card, driver's licence, and birth certificate.

After being deported from the United States, this fellow just went to the post office, applied for another social insurance card and got it. He remembered the number. He also applied for another driver's licence and birth certificate, both of which he got. He bought a new wallet and was back in business. He carried on in this way for a couple of years before being caught. True to form, however, the RCMP got their man. At least they got the wallet from the man.

The final chapter is the inclusion of clause 34 in Bill C-69 that will allow Mr. Hapke to have a new social insurance number. Even the final chapter was difficult. The then parliamentary secretary to the minister asked me to come to the minister's office for a meeting. I declined. I felt I would be the poor little backbench member of parliament coming before the minister and all his staff and they would try to get me to back off this position. It was next suggested that I see the deputy minister. I again declined. I suggested that they come to my office, but the minister would not do that. I said that we did not need the minister, we could do it without him.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: I did not mean it in that light. I have great respect for the minister. The date was set and the senior deputy minister, the parliamentary secretary, the chief of central records, the legal officer of the department, and a secretaty all arrived in my office for a meeting. They wanted me to move off my position of insisting on a new social insurance number. They offered several options. The chief of central records denied ever telling me that Mr. Hapke would need to have his name changed legally. I had my notes of the telephone conversation which I read to him. I was not about to cause him too much embarrassment, so I said "That is past history, let's get the matter settled."

I refused to accept any of the options and continued to insist that a new social insurance number be issued. The senior deputy minister then advised me that he had recommended to the minister that the act be changed to accommodate Mr. Hapke and others caught in this unfortunate position. As I said at the outset, I commend the minister for this. He is a man of his word. He told me he would bring in the amendment, and he has done that. He told me privately that he would allow me to present the new social insurance card to my constituent—he is a pretty good guy. At any rate, it was a long road.

I have taken the opportunity to tell the story here because the situation described is one in which anybody might find himself. It could happen again to someone. An individual gets caught between two or three levels of bureaucracy, feels alone, and does not know where to turn. Fortunately this young man came to me, and eventually we got the matter straightened out. It took considerable effort to get some of the people concerned to move, but finally we were able to work through. When this bill passes and we issue the man with a new social insurance card we can write finis to this episode, and I can close the file and put it in the archives.

I might mention that this young man has lost about three years of employment as a result of this experience—he has worked only at casual labour. He is a graduate student in computer science—imagine someone skilled in computer science getting fouled up by a computer. Every time he applied for a job involving a security requirement, this record, which was not really his, came to the front and he was turned down. Hon. members will realize that putting up with this for three years involves a great deal of strain. I wrote letters on his behalf to each company to which he had applied, straightening the matter out so that should he decide to re-apply they would not think badly of him.

Once the new card has been issued we shall go through the credit reporting agencies in Toronto and Ontario generally—we now have this facility since the passing of the new act by the government of Ontario. They will open their records to us and we can straighten out any untruths we find there and record the new insurance number so that no further embarrassment is caused at some future date.

I hope hon. members appreciate the story. It is a true story.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: It could happen to anyone. People who find themselves in a similar position should refuse to take "no" for an answer, because with the proper amount of leverage every obstacle can be removed.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, there are many aspects of Bill C-69 one might discuss. I should like to concentrate on one of them—social disincentives and abuses.

Unemployment insurance is perhaps one of the most controversial government programs of our time.

Mr. Alexander: Right!

Mr. Philbrook: Facts are facts. There is no monopoly of brains or insight on that side of the House.

Mr. Alexander: And figures are figures.

Mr. Philbrook: Surely all reasonable people must agree that well-motivated citizens, especially those with dependents, who find themselves temporarily out of work and lacking income through no fault of their own, deserve decent support from their own society.

Many of us recall first hand the depression period of the dirty thirties. At that time there was much less government, much less organization of labour, and many fewer private plans to cover social emergencies. In a very real sense business had the upper hand, even though it had its own problems. And although business is now concerned about the balance of power shifting away from itself—

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Philbrook: I said it was concerned. I did not say it was a fact. Business is remembered as seeming socially impotent during the dark days of the depression. This was one of the main stimuli to growth in the size and power of governments and unions. The out-of-work experience is not only impoverishing but degrading for the honest worker.

Our unemployment insurance plan is not only a permanent feature of our way of life but is recognized by other countries, including the U.S.A., as being one of the best. Nevertheless it warrants continuous review and occasional amendment as times change.

That is exactly what Bill C-69 is all about. These amendments attempt to improve the plan, mainly by doing three things. First, a larger proportion of the premium payments will be paid by the employer and employee, and less by the government, which is being urged on all sides to reduce its spending. Second, it tightens up some areas of the plan in order to discourage abuse. Third, it further rationalizes the plan by eliminating benefits in a social area already covered—I refer in this case to retired people who already receive pensions or who may prefer to continue working.

Such cost saving measures, which also help tidy up and tighten the plan, deserve the support of all Canadians, including those who criticize the government. Unfortunately this is expecting too much from the other side. Responsible action by the government has been greeted only by partisan political bickering. Undoubtedly further changes and improvements will be made from time to time. This bill was not designed to be all-inclusive and final.

On the other hand, in all honesty it must be acknowledged that there is broadly based concern shared by the public over several aspects of the program as it now stands. Some of these concerns involve the terms of the law, some the way in which it is administered, and most reflect a general social malaise related to the economy.

Real abuses probably do occur, in spite of the best efforts of the UIC office workers. Some can and should be corrected, some are very difficult to cope with in practice. In my own unemployment insurance district there are about 12,000 claims on the books at any one time. Of these about 10 per cent are subject to special investigation, and of that number about 70 per cent are rejected as not being valid. This represents a great deal of work and a high level of responsibility.

One might suggest to the public that they report cases of abuse which come to their attention, but people do not appear to relish such a responsibility. I told my constituents that if they reported cases of abuse to me I would see that appropriate action was taken. So far only one case has been reported to me in 16 months. However, I have received many reports of unemployed people who feel they are in dire straits and that the UIC office has been too tough, even to the extent of asking jobless persons to return money.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, when I called it six o'clock I was talking about how tough unemployment insurance offices can be in that they sometimes even demand money back from UIC claimants. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) commented that that should not be allowed. Where return of overpayment is due to the government I agree it should not be allowed; where it is due to the claimant I think it only logical that it should be. So at least I agree partly with him on that point.

In our work with UIC officers, my staff and I have found them reasonable and co-operative. Theirs is a tough job, especially in trying to determine whether an unemployed person is sincerely trying to find a job. Still, some critics complain that the earning period for unemployment insurance benefits should be longer and that the period of benefits should be shorter. I wonder whether the worker has much choice about when or how long he is going to be laid off.

Some critics insist that applicants should have to take any kind of job, in any part of the country. Perhaps there is room for some tightening here, but such judgments if extreme could simply be disrupting for the careers of some wage earners, uprooting for their families, and wasteful of human resources for the nation. It could also become very anti-democratic for our society.

Last year the standard stereotype for the abuser of the plan was the young, long haired, anti-social hippie dropout. This year the spotlight has shifted to the middle aged, more respectable types who have on and off concepts of work, housewives and other women, seasonal workers, students of all ages, and so on. These are often people who would keep working given the chance, but who do need and deserve temporary help. However, there is undoubtedly some potential for abuse here also, which should be discouraged.

The provisions for sickness and pregnancy leaves have not escaped criticism either. In these days of humane programs, a lack of alternative illness insurance, and the right of women, married or not, to combine family life and personal careers, these provisions are also worthy. By the way, as my colleague, the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne), pointed out recently, the pregnancy provisions need to be as flexible as possible. Women are not entirely predictable, even for medical experts.

Every attempt to help people opens a new avenue for possible abuse. None of us defends cheaters and freeloaders. All of us recognize the importance of the actuality principle in this plan, as much as is possible with a moving target, as much as this is attainable with a fluctuating unemployment rate. We all urge the minister to tighten up the plan as much as necessary, to guard the work ethic and save the taxpayers' money. Just as important, or perhaps even more important, for this whole work situation is to have Canada Manpower and private employers work together more effectively to bring the unemployment and unfilled jobs together.

We all hope that Canadians will try to be knowledgeable, tolerant, and responsible in making this valuable plan work. We cannot afford to bend over backwards trying to straighten up. But we must try to straighten up with government matters like UIC. I believe that Bill C-69 is a step in the right direction, Mr. Speaker, and therefore I would like to register my support for it.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, there is no debate more vital to the part of the country I come from than one associated with unemployment and the benefits provided those who are unemployed, since no area of the country faces the tragedy of unemployment and under-employment to the same degree as Atlantic Canada. Therefore the representatives from that area must, as a responsibility to our constituents, examine as carefully as possible any proposals in relation to this legislation that are put forward by the government and compare them with what has gone before and with what has been suggested by the party of which I am a member, to see whether solutions can be found to the problems of this nation.

Certainly it would be hard for our party to be as devoid of knowledge and thought concerning the poor, the underprivileged and unemployed of this nation as the proposals exemplified in the legislation before us today. There is no way I can support the proposed amendments presented to the House in this legislation, and I will vote against them and oppose them in every way I can.

Who are we going after under this legislation? The one thing that is certain is that we are going after the people who are 65 years of age and over. It is a great tribute to the government that it is earmarking the people who are 65 years of age and older as those who are redundant in respect of the development of this nation and who therefore should be struck off the rolls. One has to be the biggest cheapskate in the world to go along with this plan. Surely this is a great way to look after or reduce the $2 billion deficit. You go after the 5,000 people who are 65 years of age or older and who are still in the work force today and want to stay. They have every right, as far as I am concerned, to these benefits, certainly as much right as anyone else in this nation.

What is the government saying to the workingman who is facing a degree of unemployment that has never plagued this country before? What is the government saying to them? It is saying it is going to put these people in a box. It is going to put the people in the low employment areas such as the Atlantic provinces in a position where the employer can dictate to the employee in a fashion that has never been available to the employer before. The government is going to put an employer in a position that he can say to his employees, "You either toe the line and do what I tell you, or I am going to fire you and you are going to end up not getting any benefits for six weeks."

Almost all employees in my part of the country, mainly because of the policies of the government, are unable to stay unemployed without help for two weeks, let alone longer, because whatever savings they have managed to put together have been used. They are in this position because of the economic policies of this government which has put them out of work for at least part of each year, and unfortunately all too many are now out of work the year around, getting their stamps anywhere they can find them, working part-time on LIP grant projects or something of the sort. I suggest that this is a wasteful type of manufacturing. The government could better serve the people in my area if these funds were invested in useful projects that would do something for the local economy from a long-term point of view.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: You sure have the Liberal stooges hanging up top there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has the floor.

Mr. Coates: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to see that you are protecting me from my own.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I was particularly impressed by the comments of the last speaker. He started out talking about the dirty thirties. That is a long story that most people in this country have learned to live with, and I refer to the so-called Bennett days; "the Tory times are bad times." I suggest that if it were not for the $2 billion deficit that will exist this year in the Unemployment Insurance Commission fund there would be more people on welfare across this country than ever could have been the case in the dirty thirties. We now have the Trudeau seventies and they are dirtier than the thirties ever were in any province in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I was interested in the contribution of the last hon. member in view of a speech he made earlier on June 26. Perhaps other hon. members would be interested to hear him make a speech on the control legislation his government has put forward. On June 26 he was recorded at page 7113 of Hansard as stating:

> We must continue to try to make voluntary restraints work with the co-operation of all sectors, with government setting a solid example, but certainly not mandatory controls. Those we leave to the Tories.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Coates: With words of wisdom like that from the hon. member we are certainly going to listen long and hard to what he has to say about unemployment insurance and the problems to be faced by the unemployed in the days ahead.

I am interested in seeing how he votes in respect of those mandatory controls that he was going to leave to the Tories. We will see whether he is going to be a sheep, a lamb, or whether he is going to come into the House and vote as he talks, or did talk back on June 26 before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told him he had to talk out of both sides of his mouth if he wanted to live with this government, in view of what it says today and will say tomorrow, squandering taxpayers' money day in and day out.

An hon. Member: A true Grit.

Mr. Coates: But unlike John Wayne who is a different kind of true grit.

An hon. Member: He has got grit, though.

Mr. Coates: I could quote the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) ad infinitum regarding this great insurance scheme and what it was going to do for the workers, how it was going to be in balance, actuarially sound, and do all the other things that he said it would when presenting the legislation. He told us about the dollars he was going to get from the pockets of the employers and the employees. All we have to do today is look at what has happened this year and compare it with that benchmark of 4 per cent unemployment. We know this is the biggest fraud that has ever been perpetrated on the public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Oh God, I can't take any more.

Mr. Alexander: What do you mean you can't take any more? You sit right there and listen.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the deficit we have right now in the unemployment insurance fund would be sufficient to harness the tides in the Bay of Fundy and produce employment for 30,000 people in the Atlantic provinces. That is how big is the deficit we are now facing, and this gives you some idea of the magnitude of money being spent because the government miscalculated in respect of this scheme that was supposed to be actuarially sound and of benefit from a stop-gap point of view to thousands of employees who found themselves out of work.

The government brought in this new grandiose scheme in true Trudeau style. Everything was for the people. The only trouble is that in this just society the employers and the employees end up paying, rather than the government. The government now is transferring a part of this $2 billion deficit to the employees and the employers. This legislation will pick up about $800 million. The government says it is not going to take it out of the pockets of the people; but somebody has to pay the bill, and in fact it will be the same people except a smaller segment; namely, those who work and do business in the country. Those are the people who will pay at least part of the bill from now on as covered by this legislation.

Mr. Alexander: That's true.

Mr. Coates: This is the just society.

Mr. Alexander: I remember that.

Mr. Coates: This is the great society that was to eliminate all the problems facing Canadians, except those of the workers. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told a great many people that they did not have to work if they did not want to.

• (2020)

Mr. Alexander: I remember that.

Mr. Coates: There have been fewer working ever since. The Prime Minister has done more to put people on the street and out of jobs than any other Prime Minister in our history. Let us go back a little because some hon. members opposite were not here in the days between 1957 and 1963, and do not realize what a tremendous government the Diefenbaker administration was for the people of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: That government left behind a legacy for this government which this government has messed up in every way possible since taking office. Let us look at the five years between 1957 and 1962. Total production in Canada was up 26.6 per cent. Exports were up 30.8 per cent. Employment was up a half million. Farm income was up 19.3 per cent. Labour income was up 24.8 per cent. Profits before taxes and before inflation—this should be of interest to the government—were up 17.4 per cent. Social justice was up 79 per cent. I do not refer to the kind of social justice we see here which picks the pockets of a person. I refer to the type of social justice which provides a person with respect and as much dignity as possible in this nation. That is the kind of justice we had in the period of the Diefenbaker administration. Payments to provinces were up 124 per cent in a five-year period.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Are you against that?

Mr. Coates: Against it? I am telling the hon. member, now that he is coming alive, that these are the things that were done for the Canadian people by John Diefenbaker, and I am asking him to compare these things with the performance of the government of which he is a member at this time. When he does that I am sure he will join us; he could not do otherwise if he is sensible. When we look at the facts we cannot help but see how much better that government was than this government.

Today we hear much talk about inflation. This bill will produce a great deal more inflation. The employees in this nation will be thinner because the chunk being taken by the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be bigger. The prices their employers will have to charge for the products those employees produce will have to be higher because they will have a chunk, estimated at $400 million, taken out of their pockets to pay the extra benefits that will be demanded under this legislation. We will find employees with less money in their pockets and prices will be higher than they are today because of this legislation.

The government talks about restraint and what we are supposed to do to try to hold down wages and prices and then wonders why the CLC and the working men across this country oppose restraints. They do so because of announcements such as that made this afternoon by the housing minister and because the government produces inflation every day. It does not know how to stop it. At the same time, the government tells the people they must accept this legislation, that they will be told how much they may earn, and that an attempt will be made to keep prices down.

The government says it does not know whether or not it can keep prices down because there are many ingredients involved. It says it is not sure about this but that it will make the attempt. The government makes attempts to bail itself out, such as it is doing by means of this legislation. The working man will be in trouble. I do not know who is not in trouble today because of the government and the way in which it attempts to run the country.

An hon. Member: It could not run a peanut stand.

Mr. Coates: That is right. As well, the peanuts probably would be old, soft, and not very good. There would probably not be a customer for the peanuts because the reputation of those people over there is not very good in respect of selling anything from peanuts upward. When we talk about inflation and competent managers of the economy in this nation we should look at what has been said about the Diefenbaker administration when it held office. This is what Canadian Business Magazine had to say in September, 1962:

> A 12-nation comparison of retail price increases over the 12 months shows that Canada has been the most successful in keeping down the cost of living. The Canadian increase was just under 1 per cent. The US was only a shade more. Biggest increases were in France, Holland and the UK where the cost of living rose by over 5 per cent. In Germany and Sweden it rose by 4 per cent.

The administration with which the parliamentary secretary over there is acquainted produces double digit inflation. Everything is double digit, whether it concerns the car in which the Prime Minister drives around, or his swimming pool. The Prime Minister won his just society and his Watergate, but the rest of us are paying for it. This is a bitter pill for us to swallow today, day in and day out.

This is bad legislation from every point of view. Many Canadians day in and day out, year in and year out, pay their dollars into the unemployment insurance fund and cannot get anything out of it. Paying into the unemployment insurance fund is just an added task they must accept every day and every month they work. Now the government says it wants more of their money. The government tells the people they must pay more for working every day. There must be a method whereby these people when they reach age 65 are not cut off and cut out.

We should have a scheme whereby those who work and never draw benefits but pay into the fund day in and day out would be able to receive some benefit in a realistic way at the end of their working careers. If they work continually and contribute to the fund they should derive some benefit for the contributions they have made over a lifetime. I do not like a government which tells the people in my constituency that they must pay into the unemployment insurance fund year after year and never draw anything out, and that if they want to work until they are 70 years of age they can work until they are 70, but they will receive no benefits after they reach 65. These people will receive nothing for the amount of money they paid into this fund over the years even though they have not drawn anything out of it.

A government with a heart and a soul would try to produce a scheme which would tell the people that it would provide an incentive to work, not for nine months followed by a three-month period in which they would receive unemployment benefits, but for 12 months of the year during which time they would pay benefits, and that an attempt would be made to work out a method whereby some of these benefits would be treated as insurance and some would be treated as an investment toward retirement. That is the kind of government the people of Canada want, rather than a heartless government which tells people that when they are age 65 they will be cut off no matter over how long a period they have contributed to the fund.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) pleaded with the government to extend the qualification period. He warned what would happen in respect of this bill if that were not done. But the Liberals had all the answers. They always have all the answers until the bill comes in and then the answers become the taxpayers' answers; they pay the bills for the proposition the Liberals put forward.

I have never known a government that was able to run out of answers and run away from problems as quickly as this government does once things go bad, and they are mighty sour right now in so far as unemployment insurance is concerned, sour with the working man, sour with the businessman, and sour with the man on the street. Now they are adding a whole new spectrum and they will be sour with the older citizens of this country, the people whom we should be looking after more than any others in this country because of the tremendous contribution they made when times were tough, when they did not have the opportunity to save the way people do today, that is if there is any value in saving today when inflation is eating money faster than people put it in the bank. For a measly $3 million the Liberals cut 5,000 off and threw them adrift. They did not worry about them at all.

When the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) proposes to them that they leave the provision regarding people 65 years of age and over out of this legislation, do you know what they will say to him? They will say, "In no way! We have all the answers". Once again they will have all the answers, but when this thing crashes, as does everything around this government, they will be deaf and they will laugh. These are the cynical ones, the uninterested, the unfeeling.

An hon. Member: Deceitful.

Mr. Coates: Yes, these are all good adjectives with which to describe this government to perfection. As the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) said today to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp), call the by-election in St. John's West. We will make Hochelaga become a great cry of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: One after the other the Grits will fall.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: No one else but the Prime Minister himself told the Grits not to be frightened, to forget about Hochelaga.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member revert to the subject of Bill C-69.

Mr. Coates: I thank you for your advice, Mr. Speaker. I am on Bill C-69 and I am referring to the kind of effect that it is having on the public, and what the public is trying to say to the government through the ballot box. What it said in Hochelaga it will say in St. John's West.

An hon. Member: What about Restigouche?

Mr. Coates: It said it in Restigouche also. I suggest to the hon. member that if he is so sure of things why does he not resign his seat and stand in the by-election there, and we will see how well he does?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Come on!

Mr. Coates: I say to the government that the public is saying through the ballot box, "We don't like what you are doing". If you heard the Prime Minister on Saturday or Sunday when that CBC program was aired, you would know he was telling you you are in trouble. Let me tell you that you are in trouble because of legislation like this. He is telling you that you could very well lose the next election. I will be even more pessimistic than he was and say that you will lose the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to your Liberal colleagues: calm down, do not be frightened before your annual meeting; do not give the public the impression you are upset about the resignation of the former minister of finance who has wiped his hands of you people all together. We do not see him any longer; he does not say anything. I would say he has not only repented, he is meditating. I think meditation must be good for the soul because he has done a lot of it since he resigned. He must have been a great sinner because he has been in meditation ever since. He may be in purgatory now, but he may come back. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that he left the country in purgatory, and we sure know it today because of the financial policies that were put forward by the government during the period when he was minister of finance.

I do not know about the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) but he is certainly starting out the wrong way. I can only hope that salvation will come to him before he too gets to purgatory, where he may well be descending at the present time.

The government had better smarten up to the fact that the legislation it is producing is not what the people of this country want. When a government talks about restraint and brings in legislation which is inflationary and destructive to the pay cheques of the working men of this nation, and at the same time tries to get them to reduce their demands for the incomes that they feel are required to match the inflation that exists, we know that its schemes will not work, especially when it is a government that practises no restraint itself.

Certainly the government does not practice restraint. If a cabinet minister wants an airplane to fly somewhere, there are lots around. We hear about problems with gasoline, but there are no problems with gasoline when a cabinet minister wants an airplane to fly him across this country. If he wants his office redecorated there is no problem with that; it is done. There is no end to the way they spend money on themselves, while at the same time asking the rest of the people to practise restraint and be careful in the way they spend their money.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate after listening for several days to the kettles calling the pots black and vice-versa.

I was particularly interested to hear the hon. member who spoke ahead of me refer to the great Diefenbaker years. He is quite right. When it comes to unemployment and unemployment insurance, the Conservatives now take second prize. The Liberals have made unemployment slightly worse than we had in 1959, 1960 and 1961, if anybody would care to check the figures. In fact the hon. member made the same mistake as the Liberal spokesmen have been doing since 1968, referring to an increase in employment but neglecting to mention the increase in unemployment when the Conservatives were in power from 1958 to 1962. I wish he had quoted those figures because he would have realized that the Conservatives now are in second place, as usual, but they are also in second place in creating unemployment.

● (2040)

Mr. Gillies: It's a lot better than third.

Mr. Benjamin: Since we have no place to go but up, I can feel free to cite this kind of example—

Mr. Gillies: You went down the last time.

Mr. Benjamin: —of the kettle calling the pot black. I should like to remind the House that in 1926 an hon. member of this place secured a letter from the then Prime Minister of Canada containing a commitment for old age pensions immediately, and sympathetic consideration for a system of unemployment insurance. This did not in fact happen until the period of 1940-41. It only took another 13 or 14 years to get that from the Liberal government. However, I can also recall as a kid in the dirty thirties hearing the Tories say that if there were an unemployment insurance plan it would destroy the incentive to work, and there would be abuses with people stealing public funds and defrauding the public. In fact we heard Tories in those days talk about stopping old age pensions because they would destroy the incentive to work. I find it amusing now that in dealing with this legislation these great friends of the working people are associating working men with businessmen.

I should like to remind my hon. friends on both the government and official opposition sides that in spite of all their propaganda, talk, innuendo, inference, and blame about so-called abuses and misuse of unemployment insurance, the reason for the fantastic deficits in the unemployment insurance fund and for the expenditures required at the expense of taxpayers is not because the claimants and beneficiaries under UIC are lazy, no good, do not want to work, or want a free ride on the UIC fund; it is due to high unemployment and no other reason. This may not be so in Saskatchewan where the figure is down to 1.9, which must be some kind of record. It is the best in all of Canada. Innuendo, inferences, and bald statements by various and sundry free enterprise spokesmen, columnists, and editorial writers that it is due to no-goods and free-riders who are abusing the unemployment insurance fund are untrue.

I was hoping for items in this legislation which would correct many of the problems every member of this House has had brought to his attention since the last time we dealt with a UIC bill, and I cannot find any. If each hon. member will check his correspondence for the last several years, there were literally hundreds and sometimes thousands of cases of UIC claimants who had been drawing benefits and then became disentitled, or were prevented from receiving benefits in the first place. I hope that some hon. members on the government side, including the minister, will consider the difficulties we have had, let alone claimants for UIC.

Let us talk about the matter of disentitlement. I see no improvements in this legislation which would correct the present act for the claimant who has been drawing benefits and is then called in for a job search interview and asked all those leading questions. He is not told what the ground rules and regulations are to begin with. Even if he is 100 per cent honest, he returns home and a week later receives a form letter, which may or may not have been signed, saying that he is disentitled.

The whole issue of what is suitable employment is reasonably well described in the legislation now, but it is badly applied. The matters of rates of pay which will be acceptable to the claimant and the commission, the kind of job the claimant can and will accept and is able to do, the limited area in which a claimant can or will work, are not covered in these amendments.

The minister is sitting here checking his mail, and I hope he has answered a few letters I have written to him in the last weeks, and will tell me what a member of parliament can say to a constituent who lives 87 miles from Regina who, when called in for a job search statement was asked many leading questions and then told that because she limited herself to employment in the village of Semans or within a radius of 25 miles, which included four or five other villages, she was disentitled because there were no employment opportunities in the villages of Semans, Govan, Strasbourg, Raymore and Nokomis. She was told that if she would seek employment in Regina and could prove that she was actively seeking employment 87 miles away, several times a week, they would reinstate her benefits.

I do not see anything in these amendments which will do anything about that kind of ridiculous situation. The policies of this government and its predecessors and large corporations denuded rural Canada of employment opportunities, did away with thousands of implement dealers, post offices, railway stations, oil company bulk stations, and other enterprises in rural Canada, which lost us tens of thousands of employment opportunities. However, if a person happens to live in a rural area and cannot find a job in the town or village in which he lives, and if he is not prepared to drive 75 or 100 miles two or three times a week—that is, each way—he is disentitled because he has limited himself to an area in which the commission says there are no opportunities for employment. What kind of nonsense is that?

I suggest that the minister resign, go out into rural Canada, limit himself to a 50 mile radius, and become disentitled to his UIC benefits. The problem is that members of parliament are not entitled to them, even though we tried to persuade the minister's predecessor to include members.

Mr. Andras: Saved by the bell.

Mr. Benjamin: It would be a good lesson for a defeated member of parliament to become disentitled if he is not prepared to drive 50 or 100 miles two or three times a week to prove that he is willing, able, and actively seeking employment.

I informed the minister of a problem in my constituency; someone in his department has replied, but I am waiting for the minister's personal response. A gentleman in my constituency by the name of Peter D. Bartram happens to be a claimant. He is a client of a lawyer who sent me a fair amount of correspondence. This claimant has a Bachelor of Arts degree, a Bachelor of Education degree, and a teacher's certificate. He was advised by a board of referees that the commission has a right to withhold notice that the terms of coverage have changed. I should think that the claimant would have the right to be aware of those changes of coverage, but he was not entitled to know that the new terms meant automatic cancellation of coverage. I hope the minister will look into this. The same member of the board, the chairman, indicated that the claimant, and I quote: "can go out and dig ditches or sell shoes."

The lawyer who sent this letter says that he feels this is a faulty interpretation of section 40 of the act. I checked the bill, and I cannot find any amendments to that section of the act. However, there is an amendment to section 40(1). Yet there is no amendment to correct the sorts of problems created for UIC claimants by sections 40(2) and 40(3). I suggest that we are considering much more than a mere exception. You do not expect a man holding a Bachelor of Arts degree, a Bachelor of Education degree, and a teacher's certificate, to cheat, and to be turned down by the chairman of the board of referees. Of course the crowning insult came from the chairman of the board. The chairman of the board in Regina is one J. Walter Erb, about whom I will say no more, except that I question his competence.

You know, no matter before which board of referees you go in Canada, if you want to appeal a decision of the board you can only get leave to appeal from the chairman of the board, who must rule on his own previous decision. I am not a lawyer, and when I read something like this I am glad I am not. Since when does a judge sit in a right of appeal on his own decisions? Since when have judges decided if their previous decisions are correct? Really, I find this provision strange. I should think the minister would want to appoint some impartial person to adjudicate, or even adjudicate himself, when it is necessary to consider the decision of the chairman of the board of referees. Since when must you go before the individual who decided your case in the first place and who says, when you seek leave to appeal, that you cannot appeal to the umpire? I remind the minister that we are talking about a fellow with Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Education degrees and who is the holder of a teacher's certificate, hardly the sort of person who does not want to work.

Mr. Gillies: I don't know about that. I know lots of fellows like that.

Mr. Benjamin: Perhaps if you were a lawyer or economist, the allegation might be true. But this injustice is not corrected in this legislation. I suggest that the minister should review the correspondence, particularly letters sent by the chairman of the board of referees in Regina, and consider why the chairman of that board refused the claimant leave to appeal the decision of the board of referees. Mr. Speaker, without such intervention the claimant does not have a chance. He is appearing before a hanging judge. He might as well forget about appealing the decision of the board of referees if the chairman of the board can say to the claimant, "You have not presented new evidence; therefore what I said previously stands and you cannot appeal." As I say, nothing in this legislation corrects this.

At the beginning of my speech I spoke about events in 1926. A former member for Winnipeg North Centre, when he was here, secured from the then Prime Minister of Canada the promise of sympathetic consideration for legislation bringing about unemployment insurance. The then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, J. S. Woodsworth, was dedicated to helping the unfortunate people of this country, and to protecting those who fell victim of our free enterprise society. Of course if we were a civilized, democratically planned, Christian, socialist society, there would be no need for unemployment insurance.

An hon. Member: We should be in heaven.

Mr. Benjamin: At least there might be a minimal need. But, lacking such a society, we need to protect the victims of a free enterprise system which, year in and year out, numbers its victims in the hundreds of thousands, no matter whether the government is Tory or Liberal. They are the same breed of cat and there is nothing new about them. The present hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) can show you his card from the Unemployment Insurance Commission dating back to the first year of operation. He has carried on the fight for a decent insurance scheme which will protect against unemployment the victims of our free enterprise, capitalist system.

The government's legislation is not designed to treat sensibly, decently, and in a civilized way people who lose jobs through no fault of their own, whether because of geography, climate, the kind of occupation they follow, or any other reason. It is not designed to help them.

The Tories have said little about this subject. With one breath, out of one side of their mouths, they talk about the poor working man; with the next breath, out of the other side of their mouths, they talk about abuses. Let us consider some of the figures relating to abuses. According to free enterprise spokesmen, the saviours of our free enterprise system, editorial writers, and others who speak in this House, most of the people drawing UIC are no-good bums. Well, look at the figures.

I agree that a few people cheat on unemployment insurance. If they numbered as many as those who cheat in business, cheat on income tax or in corporate operations, our society would be in deep trouble. But the numbers are not large. Of course there are some abuses. Abuses are likely to arise in connection with any fund. The 1971 bill was designed to cut down abuses. There were penalties for those who quit jobs without cause, or who were fired for misconduct. There were penalties for refusing to work. We think that these provisions are sound and will cover most cases. Of course any system designed by human beings can be abused.

Man's ingenuity in evading regulations is endless, especially in a society in which we teach our children, from the time they can stand, how to get around the law and regulations, and how to make a fast buck.

An hon. Member: Who does this?

Mr. Benjamin: All you need do is watch television advertising, and listen to businessmen and heads of chambers of commerce. Our kids are brainwashed from the time they are yea high.

I emphasize that the incidence of abuse is not high. Actually it is low when you consider the numbers each year going through the unemployment insurance system. Any member who thinks that we are in trouble because the UIC fund is being abused and because people will not work should look at the statistics provided by the UIC Commission itself. In 1974, when a lot of people were unemployed—it was a slightly worse year than the worst year of the Tories, 1960-6,—860 claimants were found guilty and fined; ten more were sent to jail or given suspended sentence. Therefore 870 people out of 2,400,000 odd claimants, or less than half of one per cent, were found guilty of cheating.

An hon. Member: They were only the ones caught.

Mr. Benjamin: I hear an hon. member claiming that they were only the ones caught. The other day in the debate the minister in charge of the UIC interjected to the effect that two million people were disentitled.

Mr. Andras: No.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, on October 28, as recorded on page 8633 of Hansard, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said in part:

> The minister has mentioned that there have been 250,000 disqualifications out of ten million claims. Is that very many?

The minister interjected, "It is two million."

Mr. Andras: Two million claims.

Mr. Benjamin: There were only two million claims?

Mr. Andras: That is right.

Mr. Benjamin: And there were 250,000 disqualifications, in two million claims?

Mr. Andras: In one year. That figure is for voluntary quits alone.

Mr. Benjamin: According to the minister's own figures, of a quarter of a million people disqualified, a mere 870 were found guilty of cheating. Is that right?

Mr. Andras: That is right.

Mr. Benjamin: And ten of the 870 were sent to jail. That hardly qualifies as a massive abuse of the UIC fund. Why, this talk of abuse is nothing but lip, nothing but a crime perpetrated against an excellent social program. It is designed to do nothing less than give employers the chance to hire people, who would otherwise be unemployed, for cheap wages.

• (2100)

That brings me back to the whole business of the reasons for disentitlement, what one must do to be reinstated, and the rates of pay they will accept. Of course you can tell the fellow with the Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Education and teacher's certificate to sell shoes and dig ditches. But during his prior employment he may have purchased a home and have monthly payments of $200. In addition, he may have three or four children, and cannot support them by digging ditches or selling shoes.

What kind of a job will such a person accept? During the job search interview, he is asked leading questions. When it is put to him that he would not want to work for so much less than he earned before, quite naturally he says no, he would like to get $5 or $6 an hour as he was earning $8 an hour previously. If he is foolish enough to sign a statement saying he will not work for less than that amount, a week later he will receive a form letter, probably unsigned, saying that he is disentitled because he limited himself to the amount of pay for which he will work.

There is a stacked deck against those who are normally hard-working, who have contributed to the fund, and who are unemployed when there are high rates of unemployment. The deficit which the government faced in the last several years in the UIC fund is not because of abuses but because of high unemployment. Surely the government could have learned a lesson from its fight against inflation in 1969 and 1970 when unemployment rates jumped almost in direct proportion to its fight against inflation, something ministers claimed they had wrestled to the ground.

The government now proposes a new battle against inflation without at the same time fighting unemployment. It brings in legislation that nit-picks around the edges and that does not provide a fair shake or fair hearing for those claiming unemployment insurance benefits, legitimately or not.

It is even difficult to defraud the UIC fund, something for which we should be grateful. In fact four years ago, the government and parliament devised legislation that was pretty good. It is the application of that legislation with which members on all sides quarrel. We quarrel with how it is interpreted and applied.

When the minister returns to his office I invite him to read the correspondence I have been quoting. I refer him to an application for leave to appeal dated September 17 which was rejected by the chairman. If he will check further he will see correspondence to which, to my knowledge, he has not replied. I quote the correspondence:

—the procedure outlined under the Unemployment Insurance Act is highly improper. When it is felt that the Board of Referees have widely mis-construed the purpose of the act, the materials before the board, previous decisions of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the wording of the statute, the proper remedy is to appeal. If this amounts to a recapitulation—I do not feel that this is a proper grounds for denying an appeal. Furthermore, the chairman of the board of referees in the case in question was in fact the party who put forth their interpretation of Section 40(2) of the act. To ask him to allow an appeal on the basis of his interpretation is asking a lot of a human being.

It is asking a lot, even if he were impartial.

It is suggested that his interpretation is in fact faulty and that with this in mind it would only be proper to submit the case to a higher authority for clarification as to the correct interpretation of the section.

Section 40(2) deals with suitable employment. I wish the minister would read it and make his officials apply it. Section 40(2) reads:

40(2) For the purposes of this section but subject to subsection (3) employment is not suitable employment for a claimant if it is:

(b) Employment in his usual occupation either at a lower rate of earnings or on conditions less favourable than those observed by agreement between employers or employees, or in the absence of any such agreement, than those recognized by good employers;

I suppose we in this House should say that most employers are good employers.

(c) Employment of the kind other than employment in his usual occupation either at a lower rate of earnings or on conditions less favourable than those conditions that he might reasonably expect to obtain,—

Mark the next words:

—having regard to those conditions that he habitually obtained in his usual occupation, or would have obtained had he continued to be so employed.

That is the way the act reads at the moment. This person with the Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Education and teacher's certificate was told by the board of referees that he could sell shoes or dig ditches. I cite this only as an example of thousands of cases of people denied appeals by the chairmen of the boards of referees who ruled them out of court in the first place. This is not justice of any kind, including poetic. There is nothing in this legislation to correct that kind of situation.

I am not worried about abuses of the unemployment insurance fund. Whatever percentage of abuses there may have been in the worst period of time over the last number of years is minuscule compared to the thousands and thousands of people in this country who began to draw benefits and were later disentitled for a variety of reasons. They may have refused to drive 200 miles to work. They may have a university degree and not be fussy about digging ditches. By limiting themselves to the kind of occupation they will accept, they are disentitled.

It is very natural to limit one's self to an occupation. If a person knows only one or two kinds of jobs, he may be careful about signing a paper to the effect that he will accept several kinds of employment. I would hesitate to volunteer to a UIC search officer that I am willing to do a job that I know nothing about and in which I have no experience. I could lie, accept the job, last two days and then be fired. The commission would then say that, according to the act, I have been fired for just cause and, therefore, am not entitled to benefits. The deck is stacked against anyone who is work conscientious. It is stacked against him under the present legislation, and even more so with these amendments.

If the government had brought in with its so-called improvements to the legislation some kind of program for full employment, in co-ordination and conjunction with its program to fight inflation, it would have some sympathy in this House. However, as it is now proposing to amend the act, there is no way that I or many other members can support it. The government must be prepared to come up with a lot more. It must recognize instances such as those I have cited. Cases have also been cited by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), and others.

Until the government is prepared to do more, it should not be surprised that we oppose its amendments. It should not be surprised that some of us at least are not prepared to co-operate with its so-called phoney fight against inflation. We also object to its measures when it fails to bring in a program of full employment.

The mess in the government's housing program was compounded today by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). We are now confronted with these bad amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, an act which could otherwise be made to work in a fair, equitable, and just manner. It is adequate to eliminate, rule out, or catch up with those who abuse or misuse the UIC fund. The minuscule number who do that should be thoughtless of and more thought should be given to the hundreds of thousands who are denied benefits or have them cut off, people who are not lazy no-goods, but people who want to work.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member, but his time has now expired.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Madam Speaker, Bill C-69, concerning unemployment insurance and still under discussion in the House today, has more specifically the following objective indicated in the bill itself and I quote:

An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 to add, in the manner provided, a new class to the existing classes of insurable employment; to provide, in the manner prescribed, for changes in qualifying periods, benefit periods, entitlement to benefits and, rates of benefits; to provide, in the manner prescribed, for a new basis for the calculation that determines the proportion of the basic cost of benefit for a year that will be borne by the Government; to make the employer's premiums of Her Majesty in right of Canada payable by statute; and to provide for the payment of allowances to persons or their representatives who attend before an umpire on an appeal from a decision of the Minister.

All these fine words, Madam Speaker, merely to say that the government has decided to go into action and apply the axe to the existing Unemployment Insurance Act in an attempt to save Canada from the claws of inflation. If we wanted to introduce this bill in more simple and more concrete terms, one could simply say, at the beginning of the text, the following:

His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, in such manner as to allow the federal government to ride roughshod over the unemployed who are mostly responsible for the economic problems facing our country. This image may appear a little exaggerated, but nobody can sincerely say that it is not to a great extent realistic. What strikes me most and prompts me to make such a comparison is the fact that Bill C-69 is the very first important bill to be discussed in this House immediately after the Anti-inflation Act.

Yet the first people the government is tackling, supposedly to curb its expenses, are those very people who are already in trouble on the social and economic levels—the unemployed—as if those people were the first responsible for the inflationary crisis facing this country. If we want to be in the least honest, let us admit that unfortunately those people are rather among the victims who have to get along as well as they can in a situation where jobs are growing scarce. Besides I honestly feel, and all hon. members in the House will agree with me, that the unemployed who actually do not want to work account only for a very small minority and that the vast majority of the unemployed would be very glad to get overnight a decent job to provide for their families and lead a normal life.

Madam Speaker, being close to those people, listening to their problems, as the true role of a member of parliament requires, is enough to realize that most unemployed did not choose their situation. Quite the contrary, most of the time those people go through very trying, not to say in some cases tragic, experiences. I try as much as I can to keep in continuous and close contact with my constituents of Richmond riding and I know what is going on. I am sure that most members have heard of very sorry cases in their riding and that those people—I mean the unemployed—did not have much chance to express or defend themselves at the unemployment insurance office.

Officials, Madam Speaker, often keep back from the unemployed explanations on what the law contains and what they can do to get the chance of collecting a small amount of money every week to survive or pay their bills.

I want to blame directly the civil servants working in the unemployment insurance offices who never say anything to help the case of an unemployed worker progress, either by explaining to him or her what the situation of the file is, suggesting to him or her what avenues are available under the Unemployment Insurance Act, or simply telling him or her: "Sir, Madam or Miss, you must seek employment, and our conditions are such and such." No, they prefer to keep quiet and listen to the unemployed who is speaking and the next day, the situation is unchanged. The poor unemployed has only one privilege; to go and see his or her elected representative and say: Please help me; I have come to a dead-end and I cannot get my unemployment insurance benefits to which I think I am entitled.

In many cases, Madam Speaker, if only the officer at the unemployment insurance office, in Sherbrooke or somewhere else, had opened his mouth to explain to him—if he knew, of course—he probably does not know, he may not have read it. But if he knows, he should speak up and explain the problem to him, what bothers him, what stops him, what prevents him from receiving benefits, all that, the coming back and forth and sometimes the 70, 80 or 90 miles he must drive to go see his M. P. and say: Listen, you must help me, because I have problems with my unemployment insurance. All those things would not happen and we would avoid those expenses, hardships and sacrifices of the unemployed in respect of their personal rights, if we had adopted a more humane legislation.

For all those reasons I find it inappropriate and even indecent to see the government, as its first anti-inflationary measure to cut those expenses, go after that class of citizens who are above all victims of the present economic situation, a measure which will only add to their problems, serious enough as they are.

Yesterday, Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity of reading the Senate Hansard for last Thursday, October 23. One speech held my attention in particular, that of Senator Perrault dealing with the economic situation and the current government offensive against inflation. It is worthy of note and it could, in particular, help us place Bill C-69 in its true context, and realize how nefarious its consequences could be.

The hon. senator indicated first of all that if inflation persists or increases, it can compromise an economic revival and merely increase unemployment; later on, he described the present situation with considerable eloquence and perception and I quote:

> Of all evils that afflict our society, inflation is now without doubt the most intolerable and the most insidious. It is the most intolerable because, more than any other, it exacerbates social injustices by attacking first of all the weakest and the poorest of our citizens: those who live on fixed incomes. Those who see their life savings melt like butter in a saucepan. Finally, those who are not in a position to protect their purchasing power because they are in no way able to unite to defend their rights to an adequate income.
> It is also the most insidious evil because we tend to consider inflation as a fatality against which we are helpless, except to save our own skin by sacrificing our neighbour's.

That last sentence, Madam Speaker, strikes me as unfortunately too true, and it could apply to Bill C-69 now before the House.

The government let problems pile up before reacting and now they are like a drowning man struggling desperately; they are trying to save their bacon by sacrificing their neighbour's. The worst off is the poor unemployed. The unemployed's bacon is sacrificed. They try to recover $1 billion at the poor's expense. How strange with a government which is supposedly democratic, which is reelected year after year. It looks like the electorate do not get fed up with being taken in. I say "taken in", Madam Speaker. In particular the poor are being "bought" for $2 often to vote or for something else. They are getting taken in again and again and they always vote the same way. Why? To be exploited. They cannot even afford any more to pay for their groceries.

Those of my colleagues on both sides of the House who refrain from speaking about this do so perhaps because they never went in a home where there are still children with bare feet in January, February and March. I do not exaggerate, Madam Speaker, I simply say the facts. When we go in the house, we hear: "I have been waiting for my unemployment insurance cheque for one month". In Montreal, the computers are out of order. I think that in several cases it is not the computers which are out of order but the brains of some administrators or some of our officers. That is dangerous. A computer can be repaired, but brains very hardly.

Madam Speaker, what surprises me most in this bill is that the first scapegoat who falls under the hand of the governement is still the unemployed. Yet, in the same sense as indicated by the hon. senator, whom I cited earlier, they also are concerned and facing serious social injustices, because they are at a disadvantage in a sense, unable above all to protect their purchasing power which weakens day after day because of the rising cost of living. Before such clear and precise facts, this bill becomes still more illogical and even appears to come from another era, flying in the face of common sense as it does.

In fact, the bill was announced in the budget speech by the former minister of finance quite a while ago as he expressed his intention to cut down on government's expenses to break inflation. Even at that time, the bill would do not have been timely because it might have increased the uneasiness caused by inflation. It is just as simple as that. The poor are always blamed. It is very bold of a poor man to try to get $10 more than he is entitled to. But when a rich man manages through artful trickery to cheat the Department of National Revenue of $100,000 or even only $10,000, everyone in his accountant's office applauds, ulesss it is at the cocktail parties which are thrown here and there.

But not the poor. It is too bad, he just got $10, it is dangerous. He has nothing with which to defend himself and that is why he is abused. I think one could have at least expected this legislation to undergo in-depth changes to really help the unemployed, instead of crushing them, while putting in place at the same time the mechanisms necessary to avoid abuse and detect those who may take undue advantage of the unemployment insurance plan, something on which I agree entirely with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). By the way, I do not agree with creating generalized misery because of one-tenth of 1 per cent who take undue advantage of unemployement insurance.

Madam Speaker, I want to say that we of the Social Credit are going to vote against this bill because I think it does not lead anywhere and causes even more suffering in this country. If the bill is accepted, on the one hand, the government will save $560 million in benefits that it will no longer be paying out and, on the other hand, it will go out and get $490 million more in the form of employer-employee premiums which represents a considerable loss to people. The three-week period during which the unemployed are not entitled to benefits if they quit their jobs themselves will be increased to six weeks without serious consideration for reasonable human motives. Madam Speaker, this is very serious for the following reason: In certain parts of Canada, in the province of Quebec and in the Maritimes people work for $2.60 an hour to support a family of three, four or five children.

They are being forced under this new unemployment insurance legislation to wait six weeks before receiving their first cheque when they are already in the red because the basic salary does not provide a decent living for their families. They are being forced to wait six weeks on top of that, and they are being punished if they leave their jobs because they can no longer live on their salaries, let alone provide a living for their families. Once again, I think it is scandalous in a rich country like ours.

Claimants with dependents will see their special benefits reduced from 75 per cent to 66⅔ per cent while the cost of living increases steadily.

On the other hand, people aged 65 or more will not be entitled to benefits and will not contribute to the program any longer although they paid all their life without drawing benefits and this, under the pretext of reducing the overlapping of social security programs lest, I suppose, older people get too much security. Those are, Madam Speaker, some of the main provisions of this legislation that the government presents in a such positive way and that is supposed to help the unemployed and the government.

Who stands to gain help from that bill? Certainly not the unemployed, Madam Speaker. Some members of this House will say: This project will help the unemployed. And they add: We are going to recover $1 billion from the unemployed, the employers and the employees. Where is the logic, Madam Speaker? Where is the logic of those senior officials who are giving to this government such ideas that I consider unhuman and—well, I would rather not say the word.

I think now that you will better understand why I presented this legislation at the beginning of my speech. Anyway, even if the Liberal members might not admit it today, Canadians are ever more prepared to realize it at the next election. They are not the ones to blame, it is those who counsel them in the long term. And you step on to the beaten tracks to exploit the poor.

Besides, Madam Speaker, there is another point I insist on mentioning. The other day, when I listened to the speech of the minister, I was amazed to see how it is possible to sugar the pill, to disguise a situation, to even hide the truth, and seriously hope the people will still believe for some time that the Liberal moon is made of green cheese.

Indeed, when the government is cutting down benefits, increasing premiums, terminating unemployment coverage for persons aged 65 or over, and extending the waiting period in some instances, the minister introduces that very bill in the House, arguing that it is meant to contribute to the realization of one of the basic objectives of the social security study, and to do away with some of the unfairness and complications it gives rise to. Where are the complications the UIC gives rise to, when it increases from three to six weeks the waiting period for a person who leaves his employment because he is underpaid and life becomes impossible for him, because his employer takes advantage of him, and so on. I could mention one thousand and one instances in my constituency, especially in footwear manufacturing and fashion businesses, where employees are trained from scratch.

They start training employees to make them profitable when they do piece work, because they are not profitable if they are paid a salary. They try to ruin them by having them do piece work and therefore be profitable. If the girl is not healthy enough to carry the burden, Madam Speaker, she has to leave. Well, they say, you can no longer do your work because your health is not good, so you will be punished: No unemployment insurance benefits for six weeks, and after that you will go from door to door to try and get a job, and earn a living for your family. They think that is intelligent.

To me, it is about the same kind of logic as you can see in the papers respecting the recent visit of President Sadat in the United States. The Egyptian president wants to purchase American arms to maintain peace in the Middle East. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Sadat and our Minister of Manpower and Immigration would get along very well since they seem to be on the same wavelength and seem to make the same kind of reasoning. One of them purchases arms to make peace—I am talking of Sadat, the intelligent Mr. Sadat—and the other strips the unemployed to give them social security and eliminate inequities. That is very intelligent!

With such a negative bill, the minister should immediately introduce compensation measures to balance forces though I very much doubt that he will do so. My Social Credit colleagues who spoke before me made several very valid proposals and even provided accurate figures and data in support of the these proposals. For my part, I would like to conclude by emphasizing two points which should be applied as soon as possible to support the economy and the labour market.

First of all, the government should immediately establish a special program to systematically create productive employment. For instance, instead of providing $150 million for LIP projects which last only six months, it should allocate half of this to social welfare and to support all types of poor people with productive employment projects.

Such action would reasonably stimulate the economy while lowering the unemployment rate, which would reduce proportionately the difficulties of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and allow the maintenance of normal benefits and certain facilities.

On the other hand, it is more than time to establish a true guaranteed minimum income system which would support the poorest or those who have temporary employment problems and, at the same time, progressively reduce to a certain extent the responsibilities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In my opinion, they have their hands full. They cannot even advise the unemployed about the law.

I think that this method is much more practical that that proposed in the bill we are now discussing. In practice, Bill C-69 increases the number of bureaucrats, worsens the complexities already existing in the present legislation, cuts or lowers benefits to claimants and raises premiums.

In conclusion, one can say that this legislation does not benefit anybody, except the government which considers Bill C-69 a governmental self-financing mechanism operated by the unemployed.

[English]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to say a few words on the important subject of unemployment insurance and the amendments proposed in Bill C-69.

For three years the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) has resisted attempts, both within parliament and outside parliament, to weaken the rights of the unemployed in Canada. In my opinion he has been right in his resistance and his critics have been shamefully wrong. Over the past three years we have been deluged with half truths, misinformation, and contradiction.

Only this afternoon we listened to the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) suggest that older people who have never collected unemployment insurance should get some kind of claim when they retire. This seems to me to be a view difficult to sustain bearing in mind the fact that many members of his party believe the scheme should be operated on an actuarial basis.

I am afraid the contradictions which emerge from the opposition on this subject of unemployment insurance defy imagination. If one had the time and inclination to go back over the past three years and examine the speeches and comments made by members of the official opposition on this question, one would be here for a long time listing in a column on the left the names of those who are advocating something, and in a column on the right, those who say exactly the opposite. For three years we have been listening to Conservative arguments which would have been appropriate and which, I am sure, were used to defend things like child labour in England in the 19th century.

To hear the kind of argument used the other day by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) to the effect that industries in his area have to compete not only with the labour market but with the unemployment insurance fund, and that this is a bad thing, shocks me. It shocks me he should suggest such a thing—that people in his area should work for wages which are as low as the kind of payments made by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. As far as I am concerned, industry in his area should have to pay decent wages—wages on which people can live.

I am tired of hearing unemployment insurance whipped as an excuse for paying low wages, and that really is the sense of the arguments we have heard in the last three years—that it is a disincentive to work if you are not going to be paid decent wages. I accept that kind of disincentive. For the information of members who are of that persuasion I might point out that unemployment insurance is one of the important mechanisms at the disposal of government to raise the minimum wage. After all, as we all know, minimum wages are generally under provincial jurisdiction. One of the things the federal government can do is raise the level of unemployment insurance payments and this, of course, obliges people to pay higher wages in a particular area, and that is a proper thing to do.

There is nothing wrong in telling an employer that if he cannot afford to pay decent wages he should not be in business. That is a fact. One should not excuse one's self by blaming his troubles on unemployment insurance while he soaks up his two or three weeks' winter sunshine in Floriday, Jamaica, Hawaii or wherever he goes, where he talks about his workers back home whom he is paying insufficient wages. I have heard that many times. I do not accept that argument.

The average weekly unemployment payment in Canada in July—and I am sure all members are aware of this—was $82.77 a week. Someone might claim that is a disincentive to work. I just have to laugh.

Among the attempts to dilute the unemployment insurance plan, as I read through last week's Hansard, are repeated references to the work ethic. My good friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), referred to it in his speech. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and several others had something to say about the work ethic.

It is positively peculiar to me the way people throw around the expression "the work ethic". Evidently if one works long hours for low wages he has a good work ethic. However, if a person resists and says, "Just a minute; I would like to be paid reasonably well so I can live, or I will go home", then he has a bad work ethic. I am afraid I do not buy that. That is one of the old chestnuts that has been used since 1850.

Personally I have faith in Canadians. Most Canadians do want to work but they want to receive some of the great incentive, money. I know what I am talking about. During the 1950's I worked in the mines. I also spent some years working in the various camps across Canada. I remember Moak Lake, Manitoba in 1956. I was among the first people to sink a shaft at a settlement which I believe now elects a member of parliament. There were 32 of us in the bush. We worked 12 hours a day, 7 days a week, for a period of six months without a day off. Why did we do this? Because we were paid money. The best incentive is money.

I was brought up in the retail business which is notorious for low wages. It is the worst paying industry in the country. When I was going to school I would go out to the camps in the summer and then, when I left school at age 16, I started going around to the various camps to make some money. I worked long hours in the bush in order to pay for my various activities.

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Stollery: Before I came to parliament I worked 12 to 14 hours a day in Toronto in the cab business. I did this for five years before I came to Ottawa. I scraped the streets, like everybody who works at night in Toronto, for every dime. When people such as members opposite speak to me about the work ethic this makes me laugh. I have seen too many people in my day abused by such a cheap cliché as "he does not understand the work ethic". Well, I have been around enough and I am old enough to know a lot of baloney when I hear it.

Decent unemployment insurance is expensive in a time of high unemployment. Of course it is expensive in a time of high unemployment. If it is doing its job of cushioning those who are out of work it must be expensive. In his remarks last Monday the hon. member for Hamilton West noted that the United States, with a population ten times that of Canada, spent $4 billion on unemployment insurance in 1973. He went on to say that we in Canada will spend approximately the same amount in that area in 1975.

Mr. Alexander: There is something wrong somewhere.

[Mr. Stollery.]

Mr. Stollery: What is wrong is that in the United States there is a lousy unemployment insurance program. Everybody knows that. In Detroit where there is high unemployment in the automotive industry anyone who can read the newspaper knows the unions are very concerned about the fact that they do not have the kind of unemployment insurance program we enjoy in Canada. Our program is better than theirs.

Canada is an advanced country in the field of unemployment insurance, and the United States is not. With the current recession that is taking place in that country they are very concerned about this.

I would like to point out to hon. members that money spent on unemployment insurance—and people seem to be very concerned about the money spent—does not disappear like smoke. It goes into the local economies. Not only does it put bread on the table but in fact in some of the local communities in parts of Canada which have a consistently high rate of unemployment of 20 per cent or 25 per cent having this kind of money going into their economies is a good thing. I find it difficult to understand a party, some of whose members I regret to say come from those areas of high unemployment, that would say we are spending too much money in those economies. I would like to see those people go back home and tell their people that we are spending too much money in their local economies.

I am against anyone cheating in respect of the unemployment insurance fund, committing fraud, and so on. No sensible person would be in favour of this, and of course it must be stopped wherever possible. Of course the unemployment insurance program should not be abused. It must be reformed and brought up to date, but I want to say I really, genuinely support the minister in his resistance to those who would dilute the unemployment insurance program.

I think it should be made clear to the Canadian working people that there are people in parliament who really would dilute the unemployment insurance program so that it would bear a pale resemblance to what we have today, and would in fact put the clock back. I think the people of Canada should be told that because it is true.

There is a problem in respect of people who cheat the unemployment insurance program, but I am not convinced there is a great number involved. Since the changes made about 18 months ago the regulations in respect of unemployment insurance have been as tight as I would like to see them. I wonder whether in some areas perhaps they are not too tight.

I wish to take this opportunity to explain that there are people who really do not believe there should be proper support for working Canadian men and women who, for reasons beyond their control, find themselves without a decent job. I think that is very important. If people are ripping off the unemployment insurance fund not only is this bad because of the manner in which they are taking the money, but it is particularly bad because it gives the unemployment insurance program a bad name. I do not like that because, as I said, I think unemployment insurance is a very good program.

I have a particular proposal to make regarding sickness benefits under the unemployment insurance program. I do not think the difference between a major attachment period and a minor attachment period is made clear enough to the working person, and I think there is entirely too much jargon in this business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stollery: I myself find it difficult to understand sometimes; I have to refresh my mind continually, and I am sure other hon. members have the same problem. I hope that something can be done to explain this program to the people. I notice there are two kinds of attachment period. My disagreement with this program is that very few people know that during the major contribution period if you become sick, even if you have been collecting sickness benefits for 10 or 15 weeks you are not eligible for unemployment insurance after the fifteenth week. I find it reprehensible that most people do not know that at the end of 15 weeks their sickness benefits cease and, if a person happens to be sick in the sixteenth week, he is not eligible for unemployment insurance. I certainly did not know that and I am sure most Canadians do not realize it.

We all have our favourite unemployment insurance case, and although the Unemployment Insurance Commission in my area does a fair job I also have my horror case, that of a man about 65 years of age, a leather worker who was laid off. He was collecting his unemployment insurance and in the twentieth week he was taken seriously ill, went to hospital and had one lung removed. Naturally he was not reporting to the unemployment insurance office as being available for work.

When he came out of the hospital some time after he had collected his payments and cashed them—I do not think he quite realized what he was doing—he was presented with a bill for $450 to be paid back to unemployment insurance. I think that is dreadful and it is something which should be changed. We have made amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act and it is time we took a look at this byzantine business of sickness benefits because it is not satisfactory. I am sure I am not the only member with cases of people who have been sick and genuinely did not realize they were doing something wrong because they thought they were entitled to unemployment insurance.

When the plan was first announced, sickness benefits were announced with the plan. Why would anybody think he was not entitled to collect unemployment insurance? I personally cannot imagine why. Whenever I see one of these cases it infuriates me, particularly when almost every one of them must return the payment, whether it is $300, $400, or $500. Usually they do not have money and they have to make payments of $4 or $5 a week for the next five years. I think it is an inequity which should be repaired. Something should be done about it.

I see the minister in the House tonight. I merely wanted to use this opportunity to point out to him, first, that people do not understand the difference between a major and minor contribution period—nobody except an actuary understands it, and most of us are not in the insurance business—and second, that there is no consistency in the program when people who are unemployed become sick and suddenly are cut off unemployment insurance, and wind up owing the government money at a time when they can least afford it.

I would like to make one more point to those who talk about the cost of unemployment insurance. As the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) repeatedly said during the negotiations which have been going on ad nauseam over the last three years, if we want to cut the cost of unemployment insurance the best way is to reduce the number of people who are unemployed.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the floor for just one minute before ten o'clock because I want to say to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), who spoke a moment ago, that for a moment he sounded like the only man who had ever worked for a living. I would never denigrate any other member with regard to his work experience or any other personal effort he might have made, but it has been my experience that those who work hardest talk about it the least. May I call it ten o'clock, Madam Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—PROPOSED REDUCTION OF STAFF—EFFECT ON IMPLEMENTATION OF BILINGUALISM PROGRAM

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on October 14, 1975, as recorded at page 8103 of Hansard of that day, I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) whether, as a result of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) trip to Damascus on Thanksgiving evening when he ate crow, feathers and all, instead of turkey, the government intended its restraint program to mean and include that it was not proceeding with phase II of the implementation of bilingualism in the public service of Canada.

The minister indicated it meant no such thing, that restraint would not stand in the way of phase II dealing with units working in French and it would be proceeding full speed ahead. If that was not enough, he said that I supported phase II as envisaged by the government. This is just patent nonsense. Phase II deals with units working in French. The government proposes a quota system, 10 per cent of supervisory positions for some departments, 20 per cent for others.

There is no provision in the resolution of June, 1973, dealing with quotas. The words used in that declaration are "where practical", not a quota system. The resolution says that the staff associations would be consulted. No only were they not consulted, their walkout of the National Joint Council in protest of the arrangement proposed indicated they were hoodwinked, and the government had better come clean with them.

There is a very suspicious press release which alludes to some kind of detente within the National Joint Council. It came out on the weekend, with no telephone number for verification or questions. The question I have is who authorized it, who was there, and what does it mean? This question has affected others.

Geoffrey Johnson writing in the Citizen last week said that:

● (2200)

—as a result of receiving certain documents concerning the language program and the facts are simply that beneath the surface of that "agreement", announced last Monday by the public service's National Joint Council on Bilingualism, things are far from well.

The staff side of the council, in fact, is said to be having second thoughts about the whole thing now that the fine print has yielded information on what lies in store for the Anglophone who wants to remain in his job even when it becomes part of a unit working in French.

Treasury Board had backed down to a certain extent by agreeing to provide French-language training for those Anglophones affected.

Now the staff side has discovered to its dismay that these employees will have no chance whatsoever of promotion because they will never qualify linguistically for French-essential positions. Their choice will be to stay put—or get out.

Apparently things have ground to a halt on that point. It's an embarrassing situation for Claude Edwards, president of the Public Service Alliance, and Des Davidge, vice-chairman of the staff side of the council. They were the ones who gave their blessing to the revised agreement on the weekend—without reaching the agreement.

In other words, it seems that despite the statements to the press by the President of the Treasury Board, and despite the soothing syrup of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Francis) there are grave suspicions, and indeed reports that the situation remains exactly the same today as it did on September 3, 1975, when I revealed the secret documents. I think it is just about time the government came clean.

I have asked the minister for a statement inside the House; he has not given it. He has made some references outside the House, but I suggest that his references are double talk, and it is about time we had the straight goods on this program.

The other matter is the question of merit. I want to say that this policy is about as far removed from merit as the President of the Treasury Board is removed from Thomas D'Arcy McGee.

Phase II is not the program I voted for in June of 1973, and the fact that it is going ahead is the best indication I know of that the restraint program of the government in terms of government spending is about as genuine as a three dollar bill. No one has to prove his allegiance to the principles of the Official Languages Act by refraining from pointing out the inequities and the stupidities in their implementation. Phase II is wrong in principle, it is demoralizing, divisive, discriminatory, and it is contrary to the provisions of the statute which was meant to promote unity in the public service, and unity in this country.

I think it is about time we heard the truth about this program. This program was brought forth by the President of the Treasury Board, in the month of August, not by accident, but because the House was not sitting. There has been no statement made about it in the House, merely statements outside, and we have heard nothing but the empty statements of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) a few days ago. There has been a disturbing lack of candor about it which leads me to say that the public service of this country deserves better treatment.

I released those documents after some heart searching, and it is interesting to note that when I released them the President of the Treasury Board said they were nothing. In fact he described them as garbage, but all the while since that time the same President of the Treasury Board and others in the public service have been discussing that which was supposed to be nothing and which was described as garbage.

I think the parliamentary secretary had better come clean tonight. What is his position? What is the position of the Government of Canada with respect to this matter? Has phase II stopped? Is phase II being changed? If so, to what extent? How is the discrimination being taken out of it? Those are the questions being asked by the public service of this country and, as I said earlier, I believe that the public service of this country deserves some candor in terms of this very important program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, at present implementation of all elements of Part II of the official languages program is under renewed discussion with heads of bargaining agents. I say renewed because there was a breakdown in the consultation process, to which the hon. member referred. I believe that the frank and open discussions which have already taken place, and those continuing now, will result in the resolution of many, hopefully all, of the concerns of the bargaining agents. These discussions, as I said, are taking place on a continuing basis.

As the implementation of phase II is presently the subject of discussion with the National-Joint Council, I do not want to prejudge the outcome of these discussions. Without question, the hon. member raised a number of important points. I merely wish to emphasize that the position of the government is that of complete equality for the two official languages. This policy will be implemented in connection with the proposals. Any aspects which involve discrimination between language groups, and access to units working in French, will be eliminated. The opportunities for promotion within those units will be there to those who meet proficiency requirements, no matter what is their mother tongue.

POST OFFICE—PROPOSAL TO ALLOW PRIVATE CARRIERS TO DELIVER MAIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I certainly hope I shall receive a better answer than that given to the previous hon. member.

On October 23 I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) to indicate, as recorded on page 8477 of Hansard:

... if he has any plans to allow private carriers to deliver first class mail, any other sort of mail or parcels during the Post Office strike, and would he consider initiating discussions with the Air Industries Association and the Canadian Truckers Association, to assure that the fullest possible use is made of alternative delivery services in the absence of regular postal service.

I pointed out to the minister that I had spoken with these groups earlier that day and that they would be willing to sit down with the hon. gentleman to discuss alternate ways of delivering mail. To this the Postmaster General replied, in part:

I am aware of the representations but I think it is a little premature to be encouraging our competition.

This thinking on the part of the Postmaster General, that private couriers are competition, must be stopped. To make my position perfectly clear, let me say that I am waiting for the Postmaster General to begin consultations with the private sector on rates and sorting problems, with a view to transferring as much mail delivery as possible to trucking and airline firms and private couriers.

I have raised this subject previously in the House, but the answers were entirely unsatisfactory. One of the reasons given for refusal was that private carriers would not deliver mail or parcels to remote areas. I point out that regional air carriers and trucking companies deliver merchandise to remote areas of Canada. So why could they not deliver mail as well? One of the answers I received earlier was that a private mail carrier would not deliver a letter to the north pole. That is an absolutely ridiculous answer. Our remote cities, towns, and villages all need mail service; the odd remote area might suffer a little. But we cannot use that as an excuse for not doing something to ensure proper mail delivery in Canada.

As announced today, Montreal postal workers are forming a courier delivery service. I suggest that they should also negotiate with the trucking and airline associations to work out long-range plans for postal delivery. I am sure they would be much happier working for a private concern instead of being out on strike all the time, which is what happens to those working for our postal service in Canada.

The direct mail industry is considering its own mail delivery service, as it has been crippled 38 times in past few years owing to post office strikes. Canada's direct mail and mail order industry is considering setting up its own delivery service for second and third class mail. A similar service in the United States pays better wages than the post office, is cheaper, and is more efficient, they say. The U.S. service, United Parcel Service, tried to enter Canada in recent months but its application to the Foreign Investment Review Agency to buy two Canadian delivery services was rejected. That is most unfortunate. I suggest to the unions that they should also consider consulting with private carriers. If they could make higher wages and not be out on strike all the time, everybody would benefit.

Recently the Postmaster General stated that Canada's Post Office must regain the confidence of the public, provide better facilities for its employees, and go after the 3,000 jobs that were lost because of work stoppages and strikes by postal workers. That statement was made in August. If there were 3,000 jobs lost last August, heaven only knows how many jobs have been lost with this latest strike.

Businesses large and small cannot go on year after year waiting for the Postmaster General to provide better service. The business that has been lost to the private couriers will never be regained by the post office, so let us negotiate to transfer the remaining delivery to the private sector. The government has a responsibility to provide guaranteed postal delivery for Canadians.

Here is an example of what is happening to some Canadians firms. Strikes are crippling mail order firms. A Cornwall mail order company may be forced to lay off 300 employees as a result of strikes by inside postal workers. Jack MacDonald, president of Sovereign Seat Covers Manufacturing Limited, said that the company, which relies totally on mail orders, has been hit hard by the postal strike. He said, and I quote:

Our situation would be that as soon as our . . . 48-hour work backlog is cleaned up we will have about 300 employees with nothing to do.

That is only one firm. There are dozens of others across the country that are faced with the same situation. This is what the latest strike is doing to postal business in the United States. I quote:

Montrealers frustrated at the Canadian postal strike are driving to U.S. border points to drop off correspondence for the United States and other foreign destinations. This northern New York city, 70 miles south of Montreal, has developed a booming postal business since the strike began, giving extra revenue to the U.S. Treasury and overtime work to postal employees. Last Thursday, 184,000 pieces of mail were processed in the Plattsburgh post office, an increase of about 16,000 compared with the previous Thursday, said city postmaster Rolland Hewitt.

That mail should be hosted in this country. That is why I suggest that the Postmaster General start immediate negotiations with the private sector to keep these 184,000 pieces of mail in Canada rather than give the revenue to American firms.

What we are faced with today is a number of ad hoc schemes to deliver mail. A concerned gentleman in Victoria has formed a postal delivery service. He has some striking post office workers helping him deliver the mail. It is absolutely ridiculous for a country the size of Canada to be faced with this sort of situation. Many hon. members will have seen the headline: "Halifax Posties Set Up Delivery System". They are trying to do something there.

The Postmaster General stated recently that illegal work stoppages by postal employees posed a threat to their job security by encouraging private carriers to compete with the government. Private carriers, he said, would get a toe hold only because of labour unrest and the uncertainty of moving the mail.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) for his suggestion. There is no doubt that a long postal strike would be most disruptive to the Canadian people generally, to the Canadian economy, and to businesses both large and small. As the hon. member has indicated, a strike even of the present duration has taken its toll. Should it last much longer, alternate means will certainly be forthcoming to deal with essential mail.

However, it should be remembered that members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are exercising their democratic right in walking off their jobs, and in a democratic society such as ours we must be ready to accept the hardships and inconveniences brought about by this exercise of the democratic process. At this moment the government is hopeful of an early settlement to the strike. The difficulties we are facing with the Canadian postal workers are difficulties which have been experienced over a long period and they have been the cause of many walk-outs. It is hoped that the successful completion of these negotiations, carefully put, together will create a better relationship and that walk-outs of the kind we have known will cease.

As of 6.30 this evening agreement had been reached on all but two of the outstanding issues—pay, and the employment of casuals. It is hoped that within a short period agreement will be reached and that the development of alternative means of delivering mail will, consequently, not be required.

BROADCASTING—ACTIONS OF UNITED STATES TELEVISION STATIONS IN OBTAINING CANADIAN ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I raised a question with the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) concerning a practice which has been going on since last spring, namely, the dumping of advertising space by United States border television stations on the Canadian market.

Before the House is Bill C-58, a belated recognition by the Liberal government of the crisis in the Canadian communications industry—magazines and television. The purpose of that bill is to help the Canadian magazine and television industries by making amendments to the Income Tax Act so that we may enhance our own national identity and have Canadians interpret the events of the world to other Canadians rather than relying on foreign magazines and news sources. What we have experienced, unfortunately, is delay in the passage of this bill mainly due to a filibuster mounted by the Conservative party.

In the intervening period, many United States border television stations are adopting punitive and retaliatory measures consequent upon the introduction of this bill although it has yet to be passed and made law. Specifically what they are doing is dumping advertising slots on Canadian advertisers only. They are dumping advertising space at cut rates to under sell Canadian stations and force them into a loss position. This practice can only be viewed as punitive and retaliatory. It particularly hurts the smaller independent stations along our border.

For example, in the fall of 1974 a Buffalo television station was charging between $60 and $80 for a rating point—that is the terminology used in selling advertising. By the spring of 1975 the same station was charging only $22 per rating point on the Canadian side only. This fall the rate has risen to $30, still approximately half the normal advertising rate charged by the station to its American customers, and about half the rate in Canada. Many Canadian stations barely get by when they sell these rating points at between $40 and $45. For example, City TV in Toronto has estimated that in one eight week period alone it lost over $200,000 in advertising contracts because of this practice on the part of U.S. border stations.

We also find dumping taking place on the west side of Canada. There is a certain station, KVOS, in Bellingham, Washington, which has been set up purely to take advantage of Canadian business—there is not enough American business in this area to make its operation viable otherwise. Last June this station sold 104-week contracts at a rating point of $30, with a $600 a month minimum contract. In addition, KVOS has given Canadian advertisers a guarantee that when the income tax provisions of Bill C-58 come into effect those advertisers will be offered a rate cut by a further 50 per cent.

It has been estimated that, in 12 deals sold by that one station alone in Washington in a period of one week, they were able to capture contracts from Canadian advertisers amounting to some $4 million. That is $4 million worth of Canadian advertising revenue for one station alone, money that went to the United States rather than remain in Canada to help support Canadian television stations.

The question may be raised: how can these American stations afford such cut rate prices for advertising? The reason is that the United States stations along the border make more than an adequate profit on the United States market alone. For example, the Buffalo station has a 150 per cent return on equity investment, not counting its Canadian business. Therefore any advertising sold in the Canadian market is pure gravy. It is surplus to the actual needs of any American television station.

This problem was brought to the attention of the then minister of finance last spring, the minister of communications, and the chairman of the CRTC during the summer. They were aware of the problem, but nothing to date has been done. Since the effect of the tax provisions in Bill C-58 is to double the cost of advertising spots placed by Canadian advertisers on United States television, all a U.S. television station has to do to circumvent the legislation is to cut its rates to advertisers on the Canadian side by 51 per cent or more. Therefore the whole intent of the legislation will be negated.

My question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Miss Campbell) is: will the government be taking measures to overcome this obvious weakness in Bill C-58? Will the minister bring forward amendments to plug the loopholes in this legislation? Specifically I suggest a double disallowance feature, that is to say, to disallow as a normal business expense for tax purposes twice the value of advertising spots on United States television stations. That would get around the effect of their cutting their rates.

I also want to know whether the minister will take immediate steps under the anti-dumping legislation via order in council to stop this undercutting of revenue for Canadian stations. In conclusion I want to make the point that, unless action is taken now, this punitive dumping tactic of American television stations will undermine the financial viability of many Canadian television stations and their ability to produce Canadian programs.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fleming) I would like to reaffirm that the government introduced in Bill C-58 an amendment to the Income Tax Act which would no longer allow deductions against income for advertising time on a non-Canadian station for advertisements directed primarily to a Canadian market. The purpose of the amendment is to constrain the significant outflow, estimated at some $20 million a year, by Canadian firms purchasing advertisement time on United States border stations.

The government is aware of possible alternatives which United States border stations might offer to Canadian advertisers as an incentive to maintain their business. As the legislation has yet to be passed, it is much too early to judge the effects of Bill C-58.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) stated in the House this afternoon that it is considered that the remedy to the situation alluded to by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) lies in a speedy passage of Bill C-58. It should also be remembered that U.S. border stations are not exporting goods but providing services, and that therefore it would seem that the anti-dumping act would not apply as it is now written.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Noting that more than a year has passed since the Panarctic airplane crash, and in view of the jury decision that nothing can be finally solved until a public inquiry has been established, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government immediately call a public inquiry into this disaster.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—POSSIBILITY OF REPATRIATION OF SPENT FUEL AND INSPECTION BY CANADIANS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs relating to the agreement to sell a nuclear reactor to the Republic of South Korea. Will the minister, having refused to table the treaty or agreement in advance of committing Canada to the sale and to the agreement, now indicate whether Canada is insisting upon repatriation of all spent fuel in connection with this reactor, or is insisting on inspection in connection with these facilities in South Korea by Canadians in that country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet signed a nuclear co-operation agreement with the Republic of Korea. We are well on the way to entering into an agreement on nuclear co-operation but we are not insisting on the repatriation of the spent fuel because of the cost and its environmental implications to Canada, and mainly because such repatriation would not contribute significantly to safeguards in the situation we are seeking.

On the final point, I believe I am right in saying that the international agency will conduct inspections in the normal course, and that we will be considering our own inspections in respect of those aspects that are uncovered by the International Atomic Energy Agency service.

AGREEMENT AMONG SUPPLIERS OF NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY ON SAFEGUARDS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had the impression a number of months ago that some spokesman on behalf of the government told us that spent fuel would be repatriated. This seems like a reversal and a weakening of Canada's position. However, in connection with the discussions going on among the supplier nations, and those are the nations that supply nuclear technology and facilities, I understand there is some kind of an agreement on common safeguards that is almost within reach. Is Canada proposing that there be IAEA inspection insisted upon by all supplier nations of not only nuclear reactors but, particularly, reprocessing facilities as well as the handling and the disposal of spent fuel?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the meeting of the suppliers Canada is taking, and I am wondering how to put this without seeming that we are putting ourselves in a special position, an extreme position in favour of a full scope of safeguards. Suppliers ought to agree, if possible, to the insistence upon the total safeguarding of all facilities within a country to which they will direct assistance, material or technology, but the suppliers to my knowledge have not yet reached any conclusions. The matter is still under consideration among the suppliers, but Canada's position certainly is the one I have indicated.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SALE OF NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY WITHOUT EVERY SAFEGUARD POSSIBLE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): On a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, does the minister think it is appropriate for Canada to supply a nuclear reactor and nuclear fuel to a country without these general safeguards of an IAEA inspection of reactors, spent fuel and, particularly, processing facilities, in view of the fact that spent fuel developed from a Canadian reactor might very well be used in some uninspected reprocessing facility for the development of a very dangerous substance? I ask the minister whether Canada should proceed in those circumstances, and also what Canada is proposing to other nations to assist them by way of sanctions to countries which receive these nuclear facilities and do not comply with the common safeguards.

● (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that it would not be appropriate for Canada to make supplies available in the circumstances he has mentioned. That is why we are, in reaching bilateral agreements with for example Argentina and the Republic of South Korea, insisting upon full safeguards with regard to inspection and reprocessing, for example, of spent fuel. We are insisting upon a Canadian hold on the uses to which spent fuel can be put and we are certainly insisting upon full inspection mainly through the International Energy Agency and in some cases it may be necessary for Canada to provide a supplementary inspection service.

So we are fully in support and are developing these inspection coverages. With regard to the final point on the sanctions, I am not aware that Canada at the present time is making any special proposals for sanctions except in the abrogation of any such bilateral or multilateral agreement. Of course, it would be open to supplier countries to cease making supplies available or to cut off all forms of nuclear co-operation which is what we have done with India but which is not fully effective.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LIKELIHOOD OF UNITED STATES CONTINUING TO ADVOCATE STRONG CONVENTIONAL FORCES

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. First, may I express my regrets at the disappearance of Dr. Schlesinger and his fine mind from the international scene at this critical time. Has the minister contacted his new opposite number in Washington, Mr. Rumsfeld, to determine if Mr. Rumsfeld intends to continue Dr. Schlesinger's policy of strong conventional forces to lessen the likelihood of an act of aggression turning into a nuclear holocaust.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my earphone was not working to receive the question and I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to repeat it.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the question. Has the minister contacted his new opposite number in Washington, Mr. Rumsfeld, to determine if Mr. Rumsfeld intends to continue Dr. Schlesinger's policy of strong conventional forces to lessen the likelihood of an act of aggression turning into a nuclear holocaust?

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker. I have not contacted Mr. Rumsfeld but I have met him and talked with him at NATO meetings. I am certain he will carry forward the policy of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: One supplementary by the hon. member for Victoria.

EFFECT OF DEPARTURE OF DR. SCHLESINGER ON CANADIAN COMMITMENT TO NATO

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, as Dr. Schlesinger was a proponent of strong conventional forces as an alternative to nuclear retaliation, can the minister assure the House and the country that Dr. Schlesinger's departure will not change the Canadian Government's commitment to maintain our NATO forces in Europe at least at their present levels and that Canada will not revert to the policy of nuclear weapons as the only defence.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think that the policy of the United States secretary of defence, in which we believe, is that the central objective is to achieve international stability and that we achieve that stability by means of a balance of military forces and that we achieve that balance in the three areas of strategic nuclear, theatre nuclear and conventional weapons. We believe that there is a growing requirement for a balance of military forces at the conventional level. That is the policy that has been expressed by the U.S. defence department which is endorsed in statements that I have made. I would like to confirm our belief in a balance of military force at the conventional level as a means of achieving international stability.

NATURE OF AGREEMENT WITH FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS TO SUPPLY MORTGAGE MONEY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs arising out of his housing program announced yesterday. The minister said at the time that the government expects the private financial institutions to put up an additional $750 million for housing. I should like to ask the minister, since he ruled out mandatory legislation in the field at this point, what form of commitments he has obtained from the financial institutions, are they verbal or written commitments and do they vary in terms of percentages from one bank as opposed to another? In short, would he tell the House what kind of agreement he has with the financial institutions?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not have an agreement with or commitment from financial institutions. I spoke with them and indicated an increase. I spoke to some of them this morning and they are receptive. They must be receptive to our objectives or else we will legislate, and they recognize that. They are prepared to co-operate in every way. In this way we will achieve the objectives we set for ourselves. Indeed, for the past month of October our housing starts have reached 275,900 at a seasonally adjusted rate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: —which is an increase of over 100,000 from the same month last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Tell us about AHOP now.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO GET SPECIFIC COMMITMENTS FROM FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS SUPPLYING MORTGAGE MONEY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister is obviously happy that one month out of ten he has been on target. That provides a lot of joy for him. In view of the fact that the success of his housing program in increasing the supply is absolutely dependent upon the co-operation of the financial institutions, and considering that past commitments to the minister when he said he was going to get $1 billion or so last spring from them, have not been complied with, I should like to ask the minister why he did not follow the example set at the time the auto pact came in in 1965. At that time the government approached the auto industry requesting specific commitments for the next two or three years and they received signed letters of agreement from each of the firms concerned. Why did the minister not think that it was essential to follow that example with the banks, for example, in the area of housing?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Because it is traditional, when the government indicates its wishes to the lending institutions, for them to follow suit. I have no doubt this will be the case now. I have communicated with them before. We have had to give them an indication of the specific amount we wanted. I have no fears it will be forthcoming without disturbing the normal capital markets, which is an important part of the approach we are taking.

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT INCREASE AMOUNT OF MORTGAGE MONEY AVAILABLE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I do not know how the minister will get them to change and invest in a way in which they were not going to invest without changing the normal pattern of investment. However, I leave that with him. I should like to ask the minister, in view of the fact that even if they provide the money, which they never did before, along the lines he is requesting, which will only provide an additional 20,000 or 25,000 units, if he would assure the House that when the CMHC budget is brought in for the next year it will have built into it a substantial increase from the government side in terms of expenditures to increase the supply of housing.

● (1430)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): First I will deal with another point the hon. member raised: that we were only on target one month. That is not the case, and I would be pleased to bet him, as I did the Alberta minister of housing yesterday, $10 against a barrel of Alberta oil that we will meet our target of this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: And if the price of oil goes up, I will raise my $10.

The hon. member suggested changing the pattern of investment, but it is the amount within that pattern we are concerned about. We do not care terribly much how it comes, just as long as we get that amount of money. I think the hon. member may have missed the statement in the announcement yesterday that the banks are also required to restrict their high ratio loans, their low down payment loans, and increase those to lower cost housing. We will have a great deal more housing for the same amount of money. In addition, the resources of the government will be strengthened in the areas of non-profit and co-operative or public housing, and for those people in need whom governments should and do look after in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES—RECOURSE TO BANK OF CANADA FOR PUBLIC FINANCING

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Is he willing to use the authority entrusted to him by Parliament to authorize a cut in interest rates and so enable the Canadian economy to stand up to the competition on the domestic and international markets?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, unless I am mistaken, the hon. member is asking me to use the authority I hold from Parliament to reduce interest rates. I must point out that I have no such authority, either on the acts governing our banks or on that governing the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse on a supplementary.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, given the admission of the Minister of Finance that he has no authority to dictate interest rates to financial institutions, thus implying that chartered banks do have that authority, may I ask the minister if at least he would be prepared to suggest to his cabinet colleagues greater use of the Bank of Canada—which is the bank of the Canadian people for public financing—to reduce the inflationary charge of interest rates burdening Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I find that many of my colleagues do not accept the concept of the hon. member and his colleagues on the role of the Bank of Canada. I do not think that I could advocate such a policy among my colleagues.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary question from the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, considering that this is a major issue in this country, that all other aspects of our economic problems lead to this major issue of interest rates, may I ask the minister if he would be willing to introduce legislation in this Parliament, aiming at giving this House, through the Minister of Finance, jurisdiction over all financial matters in our country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I agree this is a major issue. We are in the process of studying the bill on banking with a view to reviewing this Act and we may consider changes in our financial system. It is within this framework that we are prepared to examine the question but not in the way the hon. member has suggested.

AIRPORTS

DORVAL AND MIRABEL—LEASE TO SKY SHOPS—REASON TENDER NOT ACCEPTED WHICH WOULD PROVIDE GREATEST RETURN

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has he yet had an opportunity to study the matter I raised yesterday? Further, with respect to the public property at Montreal international airport No. 2 at Mirabel, which was leased by the government on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport to Sky Shops Export Limited for the operation of a duty free shop, will the minister tell the House why this lease concession was not granted to the tenderer whose offered rental would provide the greatest financial return to Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly double check the latter lease, although I believe I was informed that an analysis of the leases took place and that the proposition which was accepted was indeed likely to earn the greater amount of revenue over the period of time involved.

Mr. Hees: For whom?

Mr. Lang: I have also begun to look into the questions the hon. member raised in the petition he filed, and I am attempting to verify various allegations in the petition, since I was not supplied with any authenticated material.

I have determined that in the early 1970's there were discussions with regard to the renewal of the lease at Dorval because of a desire to provide additional superior facilities for the duty free shop and also to make certain of the time period which would be available for that shop, in view of the expected phasing out of international flights and that as a result of that, discussions about appropriate rental and going to a specific agreed rate rather than tender in view of the short period of time were held.

Mr. MacKay: I appreciate the minister's full answer at this time, but by way of a supplementary question I should like to ask him the following: in view of the fact that the tender of Sky Shops Export Limited will be financially less rewarding and substantially so, to Canada than the bids of at least two other tenderers, will the minister consider advising the House in due course what other criteria had greater influence with the government in the award of the lease concession to Sky Shops Export Limited? These would not be financial considerations because Sky Shops Export Limited was outbid by at least two competitors, in one case on guaranteed minimums to the extent of over $1 million and in the other case the percentages offered by Sky Shops were considerably less attractive than was the case with the other tender.

Mr. Lang: As far as the most recent granting of duty free shop licenses is concerned, I have just said that I will look further into that situation, and there will be ample opportunity for discussion with members of parliament concerning the choice of a particular lease compared with alternatives.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ANTI-INFLATION GUIDELINES WILL BE APPLIED TO BELL CANADA APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Minister of Communications. In view of this week's decision of the Canadian Transport Commission to order a $6.7 million reduction in the rate application of British Columbia Telephone Company so as conform to the government's anti-inflation guidelines, could the minister assure the House that the CTC will follow a similar procedure when dealing with the upcoming application by Bell Canada, which serves millions of consumers in Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government is obviously pleased with what may be the first major example of how these federal guidelines can help Canadian consumers, and I am sure the government will watch with interest when the hearings between the CTC and Bell Canada draw to a conclusion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA—SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT OF THAT COUNTRY MIGHT PROVE UNTRUSTWORTHY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Returning to the subject introduced by the Leader of the Opposition, I wish to ask whether in considering a bilateral nuclear agreement with South Korea Canada examined the reports of Amnesty International, the International Commission of Jurists and the International League for the Rights of Man? They found South Korea to be a repressive, corrupt regime, relying on torture and false confessions for law enforcement, which suggests it would be most unwise for Canada to trust such an administration, especially when it has already purchased a $50 million reprocessing plant from France.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the over-all context of our sale we have considered all the factors mentioned by my hon. friend. As he knows, the Republic of Korea has been a signatory to the NPT, as a result, I hope, of our influence following representations which were made some time ago. We are now hoping to conclude a nuclear co-operation agreement which will cover all the concerns which have been expressed by the Leader of the Opposition.

REASON FOR SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO SOUTH KOREA

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is the reason for selling a nuclear reactor to South Korea? Is it to make money or is it to make a contribution to nuclear energy? If the latter, did CIDA ever recommend a nuclear reactor for export to South Korea as part of our international aid program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been in the business of providing power plants to other countries. In the case of South Korea it is a developing country with a severe shortage of power sources and a very heavy dependence on imported oil which, as in other places, has quadrupled in price. The developmental aspects of this nuclear power program to South Korea are very great indeed. That is one of the reasons why we have proceeded with the sale, in balancing its developmental aspects against other factors which have been used by the questioner.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF STOCK CARS IN WESTERN CANADA—REQUEST FOR EARLY ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Transport about the serious shortage of stock cars in western Canada. In view of an authentic report this morning that CPR can only supply six stock cars west of Moose Jaw to special cattle sales today and tomorrow that involve several thousand heads, and in view of the suggestion that this delay is deliberate in anticipation of the next rate increase on November 14, will the Minister of Transport give immediate attention to some emergency action that would speed up the return of empty stock cars to western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there is no foundation at all for any suggestion of a deliberate delay in the supply of cars. Each year at this time there is a tremendous demand for double and single deck cars for the shipment of livestock. Obviously, the available fleet cannot be great enough to ship all animals in a specific week. I think that should stand to reason. I am sure if there is a small number of cars to the west of Moose Jaw it is because they are to the east of Moose Jaw, having been in the process and still being in the process of moving animals.

Mr. Hargrave: A supplementary; would the minister please investigate and see if that is the case because I am sure it is. Could he do something about it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I could say once and for all that almost any time a member asks me to investigate something I will do so. It can be taken for granted. Unless I say I won't, I will follow that course of action. In view of my experience with this sort of allegation, I started my answer by saying I was quite satisfied this would not be the case.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF HOUSES THAT WILL BE BUILT UNDER AHOP PROGRAM AND COST TO TAXPAYER

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that financial institutions have assured the minister of an increased allocation of mortgage moneys for low and moderately priced homes, how many homes has the minister estimated will be built under the AHOP program and what will be the cost to Canadian taxpayers by reason of the purchasers under the program passing on to the financial institutions the subsidies paid to them?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the last part of the question. Maybe the hon. member understood it himself.

An hon. Member: I doubt it.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I think I had better repeat the question. I am asking how many homes will be built under the AHOP program? How much money will it cost Canadian taxpayers with regard to the subsidies paid when the purchasers pass that subsidy on to the financial institutions?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, no subsidies are passed on to financial institutions under the AHOP program.

EFFECT OF NEW MEASURES ON LAND COSTS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question. Maybe the minister should be made aware that the subsidies that are paid by him to the purchasers are eventually paid to the financial institutions. I would hope that he would get that very simple point. My supplementary question is, in view of the fact that high interest rates and high land costs are the main components of the high cost of housing, what is the minister's forecast on interest rates for the first six months of 1976 and what effect will the measures the minister announced yesterday have on bringing down land costs?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member does not seem to understand that financial institutions get their money from people such as small savers, pension funds and little people who have invested for their pensions. They deserve a return to compensate for inflation just the way anybody else in the New Democratic Party does.

What was the second part of his question?

[Later:]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House for not answering the hon. member for Broadview on the portion of his question referring to land costs. I think it is obvious to anyone who listened to the announcement yesterday that land costs are being dealt with by increasing the subsidies to include water and giving municipalities $1,000 per unit within the guidelines to bring land on stream next year to allow building permits. That, more than anything else, should speed up the process. There is more to be done.

METHOD BY WHICH GOVERNMENT WILL MAKE MORTGAGE MONEY AVAILABLE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

In his statement delivered in the House yesterday, the minister said that his objective was to build more than 200,000 housing units. He added that to improve the liquidity of mortgages as an investment, the government will make the federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation operational by April 1, 1976. Can the minister say by what procedure he expects to find the necessary funds for this purpose, since it is getting very late for the creation of new liquidities and how he intends to proceed so that the construction of houses will begin early in 1976?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Federal Mortgage Exchange Corporation which is commencing operation on April 1, 1976 is a wholesaling instrument. It will not be lending money itself. The mortgage market will continue through the conventional channels. It acts as a residual source for the transfer and exchange of mortgages. There will be substantial government funding directly into the institutions and the rather massive CMHC mortgage portfolio can also be used as a mortgage exchange. It creates greater liquidity and helps make mortgages as an investment far more attractive. By doing so it will help keep the rates down. I hope it will lower rates significantly.

ALLEGED DETERIORATION OF TELEPHONE COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEMS—SUGGESTED DENIAL OF RATE INCREASES PENDING IMPROVEMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Communications. Since the persistence of the postal strike focuses attention on the ability of CNT and Bell Canada to cope with the extra load of telephone communications, it appears that telephone communication to most parts of Canada is deteriorating. Would the minister call for an investigation and make sure these two agencies can cope with normal telephone services and deny them an increase in rates until they can do so?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed out something that could obviously be a serious problem. I will certainly bring it to the attention of the ministry.

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF $750 MILLION BETWEEN FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—RATE OF INCREASE IN INVESTMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Has the minister allotted the requirement for this additional $750 million among the various institutions involved, that is the banks, the trust companies, insurance companies, etc.? If so, could he give us a rough idea of the breakdown of where he expects this $750 million to come from?

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that breakdown specifically now. My officials are meeting with the principal lenders. I am meeting with some of them on Thursday of this week and my officials again on Friday. There does not seem to be any difficulty in arriving at that figure according to the lenders. I think we will get the total amount we need. I am hoping the strength will be such that we can even increase that more than is required and perhaps help people with existing housing as well.

● (1450)

Mr. Darling: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Given that housing costs have been rising and are expected to continue to rise at a rate of at least 10 per cent a year, will the minister agree that, in real terms, what he is aiming for is an increase in real housing investment of closer to 4 per cent than 14 per cent?

Mr. Danson: No, Mr. Speaker. The houses which will be included in this scheme will be lower cost to begin with. I think the hon. member will recognize, as a businessman, that now the industry and labour, everyone involved in the building industry, will be able to set their objectives for a period of four years to become as competitive as possible and thus reduce prices. As any businessman will realize, when you know what your market might be, and it is substantial and sustained, you can build in your economies and costs. Your competitors bring in the economies of prices.

In view of the resignation of the Minister of Communications, Pierre Juneau, has the Prime Minister decided on a replacement for this minister, who it will be and when the announcement of the new appointment will be made in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not decided on the replacement at this time. I am so satisfied with the work of the parliamentary secretary and the acting minister that I feel in no hurry to decide.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It relates to a problem I referred to last week regarding mercury. In view of a recent statement that federal government officials flew three Cree back to Matagami ahead of schedule to prevent a Japanese doctor from examining them for symptoms of Minamata disease and given the fact these patients had mercury blood levels higher than those of 100 Japanese who died and another 800 who were crippled by mercury poisoning at Minamata, Japan, can the minister possibly explain the action taken by these federal officials?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to look into the matter. It is my understanding that it was not officials from my department.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It arises out of the deteriorating situation in Lebanon, which is a mother country to many Canadian citizens. Has the government taken account of this deteriorating situation as it involves those who wish to become Canadians? If so, what special measures are being taken?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have stayed very close to the unfortunate developments in Beirut and Lebanon. In fact, there probably will be a reduction in our number of officers there until the situation clarifies. It is very difficult for some of the people to get into our offices to make application. We are taking certain measures to try to alleviate this by looking at applications in other places, if they can get to offices outside Beirut.

ALLEGATION MEMBER FOR ST. HYACINTHE RECEIVING ADDITION TO SALARY FROM CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question.

Could the minister tell the House whether his department is investigating the situation of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe regarding what might be a breach of bill C-44? The Globe and Mail is crediting this Progressive Conservative member with the admission that he has been receiving special funds from the Progressive Conservative Party over and above his salary as a member of parliament, and this, since 1972.

HOUSING

REASON RENT INCREASES NOT LIMITED TO INCREASES IN COSTS

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In his statement in the House yesterday, the minister said that he had encouraged the provinces to institute rent control based on the government's anti-inflation guidelines; in other words, based on the use of a maximum allowable percentage increase in rents. My question is this. In view of the fact that the same guidelines establish that all other producers may only pass on cost increases as they actually occur, why are landlords being treated differently and being allowed to increase rents up to a certain percentage whether or not their costs have increased?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is actually no firm agreement on this yet. This was discussed at great length with the housing ministers yesterday. Our officials continued the talks well into the evening. We are having further talks. Indeed, the hon. member will understand that the provinces are instituting these guidelines. We are working together to establish parameters which will be relatively consistent across the country, but allow for variations within the provinces. Until I meet with the ministers, which I hope to do in another ten days to two weeks, I do not want to commit ourselves to a position that might be inconsistent with that of some provinces. As the hon. member knows, that is the practice in British Columbia where they had rent controls and allowed a 10.6 per cent increase without appeal. Of course, this is one of the options we will look at.

MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE EXPORTS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the necessity to increase our exports as an anti-inflationary measure, and in view of the impending increase of international prices for metals, has the government decided on the guidelines to the exporting companies to encourage their activities over the next few years in this field?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we now have under consideration the proposal with respect to treating export profits that was referred to in the white paper. I anticipate that a piece of legislation dealing with this matter will come before the House prior to Christmas.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements in the white paper, are the government's thoughts leading toward an export tax or allowing these companies to put these excess revenues into a capital surplus account?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the government's thinking has been running along the latter lines. That is to say the tax will be refundable against certain contingencies, the most important of which will be reinvestment in capital investment in Canada.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Postmaster General to bring the House and the country up to date on the negotiations with the postal workers' union. In view of the great dislocation and inconvenience this strike is causing to the Canadian people, is there any possibility of a settlement being arrived at this week?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the very objective question and the manner in which he placed it. All outstanding issues without exception have now been resolved, other than the monetary issue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: A little thing like that, nothing to it.

Mr. Mackasey: It would be little if I were prepared to give away the treasury. We would have a settlement within five minutes. However, I do not think that would be very responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: All outstanding issues which in the opinion of the union are more important than money have been resolved. The question of automation has been resolved. The question of part-time and casuals has been resolved. The issue of the post office continuing to have the right to use casuals because it is a service industry has been resolved to our satisfaction. What now remains is the monetary settlement on which talks, I am sure, have begun. There are maybe 19 or 20 of these outstanding. They should not require an awful lot of time. Whether the strike will be over shortly or whether it will be lengthy in the final analysis depends on the union that called the strike in the first place.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Since both the Prime Minister and the Acting Prime Minister last week denied the government had any plans to restore postal services while negotiations are going on, and since the Prime Minister is reported to have said in Regina recently that parliament will pass a return-to-work order at an appropriate time, I should like the right hon. gentleman to tell us what is the government's policy on this issue.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member is probably referring to an answer I gave to the question whether, at some time, parliament would be called upon to act. I gave my standard reply—hon. members will be familiar with it—which is that at some time the right of free collective bargaining has to give way to intervention by parliament when we judge that the public disservice caused by a strike outweighs the freedom of the right to strike itself. That is a judgment which the government has made in the past—we have done that a few times in past years. Hopefully, it will not have to make it on this occasion, because of the apparent success of the Postmaster General.

MAINTENANCE OF RIGHT OF CASUAL EMPLOYES NOT TO JOIN UNION

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): My supplementary is to the Postmaster General. Did the minister, in his deliberations with the union, maintain the freedom of Canadian citizens to accept casual employment without joining a union?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): I should like to be very frank with the hon. member on this issue but I think I shall have to ask him to show some patience because, traditionally, terms or conditions affecting a collective agreement arrived at through negotiation are the prerogative of the union to announce to its membership at the time of ratification and I would not wish in any way unintentionally to jeopardize or prejudice this undoubted right of unions.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Friday, October 31, I directed a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) as reported at page 8740 of Hansard. I asked whether he, as the Attorney General of Canada, would intervene in the hearing which is to be held before the Federal Court concerning the chairman of the National Energy Board. The hon. gentleman promised at that time that he would supply the information. I was waiting today for that information. I believe a hearing has been held. I would have thought the minister would have voluntarily supplied information on such an important subject, especially when three applications are now before the National Energy Board in connection with a big Canadian project having to do with energy, one of the factors of which so closely affects the rate of inflation.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Justice appeared at the hearings on Friday last in the Federal Court when the court issued directions and set the matter down for hearing on December 8. I have not answered the hon. member's question yet because he asked in what capacity the Attorney General of Canada would be intervening and I have not yet determined that point. I expect to determine the question this week. I appreciate the importance attached to this question; that is why we are considering very carefully the position the Attorney General will take. I will supply the hon. member with the information for which he is asking once a decision has been taken.

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed, from Monday, November 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, last evening I had time for only a very brief comment before ten o'clock. It appears that views on this particular bill vary considerably and the reasons for opposing it vary considerably. I, personally, take very little pleasure in opposing this piece of legislation. Goodness knows, the act needs amending. Indeed, my main reason for opposing it is that the act needs rewriting from top to bottom. The government is once again tinkering with a piece of legislation which requires major reform.

To look at specifics, the bill claims to eliminate inequities in the existing act. I suggest that the measure before us does nothing of the kind. It does not even remove some of the minor inequities, and for every one that is perhaps eliminated two more are introduced. The bill's complexities are of the same order. According to the material provided by the minister, the bill will extend the period during which eligibility for benefit may be established in respect of persons who have left the labour force for a time for reasons beyond their control, such as disability under workmen's compensation. I am not at all sure that the provisions in the legislation will do anything to deal with some of the problems I have encountered. I am thinking in particular of a gentleman who went on workmen's compensation in September, His sixty-fifth birthday was in May of the following year. He was not interested in drawing unemployment insurance because he was receiving workmen's compensation benefits. However, there is a benefit called a three-week retirement entitlement, and he was not allowed to take advantage of this entitlement although he had contributed to the plan for 34 years.

Worse than that was the fact that when I raised the matter with the officials in the department, they twice agreed that the man was entitled to benefit yet on the third occasion turned him down again. That time, of course, they made a slip, but as a consequence this man still has no entitlement to his three-week retirement benefit.

Another gentleman because he had a younger family, continued working until he was 73 years of age. By the time he got around to retiring he knew about the three-week retirement entitlement, but was told he could not have it because he was three years past the age at which the benefits were paid. Had he quit working at 70, he could have collected his three-week benefit and then gone back to work for the next three years, with no problem. As it was, the man was disentitled from obtaining benefit, having worked even longer to pay into the plan.

[Mr. Lang.]

One of the main features of the plan seems to be to take it out of the over 65-year olds, the contention being that the over 65s are well looked after in other ways. I think the minister is saying in this legislation that some of the over 65s have been abusing the plan. There may be some who have, as there are in any age group, but the number is minute compared to the abuses that take place in the 20 to 25 age bracket. I ask the minister why he intends to take it out of the aged. Some people in the over 65 age group are breadwinners. For various reasons they have young families; perhaps because they married a second time or adopted children. These people need to work and they want to work beyond the age of 65.

The saving that will be accomplished by taking the over 65s off the rolls will be minuscule. There are already provisions in the act to pay benefits if errors are made. We have the weird and wonderful sensation of the department from time to time trying to garnishee old age security. If errors are made, surely the department should admit they have been made, and if benefits should have been paid in the first place perhaps it is time the commission were smart enough to admit they should have been paid.

There are other amendments to the plan, including coverage under Local Initiative and Local Employment Assistance Programs. Although this is a very small item, it now seems that anyone who runs out of unemployment insurance can apply under the LIP program and get back on unemployment insurance; then the next year he can apply under the LEAP program and once more get back on unemployment insurance. I think that is the best deal yet for anyone who is a professional and not working.

An hon. Member: From LIP to LEAP.

Mr. Ellis: From LIP to LEAP, with UIC in between. The government is also introducing greater flexibility into the payment of sickness benefits. This is something that needs to be done. We have all come across claimants who have been laid off during the winter time for one or two weeks. There are a number of reasons for this; for example, the owner of a small business might take a holiday so he has to lay off his employees for three or four weeks. They all draw unemployment insurance, then five or six months later the employer himself becomes seriously ill but receives no sick benefits because of his previous entitlement.

A few years ago I went into considerable detail in looking into the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Most hon. members will remember some of the situations I ran across, catalogued and presented to the House; for example, there were abuses of the plan involving some $1 billion. None of my findings was ever seriously challenged by the minister or his department, though they had the RCMP trying to find something wrong with them. One of the challenges that I issued at that time, and which I issue again now, is in the area of sick benefits. The department is well aware that errors have been made in their calculations to the tune of $250 million to $300 million, yet despite those errors in calculation the bill was allowed to proceed. These figures were never corrected, showing an arrogant and ill-disguised disregard for the people of Canada.

Four years later we are facing the same problem. But what are we doing about it? We are using a band-aid where major surgery is required. The minister has made quite a point of saying that he is eliminating the disincentives that might be associated with the current legislation. In other words, he is saying that if workers quit then they have a six-week disentitlement. According to the information given by the minister, the number of disqualifications has not improved very much. As a matter of fact, the situation is a little worse; the number is around 300,000 annually. I suggest this number will not be changed by imposing a piddling little penalty that increases the period to six weeks. If you work for a while, then get yourself laid off or fired so as to get unemployment insurance benefits, the length of time you are off work before receiving benefits really is not that important. If you are going to milk the system, a couple of weeks one way or the other is not of much consequence.

Would it not make more sense to relate the length of the period of benefits to the work period? One of the major problems employers find today is getting decent help. I am sure there is not a member of the House who has not had this problem put to him by small businessmen who are trying to compete with unemployment insurance. I do not think I am unique, and my files are full of such cases.

One of the changes made in the legislation which seems to me almost like a damn fool clause is the provision removing from coverage persons who control 50 per cent of their own company. Frankly, these people did not want to be in the plan in the first place. I previously have spelled out to the House the case of a gentleman in the $50,000 a year bracket who successfully collected unemployment insurance for seven weeks and still drew full salary—and all of this legally, without abrogating the legislation at all.

There have been many abuses of the act, and I do not need to go into them now in detail. But the important thing is that the legislation is not going to change the situation at all. Surely, the provision regarding voluntary termination need not have been written into the act. If someone wishes for some reason or other to cease drawing benefits, surely it is not necessary to write this into the legislation.

The threshold formula, the new benchmark, is surely an admission by the government of its inability to bring unemployment down to the level it should be. The government increases the rate by 20 per cent, yet at the same time preaches restraint. It asks management and labour to hold to the 10 per cent line, then forces both into the position of paying an extra 20 per cent to the UIC.

I do not have much sympathy either for big corporations or big unions, most of which are quite capable of looking after themselves. The worry I have, and I am sure it is the worry of most members of parliament, is for small businessmen, carpenters, tradesmen who work in a very small company, people who do not have the protection of major unions or corporations to look after their needs. These big corporations, and in some cases big unions, are as much responsible for inflation as anyone else, but they run a poor second to the Government of Canada.

The increase of 20 per cent is not fair at this time. Why put it in now, particularly when the minister admitted to me in answer to a question yesterday that income is coming in faster than it is going out? Why put it in, when the minister said—if I read his answer correctly, and I double-checked it today to make sure—the premiums collected are in fact being used not only to pay benefits but to pay back the overcharges during the past few years? The minister suggested that if this situation continues as it has in the past, there will be enough premiums collected to balance the account in the very near future. If that is the case, why do we require the extra 20 per cent right now: it only adds to the burden that labour must carry? I am as much in favour as anyone of our having an actuarially sound scheme, but in view of the way the situation appears to be developing there is no need for this increase at this time.

I see that my time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker. Unlike hon. members to my left and to my right, I do not take a great deal of pleasure in opposing this bill. I would much prefer to see the bill properly rewritten to include some of the changes suggested by my colleagues. Other hon. members have gleefully referred to some of the problems. I wish I could vote for a bill that would do the job that is necessary, but as I see it the minister is still deceiving the Canadian public by telling them that this measure is necessary to solve our unemployment insurance problems. What we need is some basic honesty in this or some other piece of legislation to correct the Unemployment Insurance Act. I would gladly support such a piece of legislation.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I take the opportunity of this debate on second reading of Bill C-69 to say a few words about the unemployment insurance program. Although the bill deals with specific amendments, it is normal, at this stage of the discussions, to talk about the whole program.

I support the motion that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration because I think that it has been sufficiently improved to be submitted to the consideration of the committee where the members will proceed to a thorough study.

However, I will make a few reservations later with respect to this bill.

I congratulate the minister for the amendments pertaining to old age and maternity insurance, which have already been passed pursuant to another bill. As for the entitlement of LIP sponsors, the legislation will enable applicants to discontinue voluntarily the benefits and provide for the extension of the qualifying period as well as for the eligibility of claimants who are in receipt of workmen's compensation payments, of prisoners and other workers who had to quit their jobs for reasons beyond their control.

I think these amendments are wise and will result in a better program. The minister listened carefully to the debate and I hope he will be convinced of the value of amending the bill. In my view, we should not start disqualifying any claimant from the unemployment insurance program, nor should we delete any item from the program, which may result in making it less liberal, until a comprehensive survey of all our social and economic adjustment programs has been carried out. An attempt should be made to merge those programs one way or another and perhaps it could be useful to have a parliamentary committee consider the suggestion. At one point, Mr. Speaker, I thought of introducing an amendment to that motion which would precisely have the effect of withdrawing the bill and referring its subject matter to a committee. But I see that such an act on my part, if my amendment were accepted, would seriously delay the passage of the good aspects of the bill.

So I thought it might be better if I joined others of my colleagues and opposition members to try and improve the bill at the committee stage or the report stage. However, I will continue to make that suggestion before we make other minor changes at random in the unemployment insurance program, those changes will not be an improvement but a departure from the program we had in 1971. I will continue to make the suggestion to try and get terms of reference for a parliamentary committee so hon. members may examine the variety of our programs and our policy of economic and social changes so we can, at least at the conceptual level, merge some of those programs and have a much more rational approach that would meet most of the recognized disadvantages of the program and the criticisms we hear in this House or elsewhere.

I think all participants in this debate agree on certain points of the unemployment insurance program. I see a common denominator on many factors. First, all those who spoke in this debate agree that we need an unemployment insurance program, a work insurance program. Second in amending the legislation all want as much as possible to stop abuses in the unemployment insurance program. Third, they want our social programs to encourage productivity, and when I use the word "productivity" I do not mean mere economic productivity, but social and economic productivity.

I really think that parliamentary committee could make a non-partisan and in-depth study and arrive at recommendations that would improve our social programs. Hon. members can assess those programs because they know the problems. There are few of their offices where the staff is not constantly urged to intervene with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, or the provincial social service departments, on behalf of the unemployed or those who feel ill-treated by the civil service or by the programs themselves.

To my mind, this Bill C-69 goes too far on the one hand, and not far enough on the other. Still, I can understand that the minister intended to bring in changes at this time, that he had reasons to wait—as he mentioned in his speech—for a far more complete and comprehensive revision. As regards the change in the legislation aiming at solving the problem of voluntary retirement from work through legislative means, I think that we should try to solve this problem through administrative means. I admit that it is important for some people to put it into the act, but in my opinion this problem can be solved through administrative improvements. It is not necessary to amend the act, but on this point I can say that personally I would rather not see this amendment in the bill, although I can accept it, precisely because I think it is an administrative problem.

If a recipient cannot prove that he is actively seeking employment, he is disqualified for an indefinite period. So what then is the solution of the proposed amendment? Nothing, from a legislative point of view, because with a good administration, a humane administration of course, good results can be achieved. By the way, I might say that the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission is improving, at least in my region. We have had problems when the two programs were combined, the one before 1971 and the new one, but I can say that in my region, and I think that it is the same in the Atlantic region in general, the administration of the program is improving as regards efficiency and that it is becoming more humane following the changes made last year.

Thus we can now eliminate indefinitely, and not only for three or six weeks, those who are not actively looking for a job.

Unfortunately, the bill ventures into two other areas concerning the philosophy of the program and, as I said earlier, I think the government should steer clear of a piecemeal approach toward important programs like the unemployment insurance scheme before a study is made on the whole situation. I hope that before proceeding to his new series of amendments, the minister will ensure that a parliamentary committee, and I insist on this, makes a study on the subject. I insist on this because, through the very nature of their work and through their participation in society, hon. members know the problems of social adjustment and of poverty in general, and I would like to have a parliamentary study on the subject.

Those two provisions which I would have preferred to see deferred are the lowering from 70 to 65 of the maximum age for coverage under the plan. I said earlier that I would support the motion for second reading of the bill, but I wish to tell the House and the minister that I am against the change in maximum age for coverage. I will oppose it in committee if I get a chance, and I will oppose it in the House if amendments are moved; moreover, I might move some myself. I also oppose another proposed change in the rate of benefits for claimants with dependents. I understand the arguments of the minister in favour of both of these changes. I agree that, had we introduced those changes when we increased old-age pensions and modified the family allowance plan, it might not have been possible then.

I agree in principle that the Unemployment Insurance Plan should not normally be used in that way, since it is a problem which will have to be dealt with in another program. Unfortunately, timing is important when dealing with government affairs, and I do not think we should start denying anyone benefits unless we clearly have something else to offer. I might agree to those changes later, when we have carried out a more detailed study of the matter as the minister mentioned, with a view to bring all social programs into line. Perhaps then we will be in a position to come up with an evaluation. But right now, I object to those measures. This, however, is no reason for opposing the second reading of the bill, which contains some good provisions. I think we all agree with some of the amendments proposed in the bill. I do not think it would be reasonable to oppose it on second reading. But later, when it comes to third reading, unless those measures are modified, I will find it extremely difficult to support the bill.

[English]

I would like to deal very briefly with some of the arguments that have come forward concerning the philosophy of the program. I said earlier I would agree to a basic and comprehensive reform not only of the unemployment insurance program but also the economic and social adjustment program of the government. I think a parliamentary study of this problem would be useful. The minister in his speech mentioned that he is conducting a review of the UIC program. I should like to quote the minister in order to put in proper context what I am saying. As reported at page 8567 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I should like to emphasize that the changes contained in this bill which is being presented to parliament are the results of the first findings of our review of the legislation. However, as is proper with a program of such significance, this comprehensive examination is continuing, particularly in relationship to two parallel policy developments. I mentioned one, the over-all harmonization of all our social security programs. The other is the evolution of an integrated and more comprehensive manpower policy.

I was glad to hear the minister say those words. He has shown in the past that he is the type of man who would be very co-operative. I am sure he will consider favourably my suggestion that once we have dealt with this bill, in conjunction with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) he conduct a review of all these programs, not only UIC. In my view, it has to do with all social and economic adjustment programs.

Given the fact that unemployment is a reality in this country, primarily it is a regional problem. I have always said that one day I would like to make a special study in this regard, and probably I will. I would like to know exactly what the impact of unemployment is on the Gaspé peninsula, the northern region of Quebec, the northern region of New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and a few other regions of the country. I should like to see exactly what impact national unemployment has on employment situation in these regions. Perhaps we are not talking about an employment problem or a social adjustment problem at all but, rather, a regional economic problem.

That is the reason I would like to see some kind of approach adopted that would try to merge the unemployment insurance program with the local Employment Assistance Program—which is a wonderful program—the Local Initiatives Program, the Canada Assistance Plan and even some DREE agreements. There is a DREE agreement in my constituency—a FRED agreement. We are initiating discussions to renew it under the present development agreement. Really, we are dealing with social adjustment and not only economic development. It has been proven now that industrialization is not the only answer to economic development. We will have to look at other things.

I should like to say briefly that I cannot agree with those on the opposite side, both Progressive Conservatives and members of the New Democratic Party, who say it is a terrible thing to change the threshold of 4 per cent unemployment to a given average of unemployment in the previons eight years. To me, it does not make very much difference when one considers that contributions are tax deductible and that some people who pay income tax into the consolidated revenue fund have no relationship at all to employment. I refer to retired people and people with savings who pay income tax.

People, particularly members of the New Democratic Party, raise the fundamental problem of the employer and the worker contributing to the program, versus the consolidated or general revenue of the government. When one balances this argument, I do not see that it matters. One could take the position that the unemployment insurance program is primarily for workers and employers, and that probably they should pay for the administration of the program in order to receive benefits under it.

I can see, on the other hand, having the threshold, the principle we introduced in 1971, because there is a degree of incentive on the general economy and the government to try to lower unemployment. I have listened very carefully to the debate, all the arguments made by members of the New Democratic Party and some from the official opposition, but I am not convinced that this is a serious problem. I can live with that part of the bill.

I repeat, I regret that in starting our review of the Unemployment Insurance Act we have to hurt some people. I know the minister to be a reasonable and flexible man. I hope he has listened to and appreciated the concern of members from all sides of the House, on two questions particularly. One is the reduction of the age of eligibility from 70 to 65 and the other concerns doing away with the special allocation to claimants who are dependents. I sincerely hope the minister will see fit to accept amendments in the committee or in the House when the bill comes back here.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I am one of those who is not very impressed with some of the arguments we hear, particularly from some members of the official opposition. We are lucky there are members from the Atlantic provinces in that party, as well as from other regions, who—probably for regional reasons, if one can call them that, because their constituents are mainly people of low income, working people—bring some reason to the debate. I have been concerned since 1971, and was in the 1972 campaign—the same arguments are being advanced again now, probably because of events coming up in February in the Conservative party—that the unemployment insurance program is a mess and that it will cost $3.6 billion compared to the many hundreds of millions of dollars which it cost before 1971.

I should like to say first of all to people who put forward this cost argument—the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was one of those who advanced this argument last week in another debate—that they are not completely honest because they are comparing apples with oranges. The fact is that we are not dealing with the same program at all. Before 1971 there was no provision for sickness in the unemployment insurance program, no provision for maternity benefits, and the income tax was not recoverable. So we are not talking about $3.6 billion. Even if the amount is high—I have said this before in the House—I do not know why people become so upset when governments intervene in society and in the economy. I am surprised, because those who argue against government spending, against social subsidies—unemployment insurance is one of them—are the very people who benefit from higher technology and higher productivity brought about through these various adjustment programs. They are the very same people, from the same regions and the same sectors of this society.

I have heard people from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the business community complain in private about the terrible unemployment insurance program which is costing so much money and which, in their words, is a disincentive to work. In fact, they are the people who need this program, because without good social and economic adjustment programs, which really the Unemployment Insurance Act is, there would be reluctance from communities and from provincial and municipal governments to change. There would also be reluctance from workers and labour unions to technological change.

I have given examples previously of projects which have gone ahead which are in the long-term interest of the nation or of a particular region, but which in the process of increasing productivity and technological advancement have required the dislocation of people. When you dislocate people, you need some kind of adjustment program. The people who benefit from higher productivity and technology have to pay for those who are dislocated—and who will do that, if not the government?

Therefore, it seems to me that the search to be more competitive in the world, more technologically advanced and more productive, is compatible with high government spending on social intervention programs, because without these programs there would be reluctance from the different segments of society. Unless people who advance these arguments want to suggest that we adopt a kind of system that would force people to do things and ignores pressures in society against change, I cannot see that they are serious.

With regard to this program being a disincentive to work, I do not believe that in today's society we can say that generally speaking the unemployment insurance program is a disincentive to work. I admit that there are abuses of the program. I have seen cases of such abuses and I deplore them, but I say that with good administration and a human approach we can deal with these problems. Before concluding I would like to make one point, namely, that the unemployment insurance program is not the only government program where abuses exist. There are abuses in any public program, abuses of the income tax system and of other programs, so this is not the only program in which abuses exist.

With regard to the argument that it is bad to have working people off work for a certain period of time, let me point out that working people are not the only people off work for part of the year. I know of people in the professions, people from the business world who spend two or three months a year in Florida or in California. They are not very productive there. If they can earn enough in six or nine months to be able to go elsewhere for the rest of the year, or if they can play golf half the time in the summer, then I am happy for them. What is the difference if it is the working people who are doing this? The only difference is that if the working people do this, if they are off the job and are not being productive for a certain part of the year, the only recourse for them is a public program.

I would not like to hear anyone argue that the working people or people who are unemployed are the only ones who are not productive the year round. Other people in society are not productive the year round, and I am not suggesting that they should be. Some people can earn a very high income for six or nine months of the year and then be off for the other three months. If some people, because of the geography of this country, because of their particular region, the nature of the economy in that region or the nature of the industry where they work, happen to be unemployed for part of the year, I do not see why it is worse than having people from other classes in society take off for part of the year.

I will watch very closely what goes on in committee with this bill, and I will watch very closely what happens in the House when it comes back here. I have mentioned that there are two provisions I cannot support, but I will not vote against the second reading motion because I believe the bill should go forward, having, as it does, some good provisions in it. As I said a short while ago, unless these two provisions are changed I will find it very difficult to support the bill. But I will see what developments take place in committee. I have been in the House for seven or eight years; that is long enough to know that one should not become concerned about the future before it comes around. We will cross those bridges when we come to them.

I hope the minister will seriously consider my suggestions. I suggest to him, again, that a parliamentary committee should receive a reference from the House to study the whole spectrum of social and economic adjustment programs in order to see how the programs in place are functioning. He has spoken about the harmonization of our social programs. I believe that either a joint committee or a House committee should receive a reference from the House to study this whole problem before the minister proceeds with a second review of the unemployment insurance program, because this act is a crucial element of our social security programs and it also has implications in respect of economic adjustment, not only social adjustment.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, like others in the House, I welcome the opportunity to express my views on Bill C-69 and the Unemployment Insurance Commission which, after all, is an institution with which all of us as parliamentarians have had many dealings. It is, therefore, with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to speak on it because I believe a discussion in the House on this subject is long overdue. Happily, the Unemployment Insurance Commission has managed to serve a need in difficult times, and for this we can all be grateful. However, because of its structure under existing law it has also created new sets of mores and attitudes, many of which I find rather frightening.

There are frightening financial implications as well. Let us consider the figures for the 30 years between 1940 and 1970. Unemployment costs for those years were something of the order of $6 billion, whereas in the last four years the cost of financing this institution, or unemployment costs, were of the order of $10 billion. In other words, 30 years, $6 billion; 5 years, $10 billion. The Unemployment Insurance Commission is a controversial institution, and therefore this debate is most welcome. Of course, I shall only be able to address myself to certain elements but I hope that in the course of this debate and in committee some of these matters may be resolved.

There is no question in my mind that even in its present form the Unemployment Insurance Commission serves a need, because we can all recognize that we have a regrettably high degree of unemployment, and for those who are unable to find employment the commission offers temporary financial assistance for qualified workers. Unfortunately, sometimes it also offers assistance of more than a temporary nature for workers who may be qualified but who are unwilling to rejoin the labour force. This assistance is offered on such a scale that the disincentive to rejoin the labour force can become extraordinarily high. I say this for good reason. Despite the high rate of unemployment there are many opportunities for work in this country. This is still a country of opportunity.

Figures are not easily come by, but I did manage to find some. In a period of high unemployment the Victoria, British Columbia, Canada Manpower office was indicating, on a long roll of paper, that there were 1,132 vacancies in the area. This was in June of 1973. I do not have comparable figures for people receiving unemployment insurance benefits. This was a chance release in the newspaper. These were not all specialized jobs; the list comprised skilled and unskilled jobs, marine draughtsmen, psychiatric nurses, medical technologists, legal stenographers, secretaries, accountants, bookkeepers, automatic transmission specialists, and bricklayers. Even when people are on unemployment insurance benefits there are many jobs available, and this is an aspect which I find a little frightening. I shall be returning to this point and seeking ways to overcome this shortcoming of the present organization.

In this context, I welcome the statements and thoughts expressed by my hon. friend opposite, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), who said that he would like to see a study of all the social security programs or, as he calls them, the social adjustment programs, to see if out of it cannot be made an amalgam. However, I shall be returning to this matter before the end of my comments. I leave it to others in this debate—some have already done so; some, no doubt, will turn to it again—to underline the financial consequences to our society of having to face the monumental cost of financing the operations of the commission.

I have mentioned the scale of those costs. There are provisions in the amendments to reduce, at least to some extent, the charges which will fall upon the Canadian public. These operations, however, have consequences other than the financial ones, having equally frightening effects on the social fabric of our nation such as destroying or at least wearing down the urge to work, which was denied by the previous speaker but which I insist does exist. By wearing down the urge to work and to retain one's independence of action, we accept slavery and dependence on the state for all our being's needs, wants and fulfilment. That sterile prospect is too frightening to contemplate. We must stop that trend before it overwhelms us.

I am led to make these comments because indisputably there are a large number of unfilled jobs in this country at a time when there is rising unemployment. The phenomenon cannot be explained in any other way. Those who are out of work either do not want to fill the jobs available, or are perhaps refusing to seek retraining which would prepare them to do so, because of the comfortable haven offered by unemployment insurance benefits. If this practice continues unabated it can lead to social bankruptcy and economic disaster.

This automatically brings us to the role the Manpower offices play in restoring this matter to equilibrium. On good authority I have been informed that one Manpower officer has tossed out, without too much show of concern, the fact that in the 17 years he has been employed at a Manpower centre—presumably to find employment for others and safely employ himself—he has not placed a single person in a job. In the sharpest and cruellest light, this comment underlines one great defect in the unemployment picture in Canada today: the failure of the unemployment offices and Manpower centres to work as one service—first, to take care of those in financial need and, second, to meet the employment need. It should be one service. In various locations in cities which I know there is rivalry between the two services. Refusal to accept an employment offer or a reasonable offer of retraining—and they can be equated—ought to be a cause to have the individual concerned removed from the insurance rolls.

Contrary to what has been said by some whom I have thought to be reliable spokesmen, the unemployment insurance system in Canada is not, I insist, one of the means by which the wealth of the nation is to be more equally distributed. To my way of thinking, that is not the purpose of unemployment insurance. If that is what the law is doing, then the law must be changed. An unemployment insurance fund should be an insurance fund to insure against the financial consequences of economic adversity which any one of us can meet. We should all be prepared to say, "There, but for the grace of God, go I." The insurance fund is there to help those of us who are in need; it is not for the redistribution of the wealth of this country. It is called an insurance fund and that is the role it should play, not any other.

I should like to get into a little more of the philosophy which ought to motivate the commission in its handling of a serious socioeconomic problem. I may do so, if time permits, at the conclusion of my other comments. Incidentally, I seem to have forgotten to look at the time I started my speech and I shall therefore rely on the Chair to remind me when my time begins to expire.

I should like to discuss the criteria for entitlement, such as total family income. I should like, also, to deal with seasonal workers, as well as with long time employment as deserving special consideration under the act. However, I shall have to leave these considerations to others, since my time is limited.

● (1600)

My principal concern today is the deleterious effect on Canada as a whole of the deterioration of the work ethic which unemployment insurance benefits promote or foster. It is a very fine point whether they promote or foster it; in any event, they do nothing to halt it. I want to put forward some notion about how the whole process could be reversed so that the very existence of unemployment insurance benefits would prompt people to spend less time drawing benefits.

In this connection, I was delighted last evening to hear my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), explain his views about combining certain features of the social security system. I have already mentioned that I welcomed the comments of the hon. member for Gloucester who immediately preceded me in this debate. It is my desire to see several features of our social security system and our social adjustment programs brought together, but first I think it is worth recording a bit of history.

As long ago as 1948-49, the Progressive Conservative party developed a multifaceted scheme of social security. This involved a consolidation or a combination of schemes then in existence or on the horizon. Today, as we see the variety of schemes designed for the security of the citizens working out their fate, we think the time has come—as the hon. member for Gloucester said—to revive that consolidated program or something like it. Its implementation would remove the tremendous financial burden under which federal budgets now labour in meeting the high cost of unemployment. But equally important, its implication would restore that vigorous independence that so distinctively marked an earlier generation of Canadians.

Earlier this year, in a report entitled "Canadian Work Values" issued by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, we find the following comment:

> Clearly, Canadians are committed to work ... Canadians see themselves as industrious people to whom work contributes a feeling of success and, for a large proportion, of personal fulfilment.

This "motherhood" statement was obviously verbalized in order to provide comfort and gratification to those who feel that in the Manpower section of the department, at least, they have a sense of personal fulfilment. That sort of self-adulation and self-congratulation is dangerous, Mr. Speaker. It leads to complacency and that is something we can do without at any time in our lives, but at this time particularly.

If only I could convince myself that all Canadians and all draft-dodging immigrants, if I may bring them into the picture, merited that form of compliment, I would be happy. But we must consider that a good number of the LIP grant applicants dream up their projects with two objectives in mind:—to get in on some of the fresh bread that is lying around, and to build up some credit, saying to themselves, "Let's hope we can keep the projects stalled for at least eight weeks," which would entitle them to unemployment insurance benefits after their LIP bread is used up. When I consider this, I question the smugness of such self-comforting phrases as those contained in the report.

Of course, many of our farmers, independent businessmen and other working Canadians are committed to work; they are not committed to unemployment insurance. But far too many other Canadians are, and many of them are proud of it. I do not like to hear people boasting about being able to get on to the unemployment insurance rolls and I do not suppose anyone in this House does. This is where a great deal of danger lies, and we must overcome it.

If I could return to the consolidated scheme advanced by my party some 30 years ago, I should like to explain some of its features and the solutions it would provide to the problems I have been discussing. The proposal was based on the following schemes then more or less in operation or in contemplation: the unemployment insurance scheme, a hospitalization plan, a medicare plan and the old age pension scheme. There was an accident program thrown in for good measure, but I think we will just deal with those four.

The philosophy underlying this consolidated program was based on the notion that these four schemes could be united under one single scheme, with a single contribution for each Canadian, and placed on an actuarial footing. It was also based on the observable fact, a fact that could be proven statistically, that the generality of Canadians seldom or never, in normal circumstances, have cause to rely on unemployment insurance benefits, are seldom, or for very short periods only, obliged to go into hospital, and only a bit more frequently have to come under the medicare plan. A good many Canadians are healthy people and do not have to call on these plans but contribute to them gladly.

It is surprising, when one looks back on one's own life, just how little one has needed these services. I count myself lucky, fortunate perhaps, and I do not in the least mind paying my insurance premiums because it is comforting to know that the service is there if it should ever be needed. Unemployment, hospitalization and doctor's care were the main schemes. The actuarial tables, based on reliable statistics at that time, demonstrated that a normal healthy Canadian, making his contribution throughout his working life to this consolidated scheme and looking forward to an old age pension—at that time, munificently set at $100 a month—because he had not called on the unemployment insurance scheme, the hospital scheme or medicare to any great extent, would find his old age pension increased by about $150. This comes back to the age 65 limit that was being put on it. If a man was paying all his life to age 65 and not drawing benefits during those years, why should he not get them at that age?

Mr. MacFarlane: He is a work-dodger at that age.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You try finding work at that age. The underlying theory is that to the extent that there was no call on the services available, their end of work pension or old age pension will be increased. When this was first explained to me, it was quite a new concept. I am surprised that parliament did not get down to it earlier. I do not know what happened. I think perhaps 1961-62 came along and the Liberal government decided that anything devised by the Conservatives was not worth considering. But it is there, Mr. Speaker; it is a sensible program and it would meet some of the problems now before us. It would get people off unemployment insurance and out looking for a job simply because at the end of their life they would enjoy those benefits. They would want to work in order to enjoy those benefits later. This is the great extractor of the disincentive that is causing so much concern, and has caused so much concern, to this government.

The consolidated scheme was found to be actuarially sound in 1949 when it was devised by a professor from the University of British Columbia. It was updated and found to be sound in the 1959-60 era by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It would obviously take a number of years to put into place the machinery for establishing such a comprehensive program today. It could be done. As I say, however, the scheme is there and it is an answer to the work disincentive.

The unemployment insurance program must not become another welfare program. I have said it before and it cannot be too frequently or too forcefully said. It is an insurance program, as are the hospital insurance and medical insurance schemes. Canadians can be prudent. They want to look after their own needs in these areas and will do so much more satisfactorily, and at less cost to other taxpayers, if provided with the right kind of program and the right kind of leadership which, regrettably, we lack today. I submit that the consolidated program briefly outlined is just such a program. It remains to be seen whether this government will respond to the call of the hon. member for Gloucester and other hon. members to look into the possibility of improving not only the unemployment insurance program but the other social programs available to Canadians.

There are some elements in this bill which are commendable. However, it is a patchwork exercise. In parts, it is even offensive. It leaves aside those who have reached the age of 65, denying them an entitlement to draw unemployment insurance benefits which they might otherwise have had. The amendments put forward here merely paste over cracks. The worst feature is the debilitating effect that an even more inefficient Manpower or job-creation scheme is having on Canadian society. Something much more fundamental is needed than this bill provides. At the very least, the unemployment and job-creation aspects of government programs must be brought more closely together. Better still, we should get some hint that the whole welfare scheme will be overhauled along the lines I have suggested. Until that is done we are in grave danger of social disaster, with the working majority carrying throughout their working lives the non-working minority. The Canadian public is thoroughly fed up with piggy-backing in this way.

We may be hewers of wood and drawers of water, but we will not willingly become draught animals as well, drawing after us a small but ever-growing group of people who have latched on to a good thing, a scheme which offers them greater financial return than they are prepared to look for in the labour market. It is obviously not possible to shift the Unemployment Insurance Commission into this area of reform within the terms of the present bill. I should like to leave my comments on that for a moment. There is one particular case that I feel is worth recounting for the record, in the hope that it will be remedied by different rulings than those which have prevailed.

We have all had experience with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We have all had constituents come to us with their problems, their disentitlements, their being cut off benefits, and their failure to qualify. Even if our debating time were not now restricted there would be insufficient time for each of us to document all of these problems. There is one, however, I wish to speak about.

The circumstances in this case were that the worker delayed her application for benefits until the exact period of her absence could be accurately determined. She was expecting a baby and wanted to receive the maternity benefits. She might, within her rights, have applied earlier but she did not. This proved her downfall because before she did file her application the municipal employees, of whom she was one, were locked out as a result of the activity of other workers. She was not directly involved in the negotiating argument that led to the lock-out, but once locked out she was considered as though she were on strike and, in consequence, not eligible for benefits.

I insist that this was a miscarriage of justice, a faulty judgment on the part of the official. I referred it to the minister and received some specious replies. Surely, some distinction ought to be made between a person who is disqualified on account of being on strike and a person who is disqualified because, through no fault of her own, she is unable to report for work. The doors were locked; she could not get in the front door. Why should she be disentitled? The doors were locked against her because others had threatened to go on strike and the lock-out occurred.

In summary, I have managed to mention the disincentives inherent in the unemployment insurance system as it now stands. I look for improvements. I have mentioned the need for closer integration between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Manpower centres. I managed, within my time, to cite one instance that has really bothered me. It has been the basis for a good many exchanges with the minister. I hope it will be settled, even retroactively. I know that I can count on a sympathetic hearing.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, it is fascinating to follow this debate. Some hon. members have complained that the act and its application are too lenient, that it lends itself to so-called abuses and should be tightened up either administratively or by law. Others approached it on the basis of their own experience and the requirements of the people they represent, asking that it be made more generous and that it take into consideration factors that at present the law does not. Some members have tried to be on both sides of the fence in the same speech, arguing on either side. I suppose that is human nature. In an effort to find a better answer, everyone approaches it in what they think is the best possible way. However, surely it would help if there was a certain degree of consistency. The question is, what do we want this act to be? Do we want it to be an insurance scheme, as proposed by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), or do we want it to be an income support scheme?

Those of us who were in this House in 1971 will remember the debates at that time. We knew then, as we know today, that we were about to introduce a system of income support, not a system of insurance but a social program—not just a businessman's program, as some Tory spokesmen would like it to be. Not all of them are in agreement, I am sure. I imagine that a few minutes from now the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir), who represents an industrial riding, will speak strongly in favour of the approach we have adopted, namely, and income support approach, because this is a good sheme, a good law.

Let us not try to make law by legislating with an eye only to abuses. If we, as legislators, were to do that we would be acting as administrators, losing sight of the general approach, a philosophy toward social legislation. We could then become civil servants administering the act and, surely, we ought not to be performing the second role; that is not our task.

Like other legislation, the bill before us today has good features, bad features and technical features. The trouble with this legislation is that it contains some very bad features. First, though, I will deal briefly with the good ones. There is a proposal for an amendment making sponsors of LIP of LEAP projects eligible for coverage. There is a provision allowing claimants to terminate their claims should they wish to do so; at present the law does not permit them to do so. There is a proposal for an extension of the period during which sickness benefits will be paid. The period is 29 weeks at present and it is be extended to 39 weeks.

There is to be an extension of the period during which uninsurable earnings may be counted for entitlement to benefit, from the present 52 weeks to 104 weeks. This amendment probably stems from proposals made in various private bills brought forward in the House from time to time during the past few years. Injured workers, ex-inmates of prisons and persons handicapped because of illness will benefit from this measure.

I commend the minister for having incorporated in the bill propositions which have been advanced by members from both sides of the House in the past three years. Further, it is made clear that a worker who receives workmen's compensation payments is entitled to receive benefits. As the wording presently reads, he is not entitled to do so even though he might receive compensation for one day only. The law is to be clarified to permit a person in receipt of workmen's compensation to receive benefits from unemployment insurance for parts of a week.

We are also asked to approve a measure to increase premiums paid by employers and employees. This was a responsible decision made necessary by the requirements of the program itself. I support it, as I am sure most hon. members do.

I shall not deal with the technical features of the bill. Instead, I shall consider briefly the bad features, the ones which seem, to me, to be of a negative character. There is a proposal in the legislation to reduce the present special benefit rate of 75 per cent paid to unemployed people with dependants to a level of 66 percent of their normal earnings. The consequence, I suppose, will be that in the rural or poorer areas of Canada where there is a high and constant level of unemployment, people so affected will be obliged to turn for help to provincial and municipal welfare arrangements. The onus will be shifted to other levels of government, though in the end, I suppose, it will still be a federal responsibility, indirectly, if payments are made through the Canada Assistance Plan to which we contribute to the extent of 50 per cent. It seems to me that this measure is not a good one; it will hit particularly hard the areas I have mentioned and it will hurt people whose level of income is already amoung the lowest. I would ask the minister to reconsider this proposal when the bill is before the committee.

Another bad feature has to do with the treatment of workers aged 65 and over. Take the case of men and women in our society who marry late in their lives, in their fifties, form families and are deeply interested in gainful employment for the maintenance of their families when they reach age 65 or over. If the proposed amendment is carried, we shall be treating workers aged 65 and over in a manner different from that in which we treat workers younger than 65. We shall be saying to them: You have old age security coming to you, and that should be adequate to cover your needs, whether you become unemployed or not.

Madam Speaker, we do not put forward that argument when we consider the treatment of widows and widowers below the age of 65 who receive a pension under the Canada Pension Plan and who wish to be active in the labour force. Yet we apply this type of reasoning to people aged 65 and over. I believe that in a system such as ours—undoubtedly one of the best in the world—there should be no obstacle in the way of a man or a woman who wishes to remain in the labour force, no matter what the age might be. If this premise were accepted, it would follow that entitlement under the unemployment insurance system should be the same for them as for others. There should be consistency. The drawing of a line at a certain age is completely artificial and is most frustrating to elderly people who wish to remain productive members of our society. It introduces a double standard of treatment which I do not think is a good idea.

I should like to move on to another aspect that I discussed in this House at the time of the budget. It has to do with the proposed amendment to the act that would impose a double disqualification on workers dismissed for misconduct. I ask the House, who is going to define the word "misconduct"? Will it be the employer? Will it be the unemployment insurance official? Or will it be the board of referees? It is true that when the minister spoke last week we were assured there is ample jurisprudence on the question of misconduct. Nevertheless, how are we going to apply and administer a law with a definition of "misconduct" that is so broad, that is so much left in the hands of those who will have to interpret the legislation? Surely, in the eyes of a worker "misconduct" means something quite different from what it means to an employer. What may be an offence to an employer may, in the eyes of a worker, be an insignificant pattern of behaviour.

One needs only to speak to people engaged in an assembly line operation, say, in the automotive industry, people who work under considerable tension and strain, to discover that their pattern of behaviour may be quite difficult to understand from the point of view of management. At times, such behaviour could be interpreted as misconduct. But who is to decide on a worker fired for misconduct? I regret to say that I find this proposed amendment to be one that treats workers like school children. It is like the state entering the work place and trying to determine who is behaving well and who is not. I am not saying we are going too far; I am saying that this is an area we should not even touch.

It seems to me that these three areas do not require amendment. Where we do need amendment is, first of all, in shifting the emphasis from unemployment to employment. I should like to give the House an example that occurred in the great city of Toronto from which I come, which was reported by Wilfred List in the Globe and Mail a couple of weeks ago. The headline of his article is "29 zoo workers ignore layoff, want to work for UIC benefits". Stated simply, 29 employees of the metro zoo expressed their intention to carry out their regular duties and be ready for work for unemployment insurance benefits of $100 a week, to which they would normally be entitled. This arose out of a decision by the Toronto Zoological Society to lay off 49 employees.

Mr. Patrick O'Keeffe, the representative of CUPE to which the zoo workers belonged, sent a telegram to the minister on behalf of the workers. In the telegram he asked that the workers be paid unemployment insurance while they continued to do necessary work at the zoo without salary. The relevant question is this, as asked by Mr. O'Keeffe: "If they are going to give them $100 a week for idling, why not for voluntary, necessary labour?" This is why I say we need amendments that shift the emphasis from unemployment to employment, amendments that would permit using unemployment insurance funds to design and to create jobs.

Secondly, we need amendments that will shift the emphasis from inactivity to training. To some extent we have already done this. The minister has initiated some interesting examples of this on a small scale in Newfoundland. Unemployed workers there were given, in addition to their regular Manpower allowance, a UIC allowance, to top it all, while in training. We need amendments to apply this approach to the whole country and make it possible for those who become unemployed but who wish to work and upgrade themselves to utilize the period they are unemployed constructively and purposefully both with regard to the present and the future.

Thirdly, we need amendments of a day to day nature, particularly in our large cities, which will permit people no longer unemployed to deal with the commission. For example, the office should be open evenings so that a person who has found employment can settle a claim. People should be able to telephone the commission in the daytime and get through to the officer in charge of their claim, which is not possible now in Toronto—and, I suspect, in other cities too—so as to clean up their case by telephone instead of being required to attend at the office personally.

Lastly, we should extend into the evening hours the hearings of the board of referees. Why should the operations of the commission be oriented to the convenience of the commission? Why cannot operations be oriented to the convenience of the users, particularly those users who, through their own efforts or with the help of government services, have managed to become employed again? Surely there is a recognition there that is due to people who have managed to re-enter the labour force. I would not be surprised if a few years from now there are amendments to the act to permit the use of unemployment insurance funds for constructing low-cost housing in this country. After all, why not? There are several billions of dollars yearly in the fund. At certain times this substantial source of capital could be used for specific projects.

In essence, Madam Speaker, I have tried to outline this afternoon a series of amendments that we need and which would allow the commission to perform a positive role. I do not subscribe to the theory that the workers abuse the plan. Most Canadians would work if given the chance. This is what they tell us every weekend when we return to our ridings. When we look at what happened in Canada last year and at what happened this year, the pattern that emerges is clearly visible beyond the scope of Bill C-69 which we are now debating. The financial capital is there; it is provided by working Canadians. It amounts to a substantial sum every year. We have the human resources—those people willing to work and who would much rather work than be idle.

The question, then is, when will the political will be there, because surely we can do better than just insure the unemployed or introduce punitive measures some of which are contained in Bill C-69? The system as it is now, as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) said some time ago, can be tightened through better administration. However, the law, the spirit of the unemployment insurance program and the direction that was taken by this parliament in 1971 are sound and require support, particularly in times of high unemployment and difficult economic conditions.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I, too, welcome the opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-69 which is a bill to bring forward certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I listened with interest to comments by Liberal and Conservative members during this debate, and I was reminded of the description or explanation of what makes a Liberal politician unique, namely, that he is double-jointed and has the ability to sit on the fence and keep his ear to the ground at the same time. The only difference between that and Conservative members is that they are able to stay on both sides of the fence at the same time.

When I listened to criticisms of the bill by certain Liberal members, I wondered how they would vote when this bill came up for third reading. They cannot have their cake and eat it too. If they see, as many of us do in the NDP, that some of these amendments are unfair and will impose undue hardship on the working people, then let them stand up and be counted.

The purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act is one which I think takes a few minutes to review but is worth reviewing. This act is a response to the problems of unemployment that have plagued Canadian workers for generation after generation. There was the option of leaving it to the soup kitchens and the charitable organizations to provide the destitute unemployed with some means of sustenance, or the belated recognition, mainly due to pressure by the CCF, the forerunner of this party, that in a democratic country the democratically elected government had a certain social obligation to its citizens and a special obligation to the worker who through no fault of his own was thrown on the unemployment rolls. So this act is a social insurance act in that sense. It does provide some minimal income for those who have no other recourse because of the fluctuations of the capitalistic economy in which they work; it does provide financial support for the unemployed worker and his family until he finds new employment.

At the same time, it at least keeps the economy going because it puts purchasing dollars into the hands of the unemployed person so he can buy the necessary consumer goods to keep body and soul together, and in the process keeps manufacturers manufacturing and other workers employed. Let us not forget the necessity and the beneficial aspect of unemployment insurance in that sense. It is not just a hand-out to the individual unemployed person; it is a means of keeping a slowed down economy moving until, hopefully, it comes out of a recession or whatever economic downturn may happen to exist at the time.

Another point that should be remembered is that the unemployment insurance scheme retains for companies and for businessmen a trained working force which has been temporarily laid off. This is a point that is often overlooked. With unemployment insurance those unemployed workers, many of whom are skilled, will continue to reside in the community until there is an upswing; therefore the employer has the benefit of drawing on that pool of skilled labour. If we did not have this program, many of these people would be forced to pull up roots and travel to other parts of the country in the hope of finding a job. So it is a benefit to the employer in that sense as well.

My experience with the local unemployment insurance office in the constituency of Sault Ste. Marie has on the whole been good. I find the staff there quite co-operative. However, the staff is hindered by a multitude of very complicated regulations in the Unemployment Insurance Act. There are times when I feel the unemployed workers are unduly and unfairly victimized because of the complexities of the regulations and the fact that their rights as workers have not been fully explained to them.

I could go through many cases of people who have signed written statements presented to them by UIC officers without fully realizing the implications of signing, and finding to their chagrin at a later time that they had removed the option of appeal and other avenues because they did not fully realize the limitations of the regulations. This is something we cannot legislate; it has to be a policy decision; it has to be a directive from the minister to the local offices to put the regulations and the operation of the act into plain language so the local staffs understand and can interpret them in a plain, forthright manner to the unemployed in order that they are not victimized by the legal jargon and complicated technicalities found in the act.

We have before us today a number of amendments, most of which we in the NDP oppose on the basis that they place an undue financial burden on the unemployed. Our most fundamental objection to this bill is in respect of the change in concept respecting what unemployment insurance is all about. When this plan was set up, there was a built-in incentive for the government to try to reduce unemployment in this country. When the plan was set up, there were to be contributions from employee and employer toward funding the unemployment insurance program. This was to take effect as long as unemployment did not go above 4 per cent of the labour force. If unemployment went above 4 per cent, then the government would supplement the program with money from the consolidated revenue fund. So there was a built-in incentive at that point for the government to keep unemployment down, because if it did not it would have to make up the deficit with tax dollars.

The change we have before us will remove that 4 per cent unemployment ceiling. That move, in itself, is an admission by this Liberal government that unemployment has increased beyond its control and that the government's economic policies have not brought down the unemployment rate in this country but have exacerbated it.

A few years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was boasting that he would be quite willing to hold tough in his government's battle against inflation by deliberately creating unemployment, and if the rate reached 6 per cent he would be prepared to accept that. Of course, it has gone beyond that now, being in the neighbourhood of 7 per cent, and it might go even higher this winter. So what we have is an admission by this government that its employment policies have failed and that the unemployment situation is worse and will become worse still. I dare say that with this government's wage control policy, people will have less money to spend, there will be less demand and, hence, more unemployment.

The government has now brought in an amendment to let the ceiling on unemployment rise from 4 per cent to 5.8 per cent before it will supplement the plan. That means, quite obviously, that the weekly unemployment insurance premiums for workers and for employers will have to rise accordingly. In effect, by this amendment the government is introducing a regressive tax, not in the sense of an attempt to combat unemployment but a regressive tax only to make up a growing deficit in the fund. Therefore, working people and small businessmen especially will have to pay more from their already diminishing incomes because of the government's inability to control inflation in this country and the government's claim that workers' premiums will rise from the current $1.40 per $100 of earnings to $1.60 or $1.70 per $100 of earnings.

We have made calculations which show that the increase will be around $1.96 for each $100 on income earned because of the projected higher unemployment the country will face this coming winter and the years ahead. Therefore, since the average weekly wage in this country is about $200, the cost of unemployment insurance premiums will not be $2.80 per week, as the government claims, but it will more likely be $3.40 a week, or $176 a year. This is an added expense, an added burden, placed on workers today at the time when the government very cynically brings in a wage control policy that will limit increases in workers' demands to some 10 per cent.

Working Canadians who have seen their wages eroded by inflation escalating at a rate of 11 per cent or 12 per cent over each of the past three years now find their wages controlled by 10 per cent, while at the same time the government slaps a tax on the average worker in respect of the unemployment insurance fund amounting to some $176

a year. If that is not regressive and unfair, I do not know what is. We oppose this amendment because of that unfairness and because the government has really given up and does not have any built-in incentive to reduce the unemployment rate.

As unemployment rises, all the government has to do is increase the premiums workers and businessmen have to pay; therefore, the government gets around having to supplement the deficit. In other words, we have the sad state of affairs in which the government has accepted high unemployment as normal. Gone are the days when we were horrified at an unemployment rate of 3 per cent or 4 per cent. Now the government seems to be saying that an unemployment rate of around 5 per cent or 6 per cent is normal and we will have to live with it.

In a country with the resources we have, not only natural but human in terms of skilled workers, that is a sad state of affairs and an admission by this Liberal government that it is bankrupt of ideas with regard to getting the economy stimulated and getting people back to work. Therefore, we will vote against this amendment and oppose it as strongly as we can.

There is another amendment which we find equally reprehensible. I refer to the amendment which would raise the disqualification period for workers who quit their jobs. The plan is to raise the disqualification period from three weeks to six weeks. We must remember, of course, that there is a two-week waiting period in addition. This will mean that the worker who quits his job or is fired will have an eight-week waiting period before he can claim unemployment insurance benefits.

The figures brought forward to justify this change are very interesting. The minister says that the annual rate of those leaving employment is 250,000 workers. I must remind hon. members that this is out of a work force of some 10 million people in this country. That places it in perspective. The annual rate of those who refuse suitable employment out of this work force of 10 million people is only 21,000 workers, or two-tenths of 1 per cent.

Why do people quit their jobs? The reason, I believe, the minister is bringing in this legislation is that he thinks these people are slack, they want to quit, they are not serious about work and want to take advantage of the program. I would like to see statistics to back this up. I am confident the minister could not produce such statistics. When we look at the reasons people leave their employment, we find that in the great majority of cases they have legitimate, valid reasons. For example, the pay may be too low. If an employee has been trying to get a raise over a period of months, and comes up against a stone wall where the employer refuses to give him a raise, and if this employee knows he is worth more than he is receiving, he should have the option to quit and look for another job.

By this amendment, such a person could be frozen into a job classification. This is discriminatory and unfair. It reminds us of the labour practices of the seventeenth century. There could be cases where the employer takes advantage of the worker. We can document many cases where employers have made, shall we say, passes at female employees. That is reprehensible. There are cases involving employers who have demanded that their employees work overtime without pay, or who have demanded that the employees perform certain jobs which are not classified as part of the regular employment.

Sometimes employers expect employees to perform personal favours for them, and so on. In those circumstances, I would say the employee who quits has a legitimate reason and therefore should have the option of quitting and not being disqualified from unemployment insurance. There are other reasons. Many workers have to quit because of health and working conditions. Near Sault Ste. Marie there is the community of Elliot Lake where the uranimum mines have caused many miners to come down with lung cancer due to silicosis. Would one deny a worker in such circumstances the opportunity to quit his job and receive unemployment insurance benefits?

So, of the 21,000 people who quit and refuse jobs, statistics show that in many cases the reasons are quite legitimate. Therefore, they should not be penalized in the way in which this amendment would penalize them by causing a longer waiting period. I think we should make it very clear that many people who find themselves in the position of having to quit are non-unionized workers. I might remind hon. members that only 33 per cent of the workers in this country belong to labour unions. The unorganized people in the low-paying jobs do not have any kind of bargaining power or back-up to protect their rights. It is they who are victimized by bad working conditions and low pay, and in many cases they have no choice but to quit or be fired if they want to improve their conditions. I must say this amendment is unfair because it discriminates against the unorganized workers in our society.

There is another amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act with which we also disagree. I cannot for the life of me see how this amendment which is to end the payment of benefits at age 65 will save the government very much money or prevent any kind of real abuse. Currently, unemployment insurance coverage ends at the age of 70 or earlier when a retirement pension becomes payable. What is so unfair about this amendment is, first of all, that those currently between age 65 and age 69 who are working and are insured under the unemployment insurance plan will be automatically cut off from any kind of benefits as a result of this amendment. There is not even the option of a phase-out period for people who in good faith and because of circumstances which have made it impossible for them to retire at 65 have had to stay in the labour force. They will be cut off from benefits in one fell swoop. As I mentioned earlier, those who want to work to the age of 70 at least will no longer have that option once the amendment is passed.

The argument presented by the Liberals for introducing this amendment is that they have taken care of people in their senior years by increasing the old age pension. I must remind them, of course, that that was during the term of a minority government when we forced them to do so. But they say they have increased pensions under the Canada Pension Plan and thus are taking care of people in that age bracket. I would like the minister to try to survive on an old age pension, on some of the Canada Pension Plan payments that retired workers are receiving in my constituency.

I have a horrendous problem in Sault Ste. Marie of zero vacancy rates in apartments. We do not have enough senior citizens' units, and these people are confronted daily with rate increases as well as rising costs of food and medicine. Many of them must continue to work beyond the age of 65. This government will remove that option from them and will remove protection through the Unemployment Insurance Act. I think it is most reprehensible when people who have contributed so much to the growth of our economy through their hard work, and have contributed by paying their premiums into the unemployment insurance scheme, suddenly at the age of 65 find themselves cut off from benefits and are unable to continue working with the security of unemployment insurance protecting them.

I think this government, despite all its claims about how it is interested in and wants to help senior citizens, shows its true spirit, through this amendment, in its attitude toward our older working people. Despite the groans from the Liberal backbenchers, I am sure they know that what I am saying is true because the older people in their constituencies have experienced it.

We also find another example of the niggardliness of this government in these times of high inflation. They have an amendment to reduce the payment to dependants of unemployed workers. Presently, the payments are 75 per cent of insurable earnings for lower paid claimants with dependants. The government is now introducing an amendment which will bring that payment down to 66⅔ per cent for precisely the people who are on low incomes and who are finding it so hard to survive in these days of inflation. On the other hand, if they become unemployed they will be penalized even further by the reduced rate of benefit as a result of this amendment. We say that this is unfair in principle. To try to argue that it will save the government a few dollars does not make sense. One has to take into account the human misery that will be caused to low income people who are unemployed. I agree with my colleagues that this provision should be withdrawn. We will argue that matter in committee.

There are a couple of points in the bill with which my colleagues and I are in agreement. We are not totally negative on the amendments. We are in agreement with the amendment which will extend the qualifying for benefit period. At present, the period in which all claimants may calculate their weeks of insured earnings to qualify for benefit is limited to 52 weeks. Under the proposed change, the qualifying period would be extended to a maximum of 104 weeks for special types of claimants. I am glad the minister has responded to the representations made by opposition members and has recognized that certain people need special consideration; for example, people who are on training courses for 52 weeks and cannot qualify for unemployment insurance premiums because they have not been working in the standard sense of the term in that 52-week period. So we see this move as a progressive step and will support it, as we will the amendments to provide for flexibility in the sickness benefit provisions under the plan.

I do not want to dwell on that matter in detail. Other of my colleagues will do that. I want to reiterate a simple and valid point, namely, that the bulk of the amendments brought forward by the Liberal government will really force working people to pay for high unemployment caused by the poor and misguided economic policies of this government. This government is giving up the fight on unemployment. It will make the workingman and the businessman in Canada carry the burden of high unemployment by increasing their employment insurance premiums. To add insult to injury, at the time when they are bringing forth these punitive and regressive amendments, this government is bringing in an anti-inflation policy that will control the workers' wages and limit their increases to 10 per cent, in the longer run creating higher unemployment which will reduce consumer spending, causing manufacturing industries to face a slump and lay off workers.

I think this government's legislation to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act is misguided and mistimed. I urge all hon. members to stand up and be counted in committee and on third reading and to vote against these unfortunate and regressive amendments which the minister is proposing in the bill.

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, in my brief contribution to this interesting debate I want to suggest that one of the more positive and forthright suggestions in the June 23 budget of the former minister of finance was that basic changes would be proposed in the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The minister pointed out that these changes were necessary for two basic and fundamental reasons: first, UIC costs to the government were becoming unwieldy and, second, the present Unemployment Insurance Act contains, and I quote, "some features which . . . have undesirable effects on work incentives."

Bill C-69, of course, is the instrument of the government to try to face up to our current UIC situation as indicated in the budget of last June. Various amendments are long overdue when we consider that the 1975 UIC pay-out will be approximately $4 billion, while the equivalent pay-out for similar uses in the United States for the year 1973 was about the same dollar figure. That is a most interesting comparison. Further, after three years' experience in my own constituency, the most frequent complaint I receive about UIC is that it is a disincentive to our time-honoured work ethic or, put more bluntly, it is a government institution which very often pays a person not to work.

I wish to begin by making a few comments relating to those three years of personal experience in the Medicine Hat federal constituency. First, however, I should point out that in a letter, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) indicated on August 29, 1975, that we in Medicine Hat had an unemployment rate of only 3.23 per cent, well below the 5 per cent start level for LIP projects, thereby establishing my constituency as eligible only for the minimum allocation of $100,000 for LIP financing. On this very day, by local estimates, my home city of Medicine Hat has some 480 unemployed persons and some 450 available jobs. I suppose it is a situation which could be construed as a negative unemployment rate.

Over these three years of operation of my constituency office, this UIC subject is still the topic brought to my attention most frequently, by a wide margin. The following are a few of the inequities which continue to come to my attention through my constituency office. There is a situation in smaller rural towns which precludes a worker from becoming eligible for benefits unless he moves to a different area to continue his job search routine. There is another situation where a husband is moved to a smaller area; his wife gives up her job to move with him and then runs into trouble establishing eligibility for benefits when she gives up that job.

The requirement of 20 insured weeks to qualify for sickness or pregnancy benefits can involve hardships which bear no relation to regular claims, which require only eight insured weeks with a much longer benefit period possible. There is an instance of a woman having a heart attack after 18 weeks and being unable to qualify for UIC benefits because she did not have the required 20 weeks of insured work. Again, in the case of sickness benefits, the regulation calling for a two-week waiting period after application is not clearly understood by many of those who apply, neither is the implication of a sickness claim which is only valid over the initial 15 weeks.

Overpayments are a continuing and often embarrassing source of annoyance. Surely some procedural improvement is possible here instead of the lame excuse of computer errors. These tempting overpayments invite illegal action by younger recipients and cause extreme frustration and annoyance to elderly people. The job search routine, especially during winter months, seems to present special frustrations to elderly workers which lead to misunderstanding and sometimes hardship.

I mention these specific experiences from my constituency office in order more fully to support the statement that in my opinion almost every UIC problem brought to my attention is a personal and private one to which it is difficult to apply the UIC regulations and difficult to categorize. It seems to me that some form of means test could be instituted to respond more completely to these personal and private situations to which I have referred. I do not suggest that this means test be applied to all UIC claims, only that it be an optional procedure which could very well be of great assistance to the board of referees.

I shall now make some brief comments on the bill itself. I fully support the proposal to increase the disqualification period from three to six weeks for those who quit, are fired or refuse suitable employment. I have heard some representations that this disqualification period should be extended even more. The decision of the government to raise the break-even benchmark for self-financing from 4 per cent unemployment to a moving eight-year unemployment average is a clear indication to me that this government has given up on our persistent and seemingly ever-increasing unemployment problem. It is an inward-looking, passive and unimaginative attitude which surely is not acceptable.

While it is true that the increased premiums to be shared by employers and employees, plus the added costs due to this increased benchmark for self-financing, will amount to a considerable saving to the government, it is really an added cost or tax of considerable magnitude to all employers and employees. The cost is still there, and as the press has already pointed out, this change in UIC financing could reach an additional total for 1976 from $800 million to $1 billion, more than double the recent ten-cent gasoline excise tax total.

Mr. Andras: Totally inaccurate.

Mr. Hargrave: This averages $89 or more per year for all Canadians who work for pay cheques. I wish to associate myself with my colleagues comments which suggest serious consideration should be given to moving the entire UIC policy back to the true insurance concept instead of the welfare mixture now offered, which is such an invitation to open abuse.

UIC policy should, surely, relate directly and be an incentive to an extended and continuing period in the work force. I have to admit to strong support for the call of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for a 20-week eligibility period. Such an incentive could easily be provided by reducing premium rates which vary directly with the length of service with a given employer and ultimately providing for paid-up insurance after long service with very few or limited benefit claims. I should also like to add my further support for the excellent suggestion that Manpower and UIC should work much more closely together, with the eventual merging of the two. I am sure there would be financial savings and a vast improvement in operation and efficiency of both agencies.

Before concluding, I should like to return to my earlier remarks which were based on my constituency experiences. It seems to me that a very useful and practical suggestion would be to make available at UIC offices a short, concise and abbreviated set of instructions to be followed in applying for UIC benefits. They would have to be concise. Finally, certain UIC officials should be encouraged to make occasional personal visits to the homes of UIC applicants who are genuinely concerned about developments that have caused real hardship over UIC claim decisions.

● (1720)

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-69. I should like to say to the minister that any mild criticisms I may have are certainly not directed to him personally. In any portfolio this minister has held I have always been able to talk to him and receive his co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: That is a lesson that could be learned by some other cabinet ministers. At no time have I ever brought a problem to his attention when he did not try to help.

Mr. Benjamin: But that didn't help.

Mr. Muir: In many cases it did help. I listened to the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) who raised the question of abuses. This has been referred to by other speakers. One point he did raise referred to clause 11 and the claiming procedure for sickness benefits which can be undertaken during the first 25 weeks on claim rather than the first 15 weeks. That is a step in the right direction. Unfortunately, I cannot say the same thing about all the proposed amendments.

The hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) raised a very good point. There is a popular misconception in this country that people like to go on unemployment insurance for 52 weeks, but the hon. member pointed out that the average for an individual on benefits is 16 weeks. He also said that the amendment referring to those people over 65 years of age would be understood by them. I do not think it will, Madam Speaker.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) also referred to abuses. He said this amendment would reduce the payments by the government. That is true; it loads them right on to the workingman and the businessman. He also referred to the amendment correcting abuses and said it rationalizes the plan. That is a vague statement. It rationalizes the plan to the extent that it unloads responsibility from the government on to workingmen and women.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) said he had heard nothing but contradictions from the opposition. I suppose in a democratic parliament one is liable to hear these opinions. Everyone has a right to express his viewpoint. The greatest contradiction of all occurred some months ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his supporters said that a restraint policy or a freeze would not work. Now they say it will and that the Canadian people have been overspending. So there is quite a change there. Of course, it has put the load on the back of the working people again: wages will be restricted, but not prices.

My colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), referred to unfilled jobs. I wish he would ship some of them down to the east coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: He mentioned such highly skilled positions as psychiatric assistants and technological people. That does not mean much to a man who works in the coal mine. He cannot take a position as a psychiatric assistant, but on second thought maybe he would know a lot more than the psychiatrist. The hon. member also said that officials at the Manpower centres were not too co-operative. I have been dealing with Manpower centres and Unemployment Insurance Commission offices over the years, Madam Chairman, and have received the greatest co-operation at all times. The officials have worked very hard. Mind you, we give them plenty of bother as there seems to be so much confusion in the regional offices, particularly the Moncton office. It is always blamed on the computer, but it is only as good as the information put into it. I hope someone will look at the Moncton office, because many people have difficulty making ends meet while waiting weeks for their benefits.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) raised the question of board of referees and said the chairman of the board of referees decides whether an applicant can appeal to the umpire. That is most unusual. I have had correspondence with a Mr. Guy Cousineau for a number of weeks concerning a Mr. Pickup. In a letter dated September 9, Mr. Cousineau wrote:

> In Mr. Pickup's case, it was determined that his interruption of earnings occurred as a direct result of a labour dispute and a suspension from benefits was imposed, under the act, from the outset of his claim. It was indicated that while the electricians employed by Magna Electric and Computers Limited were not interested in and were not financing the dispute, they respected the picket line of the striking union and were, therefore, considered to be participating in the labour dispute.

He certainly was not participating. He was unable to go to work. The company could not work because the other trades were on strike. I wrote Mr. Cousineau again on the question of why the chairman of the board of referees would have such great power. He had sat on the case already, and he made the decision as to whether it could go any further. That was most unfair. If he had said it could go to the umpire he would really have been saying he had been wrong in the beginning. In the same letter, Mr. Cousineau wrote:

> The unemployment insurance legislation provides that an employee who ceases to work by reason of a stoppage of work, attributable to a labour dispute, is not entitled to benefit for the duration of the stoppage of work, unless he can establish that he is not participating, financing or directly interested in the dispute—

The workingman I am speaking of was not participating, was not financing and was not directly interested. However, he never got his money. I hope this might be discussed and gone into a little further. I repeat that I agree with the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre on that point.

There is one other matter I would like to mention, the question of having to indicate to the Unemployment Insurance Commission that you have searched for a job in four or five places. As far as I am concerned the official employment agency in Canada is Canada Manpower. It is supposed to have its finger on the pulse of industry, knowing every place that workers may be needed. If they cannot find employment how can they expect an individual to find it?

An individual must apply for work at four or five different places. If there are no jobs available he must ask for a letter saying that he has applied. In an area like mine it is absolutely ridiculous. You can wear out your feet looking for a job. You just cannot find one. I wish I were in the enviable position of some hon. members who referred to their areas having too many job vacancies.

In any given area there is a percentage of people who will not work. Even if you take them in your arms and place them in a job, they will not work. However, that is not the case in my area. We have a rate of unemployment of between 25 and 30 per cent. If there are 5 or 8 per cent who will not work when there is full employment, that still is no excuse for those for whom jobs are not provided.

Before leaving the comments of different members I want to say that I agree with much of what was said by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. But the rest was pure socialist drivel, particularly when he said "Of course if we were a civilized democratically planned Christian socialist society, there would be no need for unemployment insurance." That is the same phoney drivel we always get from the socialist party. They say that the hard-hearted Liberals, hard-hearted Conservatives, and hard-hearted Social Credit members do not have a bit of feeling for the working people or for anyone who has a problem. It is only they, wrapped in their cloak, who would be presumptuous enough to say they originated Christianity. That is going a bit far.

Mr. Leggatt: Stanley was in at the beginning.

Mr. Muir: There may be a few misplaced clergymen in their party, but that does not make them any more Christian than any other party in this House. I just wanted the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre to know how I feel about his comment.

Mr. Benjamin: I appreciate it.

Mr. Muir: When the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich was speaking about draft dodgers, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) made an interjection to the effect that those aged 65 and over were work dodgers, or words to that effect.

An hon. Member: He did not say work dodgers, he said work makers.

Mr. Muir: Are you the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain?

An hon. Member: No, but I would like to be.

Mr. Muir: It was the inflated member for Hamilton Mountain who made the interjection. It is a pretty sad commentary on those 65 and over who have contributed to this country for a lifetime. Many of those over 65 are still working. They certainly should not be referred to as work dodgers. That is a bit serious to make that kind of remark.

Bill C-69 is nothing more than a government rip off against the people of this nation to whom the government pledged it would give the greatest possible protection. It more and more produces evidence that Liberal times are hard times. The workers of this nation will pay the bill for the government's almost unbelievable incompetence and ineptitude in managing the economy of the country.

The government created unemployment just a few short years ago. It said that that was the answer. We were told that by creating unemployment it would remedy the economy of the country. It got on a downhill slide. It is now having to take more and more money from the working men and women of this country to pay for the problem it has created.

We have moved from an unemployment insurance scheme that was actuarially sound and only in trouble in times of deep recession to one that has become an added tax on most of the work force and most businesses. While the workingman and the businessman have to pay the bill they have little to say about the size of that bill. Most derive absolutely no benefit from the tax they pay.

Since 1968 the government with its Trudeaucrats has completely obliterated the image meticulously developed that Liberals, and only Liberals, are the competent managers of the economy. They like to blast the Diefenbaker administration every chance they get. However, those who examine the performance of that administration yearn for that administration that year after year produced a rate of inflation of less than 1 per cent. What is the rate of inflation at this time? The Diefenbaker administration scored triumph after triumph in developing our increased gross national product, while at the same time finding jobs for the many thousands who entered the work force. Since this minister is also in charge of immigration, he will remember the situation in Europe in 1956 when several hundred thousand hit the labour market of this country.

The government goes to any length to transfer its major miscalculations to others. No group of Canadians, including the poor and the aged, are exempt from its mad dash to eliminate the responsibility for its mistakes.

It is hard to believe that Bill C-69 clearly sets out that those 65 years of age and over will not receive benefits under the amended UIC legislation. It clearly discriminates against them. What an achievement, laying it on the backs of the older people of this country.

Approximately 5,000 Canadians will either be forced out of the work force or find it difficult to continue working. This is being done for a miserly saving of $3 million. The taxpayers' contribution to bolster the fund to meet the demand of claimants runs from $1,750 million to $2 billion, depending on how high the rate of inflation goes.

This legislation says to the working men and women who have trouble keeping pace with skyrocketing inflation that it will be made more severe, or that their pay cheques will be that much thinner as a result of this added tax or higher contribution. They are also told that inflation will be promoted by higher costs for the products they will purchase in the market place. The businessman will have to go to the same market place to recover the same payments he must make to the fund. And those sums are not to be sneezed at—they are expected to be in the area of $800 million to $1 billion next year, amounting to an average extra tax on every person paying into the fund equal to some $89 yearly.

Mr. Andras: Completely inaccurate.

Mr. Muir: Well, the minister will have his opportunity to speak when he takes part in the debate later on. If the unemployment bench mark moves from the present 4 per cent to 5.3 per cent, it is expected the breakdown will be something like $443 million from employers and $317 million from workers; it could well be more if the unemployment rate jumps above the present 7.2 per cent to 8 per cent or higher.

Also, it is nothing short of rank discrimination against the worker to tell him he will face a six weeks disqualification if he quits his job. That amounts to a month and a half plus the two-week waiting period, after which he has to face the delays and the letters couched in legalese, involved language, and bureacratic jargon. That is one of the points I should like to comment on. For Heaven's sake let them get down to using normal language in these letters they send out to claimants instead of language which even lawyers sometimes fail to understand.

The minister would be doing a good service to the working people of Canada if he would instruct his staff to get down to earth and put the statements contained in their letters and documents into language people can understand. However, I was talking about the delay occasioned by long delays in payments. Not many workers can accept an attack on their limited savings for six or eight weeks.

Then again there can be many reasons for leaving employment. I appreciate, of course, that there should be investigations associated with such cases, but I believe each case should be treated individually and action taken on individual cases as warranted. The amendment put forward smacks of total discrimination against the worker and places a valuable weapon in the hand of the employer. Some hon. members may ask why. Well, I still have my little card from the National Employment Service; I am not as old as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I do have the card. I was among the lucky ones; fortunately, I never had to draw unemployment insurance benefits, unlike millions of other Canadians.

When investigations and so on are in progress, a weapon is immediately put into the hands of employers. I have run into a number of employers across the country who have said to people in their work force, "Either do this, or that, or you are not with us any more". The task indicated might be altogether apart from the work the man is supposed to do. As I say, there can be many reasons which compel a man to leave his job. This is an area which should be carefully analyzed and each case should be judged on its merits.

[Mr. Muir.]

I wish to say a few words now about abuses. It is a favourite topic. Like every other member of the House I do not condone abuses of the unemployment insurance fund and I favour every step being taken to eliminate the blood suckers. I state definitely that I will support every effort by the minister to prevent abuses of the fund, because the more abuses there are the harder it is for those with legitimate claims to get their claims recognized. Abuse creates suspicion in the minds of those who work within the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They are apt to approach claims with the attitude that the claimant is probably just another character trying to get money which is not really due to him. As a result the applicant with a legitimate case is screened carefully, and settlement of his claim is likely to be delayed as well.

Sometimes we can overdo this concern about abuses. As the hon. member for St. Catharines said, everyone seems to think that once a worker's claim to benefit is allowed he remains in receipt of benefit for 50 weeks or 52 weeks. That is not correct. The average period is 16 weeks. And often, because of some bureaucratic difficulty about which an innocent claimant is not aware, payments come to an end.

I represent an area which, unfortunately, has consistently returned an unemployment rate running two or three times the national average. Unemployment insurance benefits are absolutely essential in order to maintain the work force during periods of trouble which never seem to cease to plague the area. We also have a great many older citizens within the work force, and because of the continuing high rate of unemployment and the inability of workers to move from one job to another—simply because the opportunities are not there, unlike the situation in other parts of the nation—the legislation before us is bound to discriminate against older members of the work force and place employers in a position to threaten the work force with the weapon of six weeks' disqualification.

Yesterday the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) made a suggestion which I believe to be worthy of consideration. In the course of his remarks he said:

> We should have a scheme whereby those who work and never draw benefits but pay into the fund day after day, year in and year out, would be able to receive some benefit in a realistic way at the end of their working careers. If they work continually and contribute to the fund they should derive some benefit for the contributions they have made over a lifetime.

I am not an actuarial expert; in fact I am not an expert in anything, but I think something along these lines could be worked out and I commend the suggestion to the minister. There are many millions of people who contribute to the fund week after week and year after year without drawing benefit, and possibly a certain proportion of the fund could be set aside for such a purpose as my hon. friend proposed. At the end of their working lives they would receive a payment in some form, taking into consideration the size of the amount which had been taken from the fund. The amount would be based on the record. Such a scheme might discourage people from drawing a benefit needlessly; they might well look ahead and say. "The time may come when I shall need some extra help when I choose to retire."

Let us consider some of the reaction to this bill. This is from the Gazette of June 28, 1975, and the writer is Don McGillivray, a financial analyst:

> The change in unemployent insurance financing faces Canadian employees and employers with an additional tax burden at least twice as heavy as the extra tax on gasoline . . . this extra payroll tax under the new formula may reach $800 million to $1 billion next year. The new tax load will amount to an average of $89 or more a year on the wages and salaries of all Canadians who work for a pay check.

Then there are the comments of Joe Morris, President of the C.L.C., in a press release on July 21. He said of the proposal that:

● (1750)

> Low income workers chiefly will bear the burden of longer penalty periods, elimination of benefit for workers age 65 and other money saving provisions . . . It appears that the government seeks to slowly but surely reduce the social security protection now afforded Canadians by the social legislation it has taken the trade union movement and kindred groups so many years to establish.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-69, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971. This amending legislation introduces a new class of insurable employment.

Any member that will listen to his constituents will know that unemployment, or at least the lack of steady revenue, is a continuing concern and a day-to-day problem with thousands of Canadians.

Unemployment figures published monthly by Statistics Canada make the headlines each time there is an increase. Surveys show unemployment is always the most urgent and dramatic problem in the people's mind.

Amendments made by the government to the Unemployment Insurance Act, either to add to or delete from classes of claimants are but useless patchwork, not to say harmful patchwork. The way the government amends the act, it would appear that by changing drivers it believes its jalopy will become a Cadillac. The engine is worn out, all four tires are flat, the suspension is finished, the transmission whines, but the government seems to think that by changing drivers, everything will be better.

Bill C-69 is the latest of a series. The government realizes the unemployment insurance program is inadequate, but rather than bringing the scheme on a sounder and more logical foundation, it introduces minor amendments that do nothing to meet the real needs and expectations of Canadians.

Before discussing one by one the amendments proposed in Bill C-69, it is essential in my view to note that the minister and the government as a whole do not understand the meaning and the nature of the unemployment problem now facing Canada. This lack of understanding of the actual causes of unemployment explains why this government is bringing in such a ridiculous legislation as Bill C-69.

The first distinction the government seems unable to make is the one between "unemployed" and "without income". The government has always made known its wish to achieve full employment. Not so long ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made quite a radical statement saying that if the government had the power to do what it pleases, it could put an end to unemployment by compelling workers to go where jobs are available.

If you apply this principle a little further, you end up with hard labour camps in the Arctic, which would not fail to please the Prime Minister who expressed all his admiration during his trip to Soviet Union for developments in Siberia.

We know that the work there has been done by millions of people sentenced to hard labour by the Moscow dictatorship. The basic principle guiding the government in the face of unemployment is to seek full employment. A job for everyone is the priority of this government. However, the real unemployment problem, the real tragedy of millions of unemployed Canadians is not to be without a job, but to be without a regular income.

Let us consider the unemployed. What is their problem? They do not have any money. They cannot buy the bread and butter needed to feed their family. They cannot buy the clothing and all the items required to keep their family warm and secure. It is always a matter of money. Even this government which would have us believe that the individual problem of unemployment can be solved through full employment. It is recognized that the real problem of the unemployed is primarily one of income. In fact, when it came to taking action against unemployment, the government established unemployment insurance benefits to provide an income to those without any.

It is then obvious that what is considered as an unemployment insurance problem is actually an income problem. Even if the government made a step forward by recognizing, maybe unknowingly, that the jobless must have an income, the efforts in this field are still based on the false principle that full employment or the fact of giving a job to everyone is the final solution to the unemployment problem.

Brought to its logical conclusion, that principle would disregard all technical progress which resulted in the elimination of some occupations. Power shovels would be replaced by labourers with pick and shovel. Farm tractors would be replaced by horses. Finally, a man will be substituted for a horse since it would take a job from another man.

With this foolish rule, we will soon return to the prehistoric age when a man did everything manually. This is the conclusion, Madam Speaker, to which leads full employment. A machine can do in ten minutes the work and production of 1,000 men. Now, Madam Speaker, what remains to be done? Destroy that machine and make a man work very hard. Madam Speaker, may I say that it is six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying just before recess at six o'clock: Is it logical? Is it clever? And yet, it stems from the principle of full employment. For years, the Social Credit Party has been advocating a guaranteed minimum income. The important thing, is to put into the hands of the people an income that will enable them to buy the products available in Canada. When 1,000 workers are laid-off because technology and progress dictate that they should be replaced by one machine that will do their work ten times faster, what are we to do? Destroy the machine on account of the absurd principle of full employment, because it deprives 1,000 men of their work, or distribute to these workers replaced by the machine the income derived from the use of a more efficient and more profitable means of production?

Because the government advocates full employment rather than efficiency and productivity, thousands of Canadians are kept in useless jobs. Instead of giving them their share of the machine-made production, machines are scrapped and men put to work needlessly. An unemployment rate of 7 to 8 per cent means that the entire production can be made available 92 per cent of the available manpower.

Dr. Richard Belman, an American specialist of production methods stated that the entire present production could be obtained with 2 per cent of the present manpower. In other words, the products we now have could be available with a 98 per cent rate of unemployment. This could be made possible if the government was not fighting technological progress and advances.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the problem to be solved is how to distribute to all those removed from the production process an income that will allow them to benefit from the abundance of products available to them thanks to automation. That is the challenge we have to meet now in Canada. The government should stop listening to such stupid economists who say: Better employ people at digging ditches they will fill afterwards, than not employing them at all.

Mr. Speaker, the government should rather listen to the solutions proposed by Social Crediters and free Canadians from the tasks machines can do in their place. In a coherent system, the machine must be at the service of man, not man at the service of the machine. To the extent that they make it possible to distribute to the unemployed an income which enables them to buy the many products available, unemployment insurance benefits are acceptable and desirable. Unfortunately, the Unemployment Insurance Act, like the amendments discussed today for that matter, is too often only a means of placing workers in the power of the government and civil servants. Mr. Speaker, in 1973, no fewer than 92,871 Canadians were disqualified from unemployment insurance benefits under Unemployment Insurance Act regulation 145 alone, because an almighty civil servant considered that they had not sought employment actively enough.

In 1974 the number of disentitlements was over 93,000. This is only one example and we could give many more. Thus, the provision of Bill C-69 now under study which will double the penalty for an individual who voluntarily quits his job is just another measure which does not consider the particular situation of each individual. And what shall we say about the fact that Bill C-69 takes away from people aged 65 their rights to benefits? It is an unacceptable measure and I would be tempted to support the hon. member who suggested to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) who had proved his openmindedness by proposing at least five amendments aiming at significantly improving the Unemployment Insurance Act, that he should consider the possibility of giving workers aged 65 or over the opportunity to express their desire to withdraw from the unemployment insurance plan, to receive the three weeks' benefits provided for in the government's bill and to allow all those who wish to continue working to pay premiums, which means accepting all responsibilities and obligations stemming from the plan.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be logical for the minister to move this amendment to the legislation. The government has no right to say to people of 65 or over: "Go away from the labour market, we have no more room for you." The UIC cases submitted to us by our constituents can be counted by the hundreds within a month. The root cause of the problem is an administrative decision or the interpretation of a nebulous regulation by officials who suffer from delusions of grandeur. Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, one has to go all the way up to the department to get justice and have the mistakes corrected.

By the way, I would like to thank the minister for the cases I submitted to him and which have been settled to the advantage of the claimants. Last May 5 I submitted to the minister five cases which the Unemployment Insurance Commission office of my riding could not settle and the minister really proved to be very helpful to us. But I have to point out that a more logical and realistic system would probably put an end to all those problems which are extremely annoying for the members of the four parties in the House.

That is why I believe that the government should listen to the suggestions made by Socred members and should consider a thorough reform not only of the unemployment insurance plan but also of the whole economic system. If the government, instead of trying to achieve full employment by eliminating the abundance that would result from a greater productivity thanks to an improved technology, would give to the people the financial means and the purchasing power required to buy the available production, the problem of unemployment insurance would be completely solved. With the machine, people would gradually free themselves of manual jobs and they could develop more and more and improve the country through creative and rewarding activities. Some people believe that a system based on the distribution of a national dividend to all individuals depending on the available production would be a disincentive to work.

As the Social Credit leader said: Show me only one lazy millionnaire. It means that the individual who has the income he needs will automatically be hard working instead of being lazy. Social Credit would not discourage private enterprise as does the present system. Unlike the present system, Social Credit would not compel the individual who draws benefits to stay at home and decline work offers. In a Social Credit system, the individual would receive his national dividend and would be encouraged to add this amount to his salary.

Social Credit proposes a modern system taking into account technical progress and human nature. The individual benefits from technical progress through national dividends and is encouraged to add this amount to anything he can earn through personal initiative. And being paid to everyone this dividend will be fair to all Canadians. That is the Social Credit alternative!

I ask this government now that we are studying Bill C-69 concerning unemployment insurance to review its position and the basic principles upon which its obsolete unemployment insurance system lays. I am sure it is also the wish of all Canadians who believe in the future of their country.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite interesting to take part in this debate, not to advocate revolutionary solutions, nor to attack an opposition far more bent on criticizing the bill than finding out advantages for the population, but simply, Mr. Speaker, to remind hon. members that the philosophy underlying unemployment insurance is sometimes misunterstood. Unfortunately, in too many circles that legislation is misinterpreted. I am not contending that opposition members are the only ones responsible for those misinterpretations, and I, as a government member, take my share of the blame for the view, prevalent among the public, that unemployment insurance is a form of social assistance.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time for politicians to assume a minimum of responsibilities and tell people frankly why we introduced and passed that act. To some people, especially claimants, it is too stringent a legislation. Those who draw unemployment insurance benefits claim, sometimes rightly, that the waiting period before they can be paid benefits is too long.

Several mentioned it, my friends in the opposition pointed it out, and sometimes rightly so. It is normal that the person who applies to the UIC should not have to wait too long before getting the money he needs most of the time to secure his right to live. And I deplore that on many occasions the system set up does not achieve the normal objectives that the people have a right to expect. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether behind that bureacracy, those electronic machines probably designed to improve the legislation, did not accomplish exactly the opposite in certain quarters.

An hon. Member: That is also true.

Mr. Marceau: I think we should gradually come back to a more human approach towards the claimant who, after all, finds himself in an extremely difficult situation, through his fault or not, whether he quit his job voluntarily or was laid off because no job was available for him. Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to try and find within our system, which theoretically is excellent, some means to improve it and make it more effective. May I be allowed to make a suggestion to hon. members. I had the opportunity this afternoon to discuss with the manager of my local UIC office. He told me that they made an experiment in our area. They sent to 100 persons chosen at random notices informing them that they would no longer be getting their unemployment insurance benefits, without giving them the reason for that decision. Out of the 100 persons who received that notice only 50 answered and objected and asked for an explanation. Then they were simply told, very well, you can have your unemployment insurance back.

This seems to show that the mail delivery system for cheques seems to be used by several claimants to receive benefits that do not belong to them. I come to the conclusion, and the manager agrees with me, that it would be a good thing to revert to the system under which the claimant must come and collect his cheque. Of course, this requires a measure of decentralization, opening offices closer to the people so that they would not have to cover long distances to collect their cheques. But I think this would make the act more effective and ensure that those who come to collect their cheques are entitled to them. And I make that suggestion in a constructive way. I do not want to find fault with the public in general nor with the claimants, but it seems to me that here we have a problem which could be solved by reaching two objectives: making the law more humane and perhaps avoiding greater expenses, since this is one of the goals we are aiming at with the legislation we brought in and with the amendments we are putting before the House.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the unemployment insurance concept, as people understand it, was warped in certain quarters.

Mr. Speaker, I think I should recall that unemployment insurance is an insurance, as the name says. It is temporary insurance made available to those who are on the labour market but cannot immediately find employment.

I think I was repeating what every hon. member could say when I said that some people come to us and insist that they paid unemployment insurance for months and for years and that they have a right to get benefits as long as provided by the act. Mr. Speaker, I think it is time we emphasize in no uncertain terms that unemployment insurance is a right of recipients, but in given circumstances.

The first condition to be met by the claimant is what my friend opposite, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) did not seem to take into account when he spoke about people who had been excluded because they did not take the necessary steps. Mr. Speaker, it is elementary!

A few months or a few years ago, you only had to stop working, stay home, complete a form and wait for your cheque for a certain number of weeks, most often, the maximum number provided, as though it was due to you.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is absolutely essential and moreover normal to ask the claimant not only to register with the manpower office, but also to look for a job.

Obviously, people must exercise some judgment and common sense in looking for a job. It is impossible to ask the claimant to go personally to prospective employers dozens of times every week, but he must make an effort, he is not required to find a job, but only to cooperate in looking for work and to show, by his availability and his efforts, that he is interested in finding a job.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to touch on an extremely sensitive aspect of this legislation, a point about which many members have expressed their views. I believe that it is my duty to try to explain my opinion about the provision which, if passed, would prevent people aged 65 from receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that those who say that we do not respect people who are retired distort the meaning of this legislation. It is precisely because we have consideration and respect for people who are 65 that we are passing this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that a 65 year old citizen who has worked for society deserves to be no longer in the obligation of working hard to earn his living and support himself and his family. We believe that he has reached an age where he deserves certain benefits from society which will allow him to live comfortably without having to earn a living.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is normal to say to an individual who has reached age 65: "You can obtain the old age security pension, the supplement as well as your superannuation fund or an annuity. You can even work if you wish." There is every kind of opportunity and assistance for people who are 65 years old.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suggest that those measures are perfect, that they are sufficient and enable the 65 year-olds to live in wealth and affluence. No, I do not say so. But I feel there are some who play politics by saying to those people: "Through that legislation the government wants to harm you and does not understand your problems." That is not responsible nor honest. I think it is essential to say to those people: "The Unemployment Insurance Act is a legislation meant to protect the worker." It is designed for the worker just as the old age security pension is not paid to those who are 45, 50 or 62; we pay it to people of 65. It would be abnormal to give people of 65 years and over the same benefits available to those under 65. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the people over 65 would understand this bill if someone explained it to them frankly and made it clear to them that it is intended to do away with the confusion which exists in this act at the present time and to help those who are now on the labour market and are temporarily unable to find a job. It may happen that a person will pay premiums all his or her life without ever collecting unemployment insurance benefits, but he or she should rejoice for having had the courage, the luck and the good fortune of working and earning a living without living off the State.

With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is possible in all fairness and honesty to understand that the purpose of this bill is to put unemployment insurance back in its true perspective. I even wonder at times if we did not go a little too far in this legislation by trying to accommodate, to please everyone, to the extent where it has lost its real purpose, that of helping those who are temporarily out of work. I say it again, we do not aim at depriving other needy citizens of what other forms of assistance may be at their disposal. But the fact remains, and I am convinced of this, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments proposed, in addition to achieving real savings, tie in with the objectives the act should achieve, to make it easier for those who are entitled to benefits to get them while preventing those who try to take undue advantage of the act from doing so through appropriate penalties.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not meet with the approval of all categories of citizens since it affects some of them.

This legislation is the expression of a minister's feelings in an attempt to put some order in a measure that had gone beyond its objectives and had lost a little of its orientation. We are returning to a legislation that seems to me more just, more honest.

I hope hon. members will understand that since I represent a working class, I am in a position to understand the meaning of the statement I am making this evening, the importance it can have among my constituents. But I believe I am honest enough to express it very sincerely so that they will know that if I accept to vote in favour of this measure it is because I believe it will help the worker, because he is the one who pays for it, he is the one who has the right to request the government to find ways to reduce unemployment insurance costs. Often the worker says: the laws enacted by the government are not helping us. I feel this is a law that will help the worker. Clearly, there will be an extra cost but the savings made thanks to the proposed amendments may show we are going in the right direction.

To conclude, I would urge those of my constituents that might read these remarks to cooperate with us in trying to find those who rip off the program. Too often, people call our constituency offices and state they know of people receiving benefits unduly. But when asked for names, they will not say because "they wish no harm to anybody". I hope people will understand that in so doing, they would help us fulfill the true goals of the act.

People must help us, they must try and understand that we want to go in the right direction. If it turned out that the bill did not meet its aims, if it were more harm than good, I would be the first to say so. Because I belong to a party in which I am not forced to blindly accept any proposals, a party that allows me to discuss matters. We may make mistakes, but I do not believe we are making one now. We are going to pass the bill, and if it does not really help those we wish to help, I believe we should and will bring in further amendments.

For this reason, I fully support the bill. I hope that, if it does not bring the expected results, the government will introduce other amendments to make the act more efficient, more honest and more helpful to the unemployed.

[English]

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to enter into the debate on this bill with regard to unemployment insurance because of the involvement I have had over the past three years with the people in my riding who wonder just what is going on in the field of unemployment insurance. We need only look at the record to see that something is certainly wrong and has been wrong because the cost of our unemployment insurance scheme in Canada is now up to approximately $4 billion, which is up from $1.8 billion in 1972, or an increase of 186 per cent in the past three years.

In 1972 unemployment insurance made up 1.51 per cent of the gross national product. In 1975 we see it as 2.72 per cent of the gross national product, and when we consider that Canada, with just over 20 million people, has a cost of unemployment insurance the same as the United States with over 200 million people we begin to wonder what really is taking place.

We read in the Vancouver Province of June 19, 1975, headlines indicating that Ottawa will not compel workers to take jobs. We read that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) told the Senate Committee examining federal manpower policy that the government will not force workers to accept jobs they do not want. In a riding such as mine this sort of thing makes people very uptight, especially when they know about UIC ski teams and when they see young people walking around the cities or on the beach having a good time in the sun. They know there is 20 per cent unemployment in the Okanagan Valley, and that the mines and the lumber mills in the area cannot get enough people to work. No wonder a statement such as this makes them uptight and they write to their member of parliament.

We also hear of many abuses of the unemployment insurance scheme, and I get many complaints from my constituents. Maybe not all are legitimate but some of them are, and people are very concerned.

I think we must decide whether this should be a welfare scheme or an insurance scheme, Mr. Speaker. I submit it is really a welfare scheme. It has taught people not to work and, as a result, we are losing the work ethic in Canada.

I know that the unemployment insurance offices have people in the field trying to police the scheme, but in most cases it is the innocent who get caught. Some people have worked 20 or 30 years, have paid into the scheme, and for some reason find themselves unemployed. Then they have to fall back on unemployment insurance. These people are not experienced in beating the system and we know that those who are experienced in this sort of thing are hard to catch. The easy ones are caught and an example is made of them. Usually they are quite innocent people who do not know how to manipulate the system.

At the moment there is a post office strike and some unemployment insurance offices are open on Saturdays so that people can get their cheques. In my riding the first day they were open 45 per cent of the people did not pick up their cheques. We do not even know if they are still in the country. Why should they not pick up their cheques? This seems to suggest that a lot of people are abusing the system. They might not even be in the area or could be out working—they could even have two or three different names on the list.

The strike has taught us that we should stop mailing these cheques. People should go to the office to pick up their payment. After all, they are unemployed and should have more time than anybody else. They should be available when the payment is ready.

The Manpower offices and unemployment insurance offices should be put together, with an emphasis on Manpower. Shortly after I was elected I went into the new federal building in Kelowna to visit the Manpower office and the unemployment insurance office. The latter was on the second floor and very easy to get at, but the Manpower office was on the third floor and down a hall at the back end of the building. I think the reverse should be the rule, with the Manpower office easy to find, not the unemployment insurance office.

I should like to read a letter from one of my constituents which originally appeared in the Penticton Herald. I think it points out what I am talking about. It is headed "A Mother Pleads For Help", and reads as follows:

In a check out line at a local grocery store today, I was behind five husky, beautifully tanned young men who made their food purchases with food vouchers. They reminded me of construction workers with their big brown bodies—or beach bums—and I here confess, without facts, I suspected the latter. Later I watched them drive away in a late 1960 auto.

I watched too, the faces of the young female clerk and even younger packer as they put the groceries in bags and did the necessary signing of forms. When my turn came, I commented that it was unbelievable that five healthy males would need food vouchers with local orchardists begging for pickers . (My own 15 and 12 year olds are picking cherries part of a day). The clerk said it really "gets you down" when you see as many as ten some days going through her checkout alone.

So when I got home, I phoned Human Resources and asked how this was possible. The gentleman told me transients are given food vouchers of $5 only when they have proof that are going to a job. (In my cynical manner I wondered how they check up on that!!) I told the chap I was annoyed. No one minds widows and orphans, but adult healthy males are another thing. I told him of the faces and feelings of the working folk I had observed, and became more annoyed as I talked.

He finally said, "How would you feel if you had a job to go to and no money for food?" Now how, thought I, can he possibly know the total facts about a person, after an hour's interview—even days of interviewing? I am not the only one who thinks emotionally and irrationally, without knowing all the facts at times. So do trained social workers and governments who propose and pass legislation on an emotional basis.

My answer to him was fact, I believe. These young men knew yesterday that they would have to eat today. They were intelligent (to take advantage of a system) and educated; they spoke and wrote and drove a car.

And that reminded me of our recent holiday and a notice we read while deep in the Oregon mountains, where the beautiful cheeky Stellar's blue jays ate right out of our hands. It said, "Please do not feed the wild life. By doing so, you attract unusually large numbers to the area, which in turn over use and destroy their environment. The animals gradually forget to forage for themselves. The squirrels and chipmunks forget to store food. When the winter comes, they will destroy themselves. In other words, your charity can kill them."

We are not so concerned with our environment, yet here we go, disturbing and destroying our human ecology. For the saddest thing about this whole story is not what we have given to those young men, but what we are taking away from them. We have taken away their ability to face a problem and think their own way out of a dilemma. We are conditioning young people to a reliance on the state to solve problems, and this is an erosion of the individual's independence and responsibility. Again we have taken away pride and self respect, proof of which is the acceptance of charity while able to work.

But the greatest thing we have taken away from them is their "spirit," the life blood of any nation. And so sadly, and by and far, more dangerous, this same "spirit" is what I watched, fading from the faces and speech of the young clerks in the grocery store, by a system which no longer rewards healthy minds and bodies at work, but instead taxes them to death, both physically and mentally. Yes, it does "get you down." No wonder there is a tremendous increase in artificially "blotted spirits" and prescribed, or otherwise, drugs.

This epistle must cease. My 12 year old has just come bounding through the door, proudly announcing he earned $5 picking cherries today. Please society—you and I—let's not kill his spirit with irrational kindness.

This lady has put it very well. I might say that a tremendous number of copies of this letter to the editor were sent to me. It sets out very well what is happening in my constituency.

Unemployment insurance should be a program that helps people when going from one job to another. It should be an insurance scheme. Other members of my party have ably pointed out the salient points of this bill. Those aged 65 will no longer receive benefits. I do not know how the government rationalizes that when all that will be saved will be approximately $3 million.

I received a telephone call today from one of my constituents who is approaching the age of 65. He has paid into the unemployment insurance plan all his life. Now that he is about to retire, he will not receive any benefit. He will not receive the full Canada Pension Plan benefits because he has not been on the plan long enough. He has paid into the unemployment insurance plan and feels he should receive some benefit. Under the regulations he must be looking for a job in order to enjoy the benefits.

I had to agree with this person that there are many people who receive unemployment insurance most of the time. They only have to work for two months to receive the benefits. Even though they have to wait eight weeks, that is not much of a hardship for many of those who do not want to work. If they know how to manipulate the system they can go for a year or even better without working. They do what they know best, and that is what we are teaching them, namely, to watch work. I often say that I like work so well that I can sit and watch it all day. This man knows what is going on. He feels that be is being discriminated against. I have to agree with him as the amount that will be saved is low.

The low income worker is the one who will be hurt. The cost of it is being put on to the backs of the poor. It is not designed to save a great amount of money, to get people used to the work ethic again, or find jobs for those who are unemployed.

I do not wish to delay this debate. However, I do want to point out that I feel this is just a housekeeping bill. It will help the government solve some of its problems by putting the cost on to individuals, businessmen, and companies. There is no doubt about it, it is just another tax. It is a regressive tax. The business people and companies will not be pleased when they see what is going to happen to them. They may not understand it now, but they will certainly understand it when they see how much it is going to cost them. My friends from the NDP say—

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Whittaker: I am sorry. I must explain that a Liberal member, another socialist from British Columbia, is sitting with the NDP. I thought the NDP had learned not to heckle me. I think they have learned that. Possibly this Liberal member has come over so that I will be able to hear him.

As I was saying, I do not think that the amendments in this bill will do the job that is necessary. It has taken the Liberal government a long time to introduce it. I have been waiting three years to say something about the unemployment insurance scheme. It has taken them a long time to bring down anything we can debate.

I sincerely believe something should be done about this massive welfare-type scheme we have in Canada. A board of inquiry should be set up to determine exactly what is going on in the field. It is not easy for politicians and legislators to do this, especially when we are deeply involved in helping people almost on a daily basis as a result of the complicated way in which the scheme is run. In my opinion there ought to be a properly set up board of inquiry to find out just what is going on, and present a report so that we can make proper and necessary changes.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the speeches made by a number of hon. members today. I get the impression—it may not be correct—that it is almost like having a free vote in the House; in our approach to the bill we tend to reflect the demography of our own constituencies. If it happens to be a highly labour-intensive constituency where there is a lot of unemployment, then regardless of its geographical location we tend to reflect the specific problems of that constituency. I think this is admirable and I am not being critical.

We have heard in the House during the last few days speeches which reflect deep concern not just over Bill C-69 but over the whole approach we are making to social questions and social security. We have listened to hon. members who represent the wide open spaces in Alberta. We have listened to members who represent poor ridings, comparatively speaking, in Atlantic Canada, and we have heard them almost crossing party lines in terms of philosophy. I shall not mention any hon. member specifically but I am very impressed by this kind of scattered approach which expresses the attitudes of individual members concerned about the effects of a bill such as Bill C-69. There are extremes in this country which cross party lines.

As for myself, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of crossing either parties or party lines this evening. I happen to represent a constituency which is primarily urban, primarily labour oriented. We are not experiencing high unemployment but we do find unemployment running close to the national figure. We have been through bad times; we have seen times much worse than they are at present.

Though in terms of social philosophy unemployment insurance is both desirable and necessary I must state at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is one of the most poorly managed of all federal government agencies. I suggest without equivocation that the commission and its regional and branch offices have displayed an inordinate propensity to err, to be disrespectful toward claimants, and at times to show an almost total disregard for people's sensitivities at a time of financial crisis.

I believe the state has a moral obligation to assist those citizens who are temporarily out of work due to sickness, a lay-off, pregnancy, or any other reasonable cause. We must always bear in mind that those who claim unemployment insurance benefit are not those who exert any real influence on our economy. It is not they who make the major decisions, or blunders, in the Ministry of Finance or in the boardrooms of our major corporations. It is not they who manipulate the economy, who cause the peaks and lows in the business cycles. It is not they who control our trade policies or the amount of money in circulation. They are the victims of "the system", not the managers or administrators of it.

One constantly hears of the big UIC rip-off. One is constantly told of the terrible waste in financial and human terms caused by unemployment insurance, that it contributes to the desire to get something for nothing and that it is anti-work oriented. In fact, Mr. Speaker, most Canadians would rather work than draw UIC benefits, as I believe hon. members who talk to their constituents at week-ends will confirm. In the second place, such benefits are not excessive.

If a family man budgets on an income of $180 a week and suddenly finds himself without a pay cheque, he is in trouble. The average Canadian family cannot last longer than three weeks without income before having to dip into savings. If the head of the family has to wait four or five weeks, he is in a state of financial crisis. When he does get his UIC cheque, the current rate of about $120 is a far cry from the $180 I mentioned before. His whole budget is upset, and debts begin to pile up. Therefore I do not subscribe to the school of thought which believes that UIC benefits are excessive or counter productive.

It is true that a small proportion of claimants deliberately take advantage of the system, but there are con artists to be found on every street corner across Canada as well as in the boardrooms of our corporations. I am not condoning their behaviour. Those guilty of abuses should be severely dealt with, but let us not condemn the concept of unemployment insurance because a very small minority abuse it.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 21, 1975, entitled "U.I.C Called Poor Employer in Consultant's Report: Workers are inadequately informed and motivated." The newspaper story describes the report as saying that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is a poor employer and that most employees were "defensive, negative and poorly motivated". If this report is not accurate it is certainly the impression that most claimants get on entering a UIC office to discuss a problem with the staff. I use this word in a general sense, but I am old enough to have travelled a great deal on our railway system in this country, and in my opinion many UIC employees take the old CNR attitude that the public are second class citizens, and "If you don't like the system, get lost and don't bother us."

Mr. Benjamin: That is the CPR attitude.

Mr. Blackburn: My friend says that is the CPR attitude and perhaps that is so. It is true that some people love to attack the government by verbally assaulting those civil servants closest to them, in this case UIC employees. None the less these employees should be emotionally mature enough to meet the public, even a hostile public at times. Moreover, they should be able to give out information without adding to a series of contradictions, and without always being able to hide behind the vicissitudes of that infernal computer. It would seem that it is always the computer at fault, never the programmer.

As far as motivation is concerned, I find it difficult to understand why UIC employees are not happy in their work. They are well paid compared to private industry, they work in nice clean surroundings protected from the public by movable walls and jungles of plants, and they are usually falling all over each other because of overstaffing. What more could anyone want?

Mr. Mazankowski: A typically socialist example.

Mr. Blackburn: A typically Liberal example, not socialist. The consultant's report also stated that in all the thousands of words written and spoken about the Unemployment Insurance Commission there does not appear to exist a cogent and coherent statement of the objectives and policy of the commission. Even the new act of 1971 setting up the commission fails to make a definitive statement. The act does not deal with the principles which underlie the legislative and regulatory pronouncements.

It could be this glaring weakness that has led some of the public to look upon unemployment insurance as a kind of handout or welfare program, whereas in fact it is a compulsory contributory insurance program to protect working Canadians against loss of income due to unemployment.

The report also stated that the bulk of employees are confused and uncertain about society's perception of the value of the work they are trying to do. One cause of this, I am convinced, is the breakdown in communication between the UIC and claimants as a result of having to attempt to provide personalized service in a basically computerized constructed vacuum. The result of all this, Mr. Speaker, is that there is a constant turnover of staff. Moreover, there is little commitment on the part of UIC staff to do the best they can for their clients—not their slaves but their clients—who in many cases are looked upon as mere nuisances.

It is small wonder then that the average claimant has one hell of a time getting information from his local or branch UIC office. Usually the claimant gets no information, or inaccurate information. The claimant becomes bitter and frustrated. This in turn leads to bitterness among the UIC staff. And so the situation gets worse.

There are, however, staff members who are dedicated and knowledgeable, but unfortunately most of these are not accessible to the average claimant. I would, therefore, strongly recommend that the Unemployment Insurance Commission make available properly trained staff at all levels of its operations, particularly those dealing directly with claimants. After all, this is the front line. If people are to receive not only a fair deal from the UIC but are to feel that they have received a fair deal, it is incumbent upon the Unemployment Insurance Commission to make sure that their best trained people deal with claimants or clients in a very intelligent, acceptable, and humane way.

Another aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Commission that has given me serious concern is the position, responsibilities, and activities of the benefit control officers, in rural areas of Canada sometimes referred to as the "local Gestapo". This group was originally set up to provide claimants with information and guidance in searching for employment. The basic responsibility to date, however, has been to ensure that payments are made to bona fide claimants. This has led to all kinds of problems.

Benefit control officers, by and large, seem to have adopted the attitude that most claimants are guilty unless they can prove otherwise. For example, a claimant goes to a UIC office for what is called an interview with a benefit control officer, but for what is really a very subtle interrogation. The benefit control officer asks all kinds of leading questions and then summarizes his findings in the form of a statement in his own words. Claimants are not warned of the impact the statement will have. Moreover, a person in some cases is being asked to incriminate himself, something which runs counter to our basic concept of the common law.

Often the benefit control officer's report does not reflect the interview but, rather, his interpretation of the interview. It is also interesting to note that in 1972 and 1973 many retired policemen were hired as benefit control officers. That, by implication, speaks for itself.

Benefit control officers for the most part do not assist in directing claimants to job opportunities, which was the original reason they were engaged as members of the staff of UIC offices. They are really just "cops" chasing "crooks". As a result of this situation, I recommend that claimants be accompanied by representatives during all interviews and that claimants also be told before the interview the full meaning, impact, and consequences of the interview. Claimants should simply not be forced to sign interpretative statements of a self-incriminating nature.

I made reference a few moments ago to con artists. There are some slick operators but very few people who know how to handle benefit control officers. I have personally talked over the telephone, as well as in person, to middle aged men and women not too well versed in the English language who have had interviews with benefit control officers. The benefit control officer says to them, "You understand what you are reading?" If they say no, he reads it to them. Many of these people come from Europe, and they sign their names to the statement. These people then come to my office on a Saturday morning or afternoon and I ask them whether the statement is really what they said. Or they have a friend knowledgeable of the English language, and when they get talking together they say it is not exactly what they said but that is what they were made to sign.

I am not saying that the benefit control officer said, "Thou shalt sign or go to jail", but the impression was at least left with these people that if they did not sign they would be in trouble. We have to look at this sort of thing very carefully. I realize that a few people are taking advantage of the UIC system, but there are also a lot of innocent people being led down the garden path.

I should like to suggest some other changes that I think should be introduced at this time to eliminate not only hardship but bad feeling on the part of many claimants. I have never been able to understand why the so-called normal or regular waiting period after termination of earnings must be two weeks. I am now talking about a regular or a maternity claim, not a sickness benefit claim. Surely in this computerized age one week would be sufficient. I do not understand why the waiting period has to drag on for two weeks, and then a claiment has to wait another two or three weeks afterwards.

Another aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Act which has not been altered relates to severance and vacation pay, and I think this is an injustice particularly to those in the construction industry. As hon. members know, vacation and severance pay are work credits earned during the claimant's employment, not when he is unemployed, and this money should not be classified as earnings after layoff. That simply is not fair. The construction trades in particular are badly hit. Most of this work is seasonal and subject to many layoffs. Since that is usually when they begin looking for new work, they are caught in the vicious circle of not having a vacation and having their vacation credits wiped out by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Surely a more equitable and reasonable system can be worked out.

Another source of problems is the artificial division that took place some ten years ago, and this has been mentioned by other hon. members, when the old National Employment Service was separated into the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Canada Manpower. I suggest this arbitrary division has, for the most part, weakened the function of both agencies.

On the one hand the Unemployment Insurance Commission, in close consultation with claimants, is unable to place the claimant and tends to become punitive in its approach if the claimant remains unemployed for any length of time. On the other hand, Canada Manpower, though it often fails to find employment for its clients on UIC benefits, acts as a spy, surreptitiously passing on information to unemployment insurance officials, or benefit control officers, for punitive action by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This situation obviously gives both agencies a very poor image in the community. This specific kind of relationship is also highly questionable and unfair.

Quite frankly I have found very few employers or employees who are satisfied with the present division between Canada Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In fact I have not found very many employers or employees who have any use for Canada Manpower at all, but that is beyond the purview of this act.

Another aspect of this lack of fairness stems from the fact that the unemployment insurance offices receive information from Canada Manpower that "X" number of jobs are available in any given community. The Unemployment Insurance Commission then uses this information to disqualify claimants even though the UIC really has no idea where the jobs are, or what type of jobs are available. I recommend that the Unemployment Insurance Commission and Canada Manpower stop living common law and get married, or get married again.

I would now like to look at some of the proposed amendments introduced by the minister at first reading in July, and about which he spoke last week. I disagree completely with the extension of the penalty period from three weeks to six weeks. That arbitrary extension results in an eight-week waiting period for those who quit employment voluntarily without just cause, and for those who refuse suitable employment, or who are dismissed for misconduct.

Just how is one to define "just cause" and "suitable employment"? This amendment could, and in many cases probably will, turn benefit control and insurance officers into petty local tyrants. There are many valid reasons why people leave employment voluntarily. There are also many valid reasons why people must refuse a specific job. What will be the yardstick, and what will be the criteria?

It is fair to say that most employees are pretty reasonable people, but you will always find personality clashes and conflicts in large plants, and even in small plants, between a worker and a foreman or, in a construction gang, between a labourer and a straw boss. If this conflict is of a personal nature the employee is at the mercy of the straw boss, the foreman, or the superintendent, and under the terms of this amendment he is in real trouble. If the job has become intolerable for him on a personal basis, let alone because of working conditions, what alternative does he have? He either sits back and takes it from the foreman or the employer, if that employer is not a reasonable man or woman, or he quits and is then penalized to the extent of six weeks instead of three, with another two weeks added, making it a total of eight weeks. This almost goes back to some of the old sweatshop days of years ago.

Let us not forget that 250,000 annual voluntary quits in the labour force represents only 2.5 per cent of the work force, and that 26,000 job refusals represents only two-tenths of 1 per cent of the labour force. This is certainly not "alarmingly high", as the minister suggested in his speech. The minister should know there are thousands of jobs today which are repugnant to most Canadians. Even he and his army of civil servants who drafted this legislation would find them unacceptable.

I realize that in some cases where a person is laid off and there is a job available, and if the individual is able to do that job, then that person should go back to work until something better comes along. However, when you have unemployment running at the rate of 7.2 per cent nationally, and from 15 per cent to 18 per cent in Atlantic Canada and in other parts, it is one thing to say you should go back to work and it is an entirely different thing to find a job in those parts of Canada.

Let us remember that this is a federal House of Commons. This is not the Alberta House, the British Columbia House, the Saskatchewan or Ontario House, this is the federal House. We are enacting federal legislation here and we are not just talking about those beautiful and wide open spaces of Alberta which I love. We are talking about heavily congested cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Halifax and so on. We are talking about the mining cities on Cape Breton Island. This is a federal House so let us not be too parochial in discussing a bill that affects all Canadians.

I would now like to look at the formula for financing the unemployment insurance program introduced in this bill. The minister said:

—it is now time to face practical needs for adjusting the application of the financing methods and to bring them in line with current economic reality.

What is current economic reality? It is that since 1971 and the last amendments, or in fact since the new bill of June, 1971, the rate of unemployment has fallen below 5 per cent for only one month. The average since then has been 6.4 per cent in 1972, 6.3 per cent in 1973, 5.6 per cent in 1974, and at least 7 per cent this year.

The government by this amendment will face the practical needs not by reducing unemployment but by shunning its responsibilities, and making those who work pay for its bungling. In 1971 a threshold of 4 per cent unemployment was set as the level above which the government would assume the additional costs of UIC benefits. This would give the government incentive to fight unemployment. As we all know, this incentive was not good enough; now we find that the government has had to bear great financial responsibility for its lack of initiative and lack of ability to create enough jobs for enough people to reduce unemployment to acceptable levels.

The amendment would allow the benchmark to be adjusted each year on the basis of monthly unemployment rates over the last eight years. Extra costs would thus be borne by individuals.

High levels of unemployment have meant big payouts from UIC funds. Granted, this is not acceptable, but why should the working people of this country take the blame for it, for that is what this amendment virtually does? It is estimated that if unemployment reaches 7.6 per cent in 1976, as some predict, payments may reach $5 billion. What happens, for instance, if the anti-inflation program, so-called, drives unemployment up, as I am quite sure it will? Again it will be those least responsible who will have to bear the added cost through increased premiums.

What is probably most disturbing about this amendment is that the Liberals have said in effect that "normal unemployment" will now be considered to be 5.3 per cent, the average of the last eight years. Premiums will rise from approximately $1.40 per $100 insurable income to $1.60 or $1.70 per $100. However, and this is crucial, there is a ceiling on contributions. Thus, the UIC premium represents a bigger proportion of the income of lower paid workers than of higher paid workers. In effect this is another tax imposed on those on lower incomes. This is really what it amounts to, and those at the bottom pay a higher proportion of their insurable earnings for unemployment insurance.

I understand that my time is running out, Madam Speaker. When it comes to unemployment insurance, after being involved in it for four and one-half years I have come to the conclusion that these amendments—will really not amount to a hill of beans on the positive side, and on the negative side will make things worse for the lower paid employees. I call upon the minister to think a second time, and I call upon the members of the committee to whom this bill will be going to bring in meaningful amendments so that we will have some fairness and equity in respect of these amendments that will be commensurate with the needs, the demands, and ability to pay of the average Canadian.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Madam Speaker, as is the case with other members, over the last few years I have dealt with hundreds of cases involving unemployment insurance claims. Perhaps the most interesting was a claim that was turned down on the grounds of a pregnancy. It is interesting that this happened in such a place as Halifax-East Hants. Not since Adam gave birth to Eve has any man been pregnant, and yet this claimant was turned down on the ground of his pregnancy. There was no discrimination involved. The fact simply is that the young lady who punched the computer machine got the figure transposed.

After six days of debate I do not intend to cover a very wide range, but instead would like to bring to the attention of the House and the minister what I believe to be a discrimination against a small group of working people in Canada. These are Americans who have come to this country, have obtained work and have paid unemployment insurance premiums. Then, as happens in certain cases, they are not able to have their work permits renewed. The specific case I think of, occurred in respect of a young woman, a secretary at St. Mary's University in Halifax.

This young woman was supporting her husband who had come to this country as a student. He was also an American. Things went well until suddenly this summer she was refused an extension of her work permit. When she phoned the unemployment insurance office she was told she had made enough contributions to qualify for payments for a certain number of weeks, but when she went to collect it was a different story. She found that the payments were refused because she was not in a position to say she was available for work.

Physically she was available for work, and if a job had been offered and she had been in a position to take it she would have been working. But she had to advise the unemployment insurance office that she could not work because she did not have a permit to work in Canada. Here I believe we have an example of a very strict ruling being made. This woman was refused unemployment insurance payments because, although she had made all the necessary payments into the fund and her employer had as well, she could not obtain a permit to work.

This is the type of injustice I wish to bring as forcibly as I can to the attention of the minister. I hope the minister, when he appears before the committee and examines this case, will determine whether there is a remedy. I should like to say to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), and to the officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission who read these proceedings, that it is possible that the ruling made against this American woman in Halifax was a local ruling, and was inspired by some Philadelphia lawyer who had temporarily taken up residence in Halifax and had construed the law in a very strict and discriminatory sense. He went by the strict letter of the law, rather than by the intent of parliament or by anything that would represent common sense.

It is possible that the person advising the Unemployment Insurance Commission office in Halifax made a very strict and wrongful interpretation of the law which would not apply in other parts of Canada. If this is the case and the minister so advises me, I will give him the name of the young woman. She has now returned to the United States. Perhaps they could send her at least her payments, or the money she paid into the unemployment insurance fund in good faith.

That is one way of looking at it. It may just have been a local error. If it is not, may I suggest two approaches to the minister. The first is that the young woman in her predicament be treated exactly the same as a person in the final year of work before going out on pension or retirement, that is, if she is over age 65 she cannot collect. Surely some method will have to be found so that those people do not have to pay into the unemployment insurance fund. After all, it is an insurance fund and one should pay in only if there is a reasonable probability that, certain circumstances having happened, one would receive payment or compensation for what he or she is trying to insure against. That is one aspect of it.

The other is that if the Department of Manpower is to give work permits to Americans and force them to pay into the unemployment insurance fund, then I think simple justice requires that if those people are put out of work through no fault of their own but through the fault of a change in government policy in Canada, they should receive unemployment insurance payments. I think that would have been the just result in respect of this young woman of whom I speak this evening. There it is. I hope the minister and the officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission will put their heads together and come up with a solution to achieve justice for a small but important class of people.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I am pleased tonight to have the opportunity to speak in this debate. I come from the province of Alberta, where there are not that many people unemployed. In fact often we are looking for skilled and unskilled people to help us out in the agricultural and energy fields. However, I have a number of problems, just as other members have, which I should like to take the opportunity tonight to bring to the attention of the House and the minister.

Many of my colleagues have spoken and have very clearly outlined many of the criticisms that can be levelled at the unemployment insurance bill. I do not mean to repeat what has been said because these criticisms have been very well set out. I am concerned about some of the measures that are being proposed, especially those aimed at the so-called low-income claimants and people over 65 years of age. Several positive and constructive suggestions have been brought forward. I hope the minister will look at them with a favourable eye and, as well, will look at some of the constituency problems that bother a great many of us constantly and which should be solved by some adequate amendments to the act.

Before discussing certain aspects of the bill I should like to pinpoint another problem which is of great concern to me. As I travel through my riding, and even throughout Canada, I come across a great many people who are discouraged with the Unemployment Insurance Act. They constantly say it is really only another welfare program. This concerns me because unemployment insurance is insurance against unemployment, and we should have an act which pertains to that element only. I should like to see changes made so that we really do have a program of unemployment insurance that can stand on its own feet.

Assuming that the concept behind this program is insurance against unemployment, I should like to examine the situation which was described many times before but which I think bears repetition and which occurs in rural ridings. My riding of Westaskiwin is essentially rural. It contains some 30 to 40 communities numbering from around 600 people to around 5,000 people each. People working in these areas pay unemployment insurance, yet when they apply for unemployment insurance benefits when they lose their jobs they find they are often disentitled because of the so called distance rules. Let me give some examples.

I have had many complaints from communities in the Drayton Valley and Winfield areas in my constituency, some 85 miles from Edmonton. A man living in this area who becomes unemployed and applies for unemployment insurance often cannot find another job in that area, and if he does not state that he will take a job in Edmonton, 85 miles away and 170 miles round trip, he is disentitled. The commission justifies its decision by claiming that the individual concerned has limited himself to seeking work in an area where no opportunities for employment exist. And we call this an unemployment insurance program!

I would suggest to the minister that perhaps we could amend the act so that it would place a limit on the mile radius within which employment could be sought, say, for example 40 or 50 miles which would be the outside distance within which an individual must travel to work. If he cannot find a job within that area and if the only job for him is available some 100 or 200 miles away, some assistance should be given to that man in order to enable him to move himself and his family to another location nearer his work. This is important, and it is a matter which many hon. members representing rural ridings have been bringing up time and time again. It appears that there is certainly a problem here.

I am a member of parliament who perhaps does not have as many people calling me about unemployment insurance problems as do a great many of my colleagues, and I feel I am fortunate because in my riding a great many people can find work because they are close to the city of Edmonton. But there is the periphery area to which I referred which is having problems with the commission.

Another complaint that I receive fairly often is from a person who receives unemployment insurance while he is actively attempting to find work and, for some reason or another, finds he has been disentitled and then is asked to pay back in a lump sum what he has received. I agree that mistakes can be made, but it would seem fair for some type of payment program to be worked out so that this person is enabled to pay back the unemployment insurance which has been overpaid.

I have had cases of people who, three weeks after they had paid back the money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, were told there was a mistake, that they were entitled to the benefit, and were then put back on unemployment insurance. This is a serious administrative problem, and I think it could be corrected and the matter dealt with in a more humane manner in cases where a person is paid more than is justified and then is disentitled.

I have another problem which occurs in my riding and which I would like the minister to consider because it is one that causes me a great deal of concern. The town of Ponoka and the surrounding area are some 75 miles from Edmonton and 110 miles from Calgary, yet the way the boundaries are divided the people in Ponoka who have legitimate complaints against the Unemployment Insurance Commission must travel to Calgary to have their cases dealt with there. They are closer to Edmonton and they cannot understand why they have to go in the other direction to have their problems solved. I think this could be changed easily. It is a complaint that I would like to get off my chest. I see the minister nodding his head and I am happy about that.

I want to emphasize a point that has been made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and, I am sure, by other hon. members, regarding the fact that unemployment insurance and Manpower should be reunited. In Edmonton the Unemployment Insurance Commission is located in one building, and across the town, some 10 or 15 blocks away, the Manpower office is located. Perhaps it would be possible to have one file for every individual and in this way a great many of the problems and discrepancies could be solved.

In the rural constituencies many jobs are available on a seasonal basis, sometimes for only two or three weeks. Any one who has run a farm, a ranch, or a small business knows that many times in the year he could employ a person for a short period of time. At the present time an individual who is collecting unemployment insurance benefits and who is offered short-term work, say, for example, on a farm during the harvest season or in a small business, will not accept such employment because he knows that if it is for less than eight weeks he will subsequently be unable to claim unemployment insurance.

However, if one file were kept on a person, it might be possible for him to accept short-term work provided he is all the while, even while employed, actively seeking a permanent job. This type of incentive could be built into the act, and if the Manpower department and the Unemployment Insurance Commission were amalgamated the problem would be largely solved. It is a complaint that comes to me many times from rural areas where farmers cannot give a job to people who are on unemployment insurance or on welfare to help them out for a few weeks because of the fact that they would lose their benefits.

I realize that the argument has been put forward many times that we should ask a claimant to work for six weeks before he is entitled to benefits. At present the act says that he must work for eight weeks before being entitled, so the suggestion I am making would not fit in here, but I think it would be possible if that individual had one file for the two departments.

Now I would like to deal briefly with the amendments that have been proposed. It seems to me that we are spending a great deal of money on unemployment insurance. We should want to tighten up the regulations so that it is in fact an insurance program and so that we are not spending so much money on it, when really we should be finding employment for these people. When I look at the amendments I really do not see how we will accomplish that.

We are estimating that we will cut people who are over 65, and who are unemployed off unemployment insurance benefits. This will affect approximately 5,000 senior citizens. It is a minute group. It has been stated that this will only amount to a saving of $2 million or $3 million, and I am not sure that we are saving it on the backs of the right people. If these people want to work after they lose their jobs and are actively seeking employment, they should be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

The so-called reform directed at low income recipients will severely hit individuals in that group who have dependants. No differentiation is being made between people having different needs or different ascribed circumstances. Under the 75 per cent benefit rate individuals in this group could receive a maximum of $46.26. At the 66⅔ per cent rate they will receive a maximum of $41.07. The intent of the proposal is therefore to achieve restraint by denying $5 per week to those who are unemployed and who are in the most need of financial assistance.

Before I conclude I wish to make one more point. This matter comes to mind often when we speak of unemployment insurance. It is about seasonal employees who make a great deal of money in a short time. There are many in Canada today who are employed in the construction business or in oil fields. There are many examples I could use, but these people earn $10,000, $12,000, $13,000, $20,000 in six, seven or eight months of the year. They are still eligible for unemployment insurance, and I think it would be easier for us to amend the act to make it necessary for a claimant to state the amount he has earned in a particular year. If it is over a certain figure he should be unable to collect unemployment insurance.

I think it would greatly help the people of Canada who are working and paying unemployment insurance to feel that the program is doing something for those who really need insurance against unemployment.

I hope the minister will be open to suggestions in the committee from all parties in order to tighten up this bill and make it an insurance program, and I know we will be helping him in any way we can.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Madam Speaker, before dealing in a general way with the bill I should like to go into some of these amendments in some detail. I am glad to see that the minister is here.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He is here all the time.

Mr. Leggatt: Well, most of the time. I must say that I am not one who is totally at odds with the amendments which have been introduced in the bill.

Miss Campbell: Let's pass it then.

Mr. Leggatt: The amendments themselves are a mixed bag, and if I have any criticism of the bill it is not as much in the amendments we are dealing with as in the fact that certain matters have not been changed by this bill at all. In other words, it is not what has been done in these amendments, it is what the minister has failed to change which bothers me.

[Mr. Schellenberger.]

One of the complaints I receive from claimants and from the general public deals with the question of the minor attachment provision in the bill which allows an initial benefit period and then a re-establishment period. One of the problems here is that to the mind of the average claimant it is extremely difficult to figure out which benefit period he is in. I should think that no one except some re-established bureaucrat would understand what a re-established claim is. The program should be made more simple and meaningful for the claimant, as well as lawyers, union representatives, and all the professionals who become involved in this program so intensively, and to some extent further complicate the program.

In my view the minor attachment provision is a complicated factor. I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to there being only one attachment period, a major period, but the amount of work a person has to put in in order to establish himself for benefits should be reduced.

The idea of two sections is counter productive in terms of incentive for those seeking employment. Let me give an example of someone who is on a minor attachment, and who is then laid off. If he takes a new job for less than six weeks he does not go back on benefits because he has not re-established himself under the provisions of this act. The difficulty is that a claimant who does not re-establish himself has no incentive to take anything but a permanent job. If he goes back to a job which looks as though it could be for less than six weeks, there is a tremendous temptation—although it is a violation of the act—on the part of that claimant not to take the job because he will destroy the prospect of future benefits under the program. It seems to me that serious consideration should be given by the minister to the question of the minor attachment.

There is another aspect with regard to the minor attachment which bothers me, and that is that eight weeks of employment qualify those who are at achool for unemployment insurance. The student returns to a full time study program at a university or high school, and there are now a number of examples of people making claims on the ground that they can qualify by saying that they will be available for employment. They say that they are seeking employment and that therefore their education is a temporary thing.

Mr. Andras: Pretty tough to get away with that one.

Mr. Leggatt: Some have.

Mr. Andras: Let me know their names.

Mr. Leggatt: Perhaps we should have a look at how they have done it, but they have been on claim. In fact, my daughter told me that she was going to go on unemployment insurance, and she is a high school student.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: I told her that there was no way she would go on unemployment insurance.

An hon. Member: I didn't know she was that old.

Mr. Leggatt: Oh, yes, but of course she did not go on unemployment insurance. When I look at the act I have a strong suspicion that she could attempt to qualify herself on the ground that she had intended to leave her education for permanent employment, and as soon as she found it she could leave, and therefore she would be available for work even though attending an institution full time.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Did you advise her?

Mr. Leggatt: I advised her not to go on unemployment insurance.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT WINNIPEG—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, on Monday, October 20, four days before it happened, I raised a question in this House concerning the pending lay-off of CPR employees at the Weston shops in Winnipeg. On that occasion I put the question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), but in all frankness he told me that he had nothing to report. The lay-off actually took place that Friday evening, October 24, and my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and I were at a meeting of a couple of hundred of those employees in Winnipeg on Sunday, October 26.

I raised the question again on Monday, October 27. On that occasion I put my question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). I notice his parliamentary secretary is here tonight. I had hoped from the conversation I had with the Minister of Labour yesterday that he would be here, for he assured me that he regarded this as a serious question. If the parliamentary secretary is answering for him I hope he has an answer worthy of the minister.

The situation is a serious one. Some 760 workers in the CPR shops at Winnipeg were laid off on Friday night, October 24, for what could well be an indefinite period, and this at a time when we are being told that our railway equipment needs to be modernized, We get questions in the House such as the questions that came today about the lack of sufficient equipment to move stock in western Canada. On all counts it seems to us to make no sense at all to lay off railway workers at this time.

Some of us feel it is part of a squeeze play at which the CPR has been a past master for a great many decades. There are railway wage negotiations coming up. It looks to some of us as though the CPR is laying off employees in the hope it will have a case against a wage increase that is worth anything at all.

There are rumours or expectations that we will soon have the report of Dr. Noel Hall on railway pensions. I trust it will make recommendations for substantial improvements. No doubt the CPR is ready to say no before its officials even see the report. It is well known that the CPR is forever putting pressure on the government to provide it with money. I suppose it is not to be blamed for that because it has been getting money, land, mineral rights, and things like that from this country for a good many decades.

It is precisely because of what the CPR has got out of this country that we feel it has an obligation to provide proper and adequate railway service and that it has an obligation to play its part in maintaining our economy at a decent level.

A corporation like the CPR is not doing that when it lays off employees to the tune of 760, as happened in Winnipeg recently. I believe this may have happened, although not to the same extent, in Calgary and other cities in Canada and even to some extent in Montreal. My plea to the minister was that he indicate to the House what the government is going to do about this matter.

I started by indicating a couple of dates, namely, October 20 when I first raised the matter in the House this fall—we have in fact been raising it for months—and October 27 when I raised it again. Between those two dates the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Labour were both at Winnipeg. They were met there by these employees who were about to be laid off and both of them assured the workers that they would look into the case to see what could be done. When I put that in as part of my question to the Minister of Labour on Monday, October 17, he agreed that what I said was correct, that he and the Prime Minister had met these men and had assured them they would see what could be done. They are still waiting for a reply.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Leblanc) can tell the House that the minister has taken up this matter with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport, and that the cabinet as a whole has become aware of the seriousness of the situation, and that he has something to say tonight that will be more hopeful news to these CPR employees at Winnipeg than the unemployment they are suffering at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, first it is important to reassure the hon. member and tell him that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is very much aware of the vital problem he has raised with his usual competence, and that he is quite concerned about the future of those CPR employees. For that reason, the minister has immediately set up a group of senior civil servants, as the Prime Minister himself had promised the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This group includes representatives from the Departments of Labour, Manpower and Immigration and Transport; it has undertaken a comprehensive study of that problem.

The group already met on Friday October 31, 1975, and is to meet again tomorrow Wednesday, November 5, 1975, as well as in the near future, as required. There is no doubt that the Minister of Labour will inform the hon. member and the House of the solutions recommended by this group of senior civil servants from the three departments mentioned.

[English]

It is important to note that CP Rail have given written notice to each individual concerning the lay-off and have advised the minister of Labour accordingly. In all cases the employees have received lay-off notice in accordance with the terms of the collective agreement. Such terms, of course, provide for the lay-off of the person with the least seniority.

At one time the unions had alleged that CP Rail was in violation of the lay-off notice provisions in the Canada Labour Code. When this alleged violation was reported, officials of the Department of Labour met with the respective union leaders and it was ascertained that no violation of the lay-off notice provisions of the Canada Labour Code had taken place.

[Translation]

The minister apologizes for not being present tonight. As for the question of knowing whether the CPR is responsible for the dismissals, I cannot discuss it for the time being because I do not know all the circumstances surrounding them.

[English]

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—ALLEGED SCRAPPING OF FREIGHT CARS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), on October 29 I addressed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) with regard to lay-offs that had taken place several days earlier of some 760 CPR employees.

My colleague and I had raised this question a number of times earlier in the year because of the rumours and warnings of the lay-off of a substantial number of people with fairly long service. That is a large lay-off for one city. On each occasion that we raised this matter we were told by the minister that, first, he had no direct control over CPR and, second, that we had his assurance he would look into the question.

When it became obvious that more than 700 people had been given virtually permanent notice that they would no longer be employed by CPR, I started to look into the matter more intensively. It became obvious that the lay-off to a large extent was due to the CPR using hopper cars built on the order of and paid for by the Government of Canada. Because of the use of these hopper cars to move grain from western Canada to Thunder Bay or Vancouver, freight cars that had traditionally been used by the CPR were no longer being used.

It seems strange to me that the CP should be laying off several thousand people across the country while CN has laid off virtually nobody. This has been confirmed for me. As I say, it seems strange, since each railway carries about half of the grain which is transported.

The second question to which I addressed myself was whether in fact the government had made any arrangements when it decided to purchase hopper cars for use by both railways in moving grain—whether the government had had any discussions with the railways and the Wheat Board as to who should own the cars, who should be responsible for their maintenance, and whether the railways had been asked to give any commitment that the hopper cars used to move grain would be in addition to the freight cars used until then. I found that not only had there been such discussions but that questions had been asked and that the minister then responsible for the Wheat Board has answered them in a positive fashion. I refer to a question put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on May 29, 1972, by the former member for Regina East. The exchange was as follows:

MR. JOHN BURTON (REGINA EAST): Can the minister indicate what assurances have been given by the railways that they will maintain their present quantity of rolling stock engaged in grain movement—

HON. OTTO E. LANG (MINISTER OF JUSTICE): It would be very much the purpose and intention of the government to make sure that the hopper cars put into use in this fashion are additional to other rolling stock made available for the movement of grain.

Then the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked a supplementary question:

Am I to infer from the minister's answer that to date, at least, the railways have given no commitment that these hopper cars will be in addition to existing equipment and that the equipment now in use will be maintained?

To which the minister replied:

No, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is quite incorrect in thinking that. The railways have had very firm discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board on the amount of rolling stock they have available which is to be dedicated to grain. These 2,000 hopper cars will be additional to that rolling stock.

We find now that this agreement has not been lived up to. Of course there is a reduction in the amount of freight which CP is moving, but the CP is destroying up to ten boxcars a day, many of them in very good condition. I say that the CP, unlike the CN, has not lived up to its agreement with the Government of Canada and I call on the minister to take action to ensure that the CP ceases this wanton destruction of very useful equipment which it is scrapping simply because it suits it to use the hopper cars and not to use the equipment it promised the minister it would continue to use. It is because of this misuse of authority that 750 people have been laid off. I think the minister could, and should, take action.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in 1974 when there was a serious shortage of grain cars the federal government agreed to pay part of the cost of upgrading and repairing of, I believe, 2,400 cars for grain service. This aid was given on the understanding, contained in the agreement, that the removal of regular cars could not be accelerated. The agreement is being adhered to by both railway companies. I am informed by CP that of the cars affected by this agreement only two have been scrapped—they had both been involved in major accidents and repairs in each case would have been extremely uneconomical.

The hon. member referred specifically to a problem in Winnipeg. CP Rail does not scrap cars which are in good condition. He referred to the situation involving the purchase of hopper cars. Of course the justification purchase by the government of some 4,000 new hopper cars, now being delivered, was largely based on the inability of the railways to provide capital for hopper car replacement.

I have been assured by Canadian Pacific that the scrapping program for boxcars in Winnipeg has involved basically boxcars 35 years of age or more and which are requiring extensive maintenance. It is more economical to take them out of service than to maintain them with constant and expensive repairs. This is the normal program that is also being pursued by Canadian National.

With respect to the matter of lay-offs, I know the hon. member will have heard the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Leblanc) indicating our concern for the problem and our present attention to it. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) pointed out to the hon. member in his reply earlier in the House, the lay-off situation affecting the railways is in part due to the slowdown in the economy and a resultant modification in the use of cars. This sometimes means fewer maintenance forces to keep the fleet operative. The railways are forced to lay off where services are no longer required. It is apparent that the situation is a difficult one, but even under present circumstances the railways are able to satisfy the unusually high target for grain movement that they have been set this year by the Canadian Wheat Board.

OLYMPIC GAMES—LIMITATION OF CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS TO QUEBEC COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ELIMINATE DISCRIMINATION

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I rise tonight to debate, not for the first time, a question pertaining to fair play for all Canadians. On October 28 I asked a simple question of the government House leader in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister. I asked if the government planned to investigate the allegations that only firms having their principal place of business in Quebec were allowed to bid on projects at the Olympic site in Montreal. The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Sharp) replied that the government did not have administrative responsibility for the Olympic projects.

That answer is unacceptable, Madam Speaker, both to me and to the Canadian people. When the Olympic financing bill was before the federal parliament this House passed a bill allowing the federal government to advance a considerable amount of money from the federal treasury to enable COJO, the Olympic organizing committee, to get started. That same bill authorized the post office to issue a continuing series of Olympic stamps. Part of the proceeds from the sale of those stamps has been turned over to COJO. The bill also authorized the Royal Canadian Mint to strike seven sets of Olympic coins. Part of the proceeds from the sale of these Olympic coins is also turned over to COJO, and I might add that these stamps and coins are sold in every province of Canada and the two territories.

Moreover, there is an Olympic lottery in operation, where for $10 Canadians in all parts of the land can take a chance on becoming an instant millionaire. Here too, the tickets on the lottery are sold everywhere in Canada, not just in Montreal, and not just in the province of Quebec.

The mayor of Montreal tells us on frequent occasions that the sale of stamps and coins and Olympic lottery tickets will cover the cost of the Olympics, and that this will not be a repeat of the 1967 world's fair in Montreal when the Canadian people picked up the deficit for the fair. Madam Speaker, I do not believe this.

We know already that the 1976 Olympics will incur an enormous deficit, and we have already heard figures of the deficit that run as high as half a billion dollars. Be that as it may, Madam Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the Canadian people have been sold a bill of goods, that Canada is the host of the 1976 Olympics, and that the cost of the games should be borne by all Canadians.

Let us pursue the matter of the Canadian Olympic Games a step further and take up the question of security. We are told that several thousand men and women from the Canadian armed forces will be assigned to the Olympic site in Montreal and to other areas as part of the security arrangements for the games. In addition, the Department of Justice and the Solicitor General's department will be involved in security for the games, including the assigning of thousands more people from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the immigration service.

It begins to look as though the tail is certainly wagging the dog in the matter of the games, if in fact the federal government is not in any way involved in the administration of them. As I mentioned earlier, I do not accept that as the truth, nor do the rest of the people of Canada who are paying the cost of the 1976 extravaganza.

In spite of the fact that the province of Quebec changed the name of its provincial legislature to the national assembly, it is no less a province of Canada than is Ontario, and Quebec is no more a sovereign state than the province of Ontario. If Quebec is a sovereign state, Madam Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can tell us how any foreign state can enter into international agreements that involve the armed forces of Canada, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Royal Canadian Mint, the Canadian Post Office, or strike-bound, rather what is left of it, and the other federal departments that are presently involved in the 1976 Olympic Games in one way or another.

The tendering regulations employed by COJO were not drawn up by that corporation. They are provincial regulations, and that means that the province of Quebec does not recognize the right of companies having their main offices in Ontario or other provinces to pour cement at the Olympic site, or to sell furniture to the games committee, or to have any meaningful, gainful part to play in the construction or outfitting of the Olympic facilities.

In other words, we are expected to pay for the Games and we are encouraged to help pay for the Games not only by the Olympic Games committee, the province of Quebec, and the city of Montreal, but by the federal government. However, we in other provinces should not expect to be allowed to bid on any Olympic projects. Bidding is restricted to companies having their principal place of business in the province of Quebec, and we are told that this is right and proper since the federal government is not responsible for the administration of the Games. This is the Trudeau just society. This attitude on the part of the federal government cannot be condoned.

We are entitled to a better answer than the one offered by the government House leader. This "hands off" attitude was reflected in the federal government's refusal to convene a full-scale investigation into the allegations of fraud in the letting of contracts for the first phase of construction at the Olympic site. I ask, in the name of my constituents, how long does the federal government intend to keep silent on the appalling mismanagement of the Olympic Games administration?

The matter of discrimination against Canadian contractors and suppliers outside Quebec by the Olympic Games committee is only a part of the broad question of mismanagement of the Olympic Games administration, and I suggest that the federal government cannot get off the hook simply by stating that it is not responsible for the administration of the Games.

When we debated the Olympic financing bill we were told by members on all sides of the House that the 1976 Olympic Games would be a sort of catalyst to draw Canadians closer together, sharing the burden of getting the games site ready and sharing in the honour and glory of the best Olympic Games ever. Because of the administration of the Olympic Games it has had the opposite effect. It has had a divisive effect, fed by the greed of Quebec contractors and suppliers, the deceptive impostures of Liberalism, and by the high and mighty attitude of COJO officials and political figures in the province. I am asking for a more suitable answer to my question of October 28, Madam Speaker, and I will continue repeating my question until I do get a plausible answer to this enigma which deprives the majority of Canadian contractors of their basic rights.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked questions in this House relating to which firms are being invited to bid on construction contracts at the Olympic site in Montreal. On October 28 the Acting Prime Minister, (Mr. Sharp) stated that the federal government does not have administrative responsibility for the Olympic projects.

Furthermore, in answer to questions from members of this House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has restated the position of the federal government, in that it would not pick up any possible deficit on the Olympic Games, and that the federal government has not been asked to do so by either the province of Quebec or the city of Montreal. We, therefore, have no involvement in these construction activities.

Construction on the Olympic site is the responsibility of the city of Montreal. It is the city which is responsible for the tender calls and the allocation of contracts which are monitored by the province of Quebec.

It is true, I might add, that aid has been extended to the Games through legislation of this House relating to the stamp program, the Olympic coins program, and others, but the terms of that legislation do not permit the Government of Canada to supervise or intervene in the process of tendering on the Olympic site.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

SUGGESTED ACTION TO PREVENT GREENPEACE ORGANIZATION FROM INTERFERING WITH SEAL HUNT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The intention of the Greenpeace organization to interfere with the Newfoundland seal hunt and so cause wilful destruction to the pelts promotes the need for action by the government of Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House recommends that the government initiate preventative measures against harmful action to the species and particularly to deny the organization such aircraft licences as they apply for.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

USE OF ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM TO REDUCE EMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Having received complaints from Halifax, Nova Scotia, that the federal government is in the process of using the anti-inflation program as a means of reducing civilian positions in the Atlantic region's defence industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the House deplores the action of government in seeming to use the Atlantic region as an example to the Canadian public on how to initiate wage controls by reducing staff and restraining any meaningful collective bargaining in the public service.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY FOR PURCHASE OF MODERATELY PRICED HOUSE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to introduce a motion on a question of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Assisted Home Ownership Program announced by the Minister of Urban Affairs grants substantial subsidies to builders of rental housing and that low income people are by this very fact at the mercy of builders and owners of such accommodation who are really the ones that benefit from such a program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House recommend to the minister to amend the Assisted Home Ownership Program by providing the payment of subsidies for low rents to tenants with a modest income so that they may be able to rent in the building of their choice thanks to the additional income this subsidy will represent. This measure will make low income people the true beneficiaries of the assisted rental program.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS IN IMPLEMENTING CONSERVATION MEASURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Canada has been condemned internationally for our failure to implement an effective program of energy conservation in a report of the International Energy Agency which states: "there appears to be a substantial gap between principle and practice . . . that the Cabinet appears to have accepted the goal of conservation without recognizing the need to implement the goal with specific actions", and considering that in 1974 the industrial nations reduced their energy consumption over the previous year by 1.7 per cent while Canada actually increased its consumption by

7.8 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to (1) report to this House on the progress made by the Office of Energy Conservation in setting and implementing sectoral goals for energy conservation in Canada, and (2) establish an energy conservation review agency to monitor and report on the success of energy consumption cutback measures across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: A motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED DELAY IN DECISION TO CLOSE CERTAIN NORTHERN AIRPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move under Standing Order 43 a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It has reference to plans by the Ministry of Transport to close all air traffic in and out of the settlements of Arctic Bay and Grise Fiord. The population of these settlements, totalling some 500 people, depends almost exclusively on air freight for all its supplies and any closure would destroy the settlements. The pending decision by the Ministry of Transport appears to be a bureaucratic misunderstanding of the worst order. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski):

That any decision by the Ministry of Transport on northern airport closures be cancelled and a little common sense prevail in the above-mentioned department.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ESTABLISH FAIR SYSTEM OF LICENSING TAXIS SERVING MALTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I too have a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the continuing problem of licensing taxis at the Toronto International Airport, Malton, which over the years has resulted in incidents of violence at the airport among the drivers, and in view of the recent negotiations among the federal, provincial and municipal governments involved to establish an effective system of licensing the taxis to and from the airport and thereby bring order to the industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Minister of Transport take immediate steps to enter into co-operative arrangements with the government of the province of Ontario and the various municipalities in the area who are concerned to establish a fair and equitable system of licensing taxi cab service to and from Malton Airport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent in respect of that motion?

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—RENEGOTIATION OF COMMERCIAL CONDITIONS—PROVISION IN CONTRACT FOR INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Recognizing that the government of Canada has already indicated its attempt to renegotiate the safeguards aspect of the CANDU contract with Argentina, is the AECL renegotiating the commercial or the pricing aspects of this contract in view of the indications that its cost estimates may have been low to the extent of 100 per cent or $160 million?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, both parties to the contract, Italimpianti and AECL, have become concerned about the impact of inflation in Argentina and in our two countries with regard to the cost of that particular contract and have served notice officially to the Argentinian agency to renegotiate the commercial terms.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House whether there were any adequate provisions in the original commercial contract covering the possibility of inflation and in general terms what those provisions were.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there were provisions providing for escalation of inflation. With the benefit of hindsight it can be seen that those provisions were less than adequate in respect of the rate of inflation the three countries involved have experienced. For that reason, we have gone back to the Argentinian authorities and have said we wish to renegotiate the contract in the light of quite changed circumstances.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—AMOUNT OF LOSS UNDER ORIGINAL CONTRACT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder how seriously the Government of Canada expects to be taken with regard to attempted sales of CANDU reactors when one year it tries to reopen the contract with regard to safeguards and the following year with regard to pricing or the commercial aspects of the contract. Can the minister tell the House whether, if the contract were carried out on its present basis, AECL would lose between $100 million and $160 million on the deal?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the point that I referred to, namely changed circumstances. The commercial terms of the agreement were negotiated between 1972 and 1973 significantly before the major impact of oil prices and the inflationary pressures throughout the world. Second, I should like to make the point that notice was served on the Argentinian agency that we wished to renegotiate the contract some months ago during the period in which we were in fact renegotiating the safeguards agreement.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS—ROLE OF CANADIAN INSPECTORS UNDER SAFEGUARD AGREEMENTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary on the general question of nuclear safeguards is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Because the International Atomic Energy Agency will have a staff even next year of only 145 people, which is obviously insufficient to do a proper safeguard inspection job around the world, is the minister reconsidering the policy he enunciated yesterday that our own Canadian inspectors will be utilized only after the IAEA inspectors uncover some infractions of the Canadian guidelines. Am I misinterpreting what the minister said yesterday?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to clarify my comment of yesterday to the effect that it would be the intention of the Canadian inspectors to ensure that the bilateral aspects of the safeguards agreement were inspected. It was not our intention to go over the same ground or to report upon inspections, or possible violations which had been uncovered, by the international inspectors. Our inspectors would be working to supplement the international team.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS—SUGGESTED STRENGTHENING OF INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY INSPECTION TEAM

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I think two points certainly deserve clarification because yesterday the minister clearly indicated that Canadian inspectors would be utilized only if IAEA inspectors uncovered infractions in another country. I gather he is backtracking on that. If so, that is quite welcome.

● (1420)

May I then ask him whether this government has made any representations or specific proposals to the other nations of the world, either in the conference of suppliers that is now taking place in London or in any other way through the United Nations or perhaps directly to the IAEA, that the IAEA inspection staff be strengthened immeasurably over the very insufficient personnel they now have?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to create the impression which my hon. friend inferred from my comment yesterday and I am thankful for the opportunity to clarify this situation for him and other members of the House. It is my recollection, and I want to check this, that we have not made any specific representations to increase the international staff, but I am sure that the Canadian position is to support the international inspection agency to the point that it is able to do its work effectively. I will look into whether we will make representations on this point.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING OF COUNTRIES SUPPLYING NUCLEAR MATERIAL

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): My other question to the minister really boils down to whether he has any report to make to the House or to the Canadian public on the meetings now taking place in London.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. At the moment the discussions are under way and there are proposals still under consideration. Until the conclusions have been reached I think it would be better not to go into the details.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—ALLEGED DECISION OF ROYAL INSURANCE TO CUT BACK ON SERVICES BECAUSE OF PROFIT GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which arises out of the very serious report that Canada's largest general insurance company, the Royal Insurance Group, which deals in automobile, property and casualty insurance has decided to cut back on its present service and planned expansion of service in the insurance field to Canadians as a result of its disapproval of the government guidelines in terms of profits. I should like to ask the minister if the government is looking into this specific case, and beyond that, what plans does the government have in mind to cope with the possible situation of other corporations providing goods and services which do not like the corporate guidelines and decide to cut back on those services to the people of Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to investigate the accuracy of the statement with regard to Royal Insurance. In general terms, I think it can be said that while the guidelines provide measures to restrain prices and profits, we are not proposing anything to compel anybody to stay in business. We assume that even within the guidelines they will do so, but, as I say, I have to see whether the anticipation that the hon. member has is founded on facts.

Mr. Broadbent: To be perfectly clear, is it the government's view that corporations which go on what could appropriately be called a strike against the public or against the government because of their rejection of the profit guidelines will not meet with any action on the part of the government to get them to provide at least the equivalent of the service they have been providing up to this point?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I assume from the hon. gentleman's question that he is now concerned that the corporate sector is taking the restrictions very seriously and that the guidelines are putting pressure on that sector.

Mr. Broadbent: There is a loophole right there.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I have said to the hon. member and to his colleagues previously, of course the guidelines themselves do not provide for withdrawal of services either by the employee group or by the employer.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBLE EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT IF CORPORATIONS CURTAIL SERVICES BECAUSE OF DISSATISFACTION WITH PROFIT GUIDELINES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): It confirms the point that this is simply another loophole in the whole mish-mash of the plan which the minister has brought forward. I should like to ask him a related question because we are talking about a financial institution here. Given the fact that the curtailment of service from the largest insurance company of this kind will mean a curtailment of revenue, which in turn means a decline in the level of investment for the coming months which will lead to the creation of more unemployment, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance in particular whether he is not concerned that the declining rate of investment, which will be inevitable if other companies duplicate this, will lead to further unemployment which is already at the highest level in Canada in numerical terms since 1940.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): I would have to say, as I said at the start, that I would want to find out whether the leader of the NDP is in fact stating accurately the situation of Royal Insurance. If the hon. member is stating it accurately, of course any substantial withdrawal of participation in the Canadian economy on the part of either the employee or management side would not be in the interests of the economy as a whole. Our view is that all Canadians, either corporate organizations or individual employees, should co-operate with the government's program.

DIFFICULTIES POSED BY CANDU PROGRAM—PROPOSED INQUIRY

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Before directing my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate him for the straightforwardness he demonstrated last night on the state-owned network.

The November 4-11 week has just been officially opened as the Nuclear Responsibility Week by the Canadian nuclear monitoring group to obtain answers raised within the framework of the CANDU program concerning radioactive residue disposal, the difficult enforcement of safeguards, and the possible use of reactors by our customers for building atomic weapons. Could the Prime Minister indicate to the House how things stand now? Could he also indicate whether the government will respond positively to the suggestion that a board of inquiry be set up to study this matter and report its findings to the public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member refers to a Canadian board of inquiry, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I do not see the need for it. The government policy is well known. As recently as yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated again in the House that at a meeting of nuclear technology suppliers which was held hardly a few months ago, Canada had adopted an extreme position in favour of a full scope of safeguards. Unfortunately, we do not know yet whether Canada's example and views will be followed and adopted by other countries. On this point, however, we are willing to initiate a debate and provide more information concerning our policy.

As to the first part of the hon. member's question, I am grateful to him for supporting, whenever he can, government policies aimed at helping the Canadian economy as a whole.

DORVAL AND MIRABEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO INVESTIGATE GRANTING OF LEASES TO SKY SHOPS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I wish to ask him if he has now had the opportunity to review the information in respect of the lease held by Sky Shops Export Limited as set forth in the petition I tabled earlier and the documentation I sent to him yesterday, and can he tell us what action, if any, he has initiated?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that I had discovered certain facts in relation to the Dorval lease, and I put them on the record. I have since examined the case in relation to the lease at Mirabel, at least in a preliminary way. I find that among the tenders which were received three appeared for final consideration, and those three varied from one level of guarantee to another level of rate. In the case of Sky Shops, it was the second best guarantee and the second best rate. With regard to the other two, one was best in guarantee and lowest in rate. The other one was lowest in guarantee and best in rate. An interdepartmental committee representing several departments of government, together with airport officials and the provincial government, analysed the bids and decided that the Sky Shops bid was in fact the best, and accordingly the contract was awarded.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will have another look at this, but on a related matter I should like to ask him if the government is taking the position that the statement by Senator Giguère is the official position and nothing further will be done on this aspect.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure which point the government takes any position on or what the hon. member is referring to. The part I have been looking at has been the nature of the bids which were received at Mirabel and the logic behind the awarding of the extension to Sky Shops in Dorval at the time in 1972 when it was done. I indicated yesterday to hon. members that at that point in time Sky Shops held a lease at a fairly low return on gross revenues, 5 per cent, I believe, and had three years and seven months left to run at that rate.

In connection with obtaining a further five-year extension they went to much higher rates immediately for the remaining three year seven month period, as well as to a higher rate for the remaining five year period with, of course, the impending problem of a switch to Mirabel of international traffic, which is the only relevant traffic to the duty free shop operation. It was to be transferred over a period of time in the late seventies from Dorval to Mirabel. What I think was in error in the suggestions from the hon. member and the petition was that the rates thus resulting in Dorval were out of line with rates elsewhere. In fact, they compare very directly with rates in effect in Toronto international airport.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

POSSIBILITY OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST BECAUSE OF SENATOR GIGUÈRE'S CONNECTION WITH SKY SHOPS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I wonder if he has had a chance to discuss the matter with the Minister of Transport in light of the terms of reference which he laid down so carefully not long ago regarding conflict of interest. As I understand the situation, members of the other place are members of parliament although they are elected for life, the same as we are members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Elected?

Mr. Woolliams: Appointed for life, although we are elected. Regarding the terms of reference on conflict of interest does the Prime Minister feel there has been a violation of the guidelines laid down on conflicts of interest?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had time to read the statement made by Senator Giguère in the other place. Listening to the answers given by the Minister of Transport to the questions asked, however, it is not apparent to me that there has been a conflict of interest. I would be happy to entertain argument on that subject from the hon. member. I believe that the senator has offered to submit to any inquiry that the Senate wanted to have into his conduct. Of course, the guidelines proposed by the government apply to both houses. The hon. member knows the state of debate on that. The guidelines have been looked at by a committee of the House and I believe are now being looked at by a committee of the Senate. We have had no final report from parliament on the government's guidelines.

Mr. Woolliams: A final supplementary. May I put this question to the Prime Minister? In light of the facts now known to him, if an elected member of this institution had the same kind of business involvement in a matter of this nature—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will come to the question and it is a serious question, if hon. members opposite will only hold their fire. I can understand their problem. They got a little upset. But I will come to my question. Reviewing the facts on that basis, would the Prime Minister say there had been a breach of the guidelines laid down in connection with conflict of interest?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is hypothetical. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICY—REASON FOR PROPOSED TAX ON EXPORTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. Between now and the time when hopefully inflation may be reduced to a far more acceptable level, is it the intention of the government to maintain a policy of neither stimulating nor deflating the economy so that the economic recovery and reduction of inflation may have a reasonable chance of success?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that would be the policy in general terms, although I would have to say there is some anticipation that the export sector of the economy would recover in the early part of 1976. At that time we would have to be concerned that the government policies were not over stimulative in the light of the inflation objective. Subject to that, we would not be proposing any change to the present policy.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Regarding the country's export business which we are so dependent upon, could the minister explain why the government proposes to introduce legislation in the near future imposing a tax on exports which will make it much more difficult for our hard pressed export industry to survive?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the reasons are as set out in the white paper. Basically, it is because at a time when export profits may well be increasing it would be as unfair to firms selling to Canadians as it would be unfair to labour groups to permit one corporate group to recover profits beyond the guidelines. This is a measure, as I indicated to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, we would be introducing to parliament to impose an export levy to level off such additional profits with the condition of making them refundable, principally for capital reinvestment in Canada.

Oral Questions

POSSIBILITY OF NEW MONETARY POLICY AND NEW BUDGET

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that there is general agreement that wage and price controls cannot succeed without profound monetary and fiscal reforms, will the minister be announcing a definitive monetary policy in the near future, and will a new budget be brought down soon indicating that the government is serious about giving leadership in the whole area of restraints and fiscal responsibility?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I responded on a number of questions, the monetary policy as set out by the governor of the Bank of Canada is the policy we would intend to follow for the future. I would not anticipate making a budgetary statement before Christmas and indeed, perhaps not for some time after that.

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH REGARD TO REDUCING EXPENDITURES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question. If the government will not soon bring down a definitive budget announcing restraint and fiscal responsibility, will the Minister of Finance be making specific announcements in the near future indicating how the federal government will show leadership in the whole area of restraints by cutting and controlling government expenditure?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed the government's intention to review the expenditure proposal for 1976-77. I am confident that my colleague the President of the Treasury Board will be announcing to parliament at the time the estimates for that period are produced if not before, a number of changes we would propose in our spending proposal. I would hope at that time that, while these may involve some considerable political impact, the hon. gentleman and other hon. members will support us in the cuts.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

SUGGESTED PROVINCIAL ACTION IN REDUCING SPEED LIMITS AND MAKING USE OF SEAT BELTS COMPULSORY

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of a recent report from the department of transport for Ontario which shows that more automobile drivers were killed last year while not wearing seat belts, 61.2 per cent, than the year before, 56.9 per cent, can the minister now prevail upon the Ontario and other provincial governments to introduce compulsory seat belt legislation along with reduced speed limits?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to bring up that matter with my provincial colleagues when I visited the provinces last September. We had the opportunity of looking into it together; generally speaking, the health ministers are very favourable to such legislation. Of course, the decision would have to be taken by the provincial governments, but we figured that if it were passed as early as next year, we could save, in health costs, a minimum of roughly $75 million a year based on the experience in Australia, New Zealand, France and other countries.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED ACTION OF DETROIT POLICE IN APPREHENDING CANADIAN CITIZEN IN CANADA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I gave him notice of it. Will the minister inquire into an incident in the course of which it is alleged that one Charles Apaquash, a Canadian citizen was chased by the Detroit police from the Detroit end of the tunnel between Detroit and Windsor and was arrested by the Detroit police when he was one third of a mile into Canadian territory and was then handcuffed and taken back to Detroit by the Detroit police? If he finds that the facts are as alleged, will he make the appropriate protest to the authorities of the United States against this high handed invasion of Canadian territory and the rights of Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly inquire into the situation mentioned by the hon. member. As the hon. member and other hon. members of the House know, there have been some incidents of a like character in the recent past. We have expressed to the government of the United States the serious concern we feel at incursions into Canada by police authorities in border communities. After I have examined this particular case, it may be necessary to follow up with further representations to the authorities of the United States.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AVAILABILITY OF AGREEMENT ON LAND CLAIMS OF NATIVES OF JAMES BAY AREA OF QUEBEC

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I gave him notice of the question. I understand that the government of Quebec will make public today, in Quebec, the proposed agreement between the government of Canada, Quebec and the Cree and Inuit of northern Quebec, in the James Bay area, regarding native land claims. Does the minister plan to make this draft agreement available to the House today, as well?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in view of the intended action of the government of Quebec, I intended to table the document today. Unfortunately, as the presses in Montreal are still clanking, it is not available in both official languages. Possibly if it is available later in the day, the House will give permission to table it; or, if not today, tomorrow. I ought to mention that we expect the agreement to be signed early next week, and shortly thereafter it will become the business of the House, since the document requires legislative action by the parliament of Canada.

MANPOWER

POSSIBLE LOSS OF EMPLOYMENT AS RESULT OF BANKRUPTCY OF ESSEX PACKERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As Essex Packers of Hamilton were placed in receivership on Friday last, and hundreds of workers both there and at subsidiaries now face the threat of unemployment, can the minister advise if he has taken action to avert this situation which would cost these people their jobs and, eventually, the UIC an estimated $2 million in claims in the current year?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this situation has been made known to the government. The Minister of Labour and I have been consulting on the matter and we will take every possible step to alleviate whatever distress the situation may cause.

AGRICULTURE

FARM MACHINERY—POSSIBILITY VERSATILE COMPANY WILL BE PURCHASED BY UNITED STATES FIRM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It has to do with the recent offer by an American firm to purchase a controlling interest in a Canadian farm machinery manufacturing company, Versatile Manufacturing Company Limited. As Versatile has become one of the major competitors in the farm machinery business in Canada, even though 90 per cent of Canada's farm machinery supplies come from foreign sources, and knowing the minister's sympathy for Canadian farm machinery manufacturers, may I ask if the minister is concerned about the possibility of this transaction being concluded, and if he plans to ensure that this company remains in Canadian hands?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that the matter must come before the Foreign Investment Review Board, which must decide if the transaction is in Canada's interest. I definitely am concerned, and have said so publicly. I have said that we import far too much farm machinery into Canada. We made this known to Secretary of State Kissinger, when he was here, and I have discussed this, as well, with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

POSSIBLE TAKEOVER OF VERSATILE MANUFACTURING BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the minister did nothing more than express concern. I directed the question to him, in the interest of Canadian agriculture. May I now ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce if he is aware of the transaction, if it is before the Foreign Investment Review Board and if the government has specific recommendations to ensure that Versatile Manufacturing remains in Canadian hands?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the transaction is now before the Foreign Investment Review Agency. Given that fact, I think the hon. member will agree that further comment on my part would be premature until we have a report from the Foreign Investment Review Board. I have asked them to speed their consideration of this matter, so that it can be brought to me and, subsequently, to the government as a whole as quickly as possible.

AIR TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED UNIFORM REGULATIONS FOR COMMERCIAL AND PRIVATE CARRIERS

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister explain why operating rules applying to private carriers like Panarctic aircraft are different from those applying to commercial carriers? As well, will the minister consider the feasibility of introducing one set of regulations for both private and commercial carriers, in order to create uniformity of air safety regulations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may have missed some of the exchanges in the House in recent days. The practice has been to develop particular rules of safety for commercial carriers, but to apply different standards to completely private carriers, in view of the different nature of the operations and the necessity for protecting the public. I indicated in earlier exchanges that we are looking at how regulations apply to commercial and private carriers and that we had drafted proposals for new certification and new qualification. These are in the hands of interested people for comment. We shall be proposing some new regulations in due course.

CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRCRAFT—POSSIBILITY OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST AS RESULT OF GOVERNMENT INTEREST IN PANARCTIC

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister admit the possibility of conflict of interest in the Panarctic crash investigation, since MOT owns 45 per cent of Panarctic?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the fact of a government interest in Panarctic in no way impinged on the department in the investigation. Hon. members know that we have in hand a proposal for an independent investigating board. This matter has been raised in the House recently a number of times and, in due course, we will proceed with proposals in that regard. I have no hesitation in saying that the investigation of this particular case was very adequate indeed and in no way suffered by virtue of the government's involvement in the Panarctic operation.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BOARD

OPPORTUNITY OF INTERESTED GROUPS TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS TO BOARD IN CASE INVOLVING VERSATILE MANUFACTURING

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the hon. member for Vegreville and arises from the ambiguous answer of the Minister of Agriculture. I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Apparently the federal government has not adopted any position on a foreign company's attempt to buy the remaining major Canadian manufacturer of farm implements, Versatile. My question is this: Is it possible for interested groups to make representations before the Foreign Investment Review Board, so that the views of those whoe manufacture and use farm machinery may be heard?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I distinguish between the formal application before the Foreign Investment Review Agency, and the attitude of the government and my own attitude, given my present responsibilities. My view is similar to that of the Minister of Agriculture, namely, in general, that it is regrettable that more farm machinery manufacturing is not controlled and owned in Canada. To reply to that aspect of the question, I hope we can hear from all parties concerned as to how this situation can be improved and rectified, and we will give it all the support we can. As to the application before FIRA, I am sure the hon. member will understand that it would be inappropriate for me, in the absence of a report from FIRA, to comment specifically on that application. But that is the only distinction I make.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister missed the purport of my question. I asked if any interested groups can make representation to the Foreign Investment Review Agency, not merely to the minister. I know the minister's door is always open to worthwhile, worthy suggestions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Can interested farm groups and other interested Canadians make direct representation to the Foreign Investment Review Agency, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I would only reserve my answer to the point that I am not a lawyer and therefore do not know if I am legally correct. However, since this is a matter of public interest, since this application is being considered, I assume that any person can make his views known to the agency. The law passed by this House clearly made it mandatory for the agency not to discuss applications before it, by way of public discussion, before a decision is made. Since the decision has become public knowledge through other routes, presumably there is nothing to stop any person from indicating directly to the Foreign Investment Review Board or to me his views on these things. Indeed, some people have already done so privately.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY POLICY—REASON FOR IMPORTATION OF DAIRY PRODUCTS—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCTION OF SUBSIDY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday, he made a statement on dairy policy. Considering this statement in which on the one side the minister said that producers will have to reduce their production and that, on the other side, he is favouring an increase in imports from 5 to 10 per cent of the needs, how can he explain to this House his position asking for a reduction in Canadian production while favouring imports? Can he also say whether the government intends to reduce subsidies of 26 cents a hundred weight paid annually on a period of ten years?

● (1450)

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member's question, his explanation of it, is at fault. What the dairy farmers of Canada actually have done has been to increase their production more than the amount of money we have to pay them for subsidy. They can continue to produce if they wish, but they will not get the subsidy on it. They will not get any more money than I have. I told them last April that I had enough money for 100 million hundredweight of industrial milk. They have increased production to a point at which it appears they will have 111 million hundredweight of milk which is over the amount they had set and agreed upon. I met with them at noon today. The amount of cheese that is allowed to enter Canada from foreign countries is a matter of deep concern to them and we are discussing that question further. But that is according to the pattern which has developed over the last number of years concerning the historical right to that share of our domestic market.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. I would ask him whether, in view of the government's concern about the plight of low income Canadians as a result of the sharp increase in the cost of living, consideration is being given to increasing the federal minimum wage payable to this group of Canadians who are largely unorganized and who have virtually no bargaining power to ensure protection against increases in costs as most other Canadians will be getting.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The hon. member may have noted that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced last week that the government upped the lower limit of allowable increases irrespective of the guidelines—

An hon. Member: That's not the question.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is related to the minimum wage. Let me answer the question. It permits it to be $3.50. Below that, no guidelines apply. Guidelines would apply above $3.50 an hour which is a significant indication, I would think, of what we feel should happen in the economy at large as far as low income groups are concerned. As far as the minimum wage is concerned, making aspects of that mandatory, we are looking at the whole situation of minimum wages very closely now.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Let me finish. We have also had a meeting of labour ministers, federal and provincial, where this was discussed in terms of minimum wage and how the provinces will respond right across the country to any increase in the minimum wage. Certainly there was, I think, beneficial and constructive discussion with respect to the minimum wage. I hope to have something to announce in the short term future.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the fact that the people who get less than $3.50 an hour are largely employed by small employers, there are no unions; they have no bargaining power, I ask the minister how these people will get the increase which is suggested by the Minister of Finance except through increases in minimum wages by both the federal and the provincial governments. Did the minister in his discussions with the provinces (a) suggest to them that the federal government was prepared to increase the minimum wage for those who come under federal jurisdiction, and (b) urge them to give a similar increase to workers who come under provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Obviously, I wanted to discuss it with the provinces first. Whatever the federal government does affects only 10 per cent of the work force under federal jurisdiction so naturally if we want any change in the minimum rate to have any impact at all we want the provinces to come along. That was the purpose of the discussions. I have already told the hon. member that I shall have more to say about the minimum wage at a later stage. With reference to his remarks concerning the $3.50 an hour, he is quite right; there is nothing mandatory with respect to that, but for workers who are unorganized and receiving less, it seems to me it is an opportunity for the trade union movement to do something in terms of organization and otherwise to bring those workers up to that level.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO RESTRICT HARMFUL ADVERTISING

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Since advertising is a major factor in increasing the cost of living, as it urges people to live beyond their means, can the Prime Minister tell the House if the government is considering adopting any measures to restrict advertising which is responsible for over-spending?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member is bringing up a very important point, Mr. Speaker. The government had in the past the opportunity to study certain aspects of this problem. I will tell the hon. member that, for the time being, we do not consider it helpful to approach the inflation problem the way the hon. members did, and this is for a very simple reason, namely that Canadian resources are at present under-used. There is more unemployment than we would like to see and, consequently, we do not wish to reduce the demand for Canadian products which effectively exists in our economy. My reply, however, is on a short term basis. The hon. member's suggestion remains very valid. I personally agree with the hon. member that on a long term basis we should try to decrease excessive demands for unnecessary products.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DEVELOPMENT OF LAND USE POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and it has to do with a comment she made recently with reference to land use policy. Would the hon. lady tell the House whether in fact the government has a land use policy and, if so, when such a policy might be made known to the House?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): I made no promises that there was a land use policy forthcoming. What I did say was that I had been given the responsibility by the Prime Minister to discuss with the provincial ministers how we could get together in order to discuss the problems related to the elaboration of a land use policy. This, I am doing. While recognizing that such a policy will be implemented largely by the provinces, I do feel the federal government can and should take the lead in bringing the provinces together to identify the problems we face.

Oral Questions

INDUSTRY

FAILURE OF MICROSYSTEMS INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED INQUIRY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, this being my first opportunity of congratulating him on his new portfolio. Has he now had an opportunity of reviewing the Microsystems International situation and can he advise the House whether or not, after observing that the federal government had $36.5 million invested in it, which was lost, he is in favour of having a public inquiry or a review by the appropriate committee of parliament into the matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): On the latter point, I would presume it is within the purview of parliament itself to review it. I have been given a briefing, which is, I believe, substantially the same as was provided to my predecessor and by and large to the House but I have not really had an opportunity as yet to go into the matter in detail.

OLYMPIC GAMES

DIFFICULTIES IN PREPARING FACILITIES—POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVE PLANS FOR HOLDING GAMES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the tremendous problems officials in Montreal appear to be facing in preparing the facilities for the Olympics, can the right hon. gentleman tell the House whether the COJO officials are still planning to hold the Games in Montreal as scheduled and, if not, what alternative plans there might be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have heard absolutely nothing to the contrary from any person in authority in Montreal or elsewhere.

● (1500)

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise the same point that I raised yesterday. We ask questions of ministers and, properly so, ministers say that they would like to look into the matter. Under the new rules, I want to know whether a minister feels that he can remain silent unless he is recognized; otherwise we will never get the information. I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) a very serious question with reference to an investigation by a certain branch of the armed forces of Canada, and he should by now be able to supply a very simple answer to the question I raised on Monday.

Mr. Richardson: On the same point, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will check his mail he will find the answer is in his office right now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know that under the guise of a point of order I can permit a dialogue to carry on back and forth with intervention from both sides. The hon. member has raised his point and put it on the record and there has been some sort of response. I do not know whether we can get into a point of order on this matter, and I do not think I can recognize the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) on such point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, we put verbal questions to ministers opposite, and if they are trying to hide the facts I can see why they want to communicate with us indirectly or confidentially. I asked this question in open forum in this legislature. If these new rules are going to be used to silence the opposition and take away the tools we have to get prior information, then we had better take another look at them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect to the point raised by the hon. member, the fact is that the change of rules has nothing to do with the point he has made. The different procedures that are used during the question period are evident; they have to do with the time that the question period begins and ends and the elimination of points of order during the course of the question period.

The hon. member made the point that when he asked a question of a minister, the minister replied that he would have to take the matter under consideration. Does this mean that the following day or on some subsequent occasion the minister must be recognized independently to answer the question and so take up the time of the question period still further? Or would the hon. member who asked the question originally have to be recognized to ask it of the minister a second time? It would seem to me that this has nothing to do with the new procedures. I do not know whether the point can be resolved at this time, but if there is a disposition on the part of the House leaders to make representations in this regard, I would be only too pleased to hear them.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—ACCESS TO TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON CORPORATE CONCENTRATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which relates to the activities and reports of the Royal Commission on Corporate Concentration which began its hearings in the city of Ottawa on Monday. At the time the commission was set up, we in the New Democratic Party said that it was not necessary, that what was really required was government legislation on the question of corporate power. However, in good faith we made a submission on Monday to that commission.

As a result of the attitude taken by the commissioners, a good part of which horrified the members of our party in terms of the restrictive view that they had of their own task, we requested at the earliest possible instance a transcript of the proceedings of that day to form our own judgment as to what was said in precise detail, so we could therefore take appropriate political action during the last couple of days in this House of Commons. However, we were informed by the commission that it was not possible to supply a transcript until Friday of this week.

At the same time, we were referred to Nethercut and Company, a private firm engaged in providing technical assistance in the production of transcripts, and they too said that such transcript could not be made available until Friday. We were prepared to accept that on the assumption that this ruling would hold for all members of parliament. However, I learned today that a transcript was provided to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or at least to the Prime Minister's office, this morning, some two days ahead of the time that it would be made available to other members of parliament.

As a member of this House, I submit that this infringes upon not only my rights and privileges as a member but also those of all members who may well have wanted to respond as we do in what we regard as a responsible and political way. I repeat that the transcript has been made available to the Prime Minister but has not been made available to other members of the House. Therefore, if Your Honour decides that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I will move that this matter be referred immediately to the House committee on privileges and elections.

MR. RODRIGUEZ—COST OF TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON CORPORATE CONCENTRATION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects all members of this House and is relevant to the issue raised by my leader. As we are all aware, earlier this year the government established a royal commission to investigate corporate concentration in Canada. This commission has begun its hearings and I telephoned the commission this morning to request the minutes of its hearings. I was told that the minutes would cost 25 cents per page and would only be available after a week. I also understand that the commission will not be making copies of the many briefs presented to it available to members of this House, and is instead suggesting that people presenting the briefs should spend the money to make them available.

These hearings are extremely important to members of parliament for many reasons, but primarily to enable us to evaluate whether the exercise is worth the expenditure by the government, and secondly to gain any information which might become available on Canada's power structure. It is vital that the members of this parliament have rapid access to this sort of information if we are to be able to determine the quality of the work done.

Since my leader has raised this question, I also wonder whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) paid 25 cents a page for his copy of the minutes. If I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In order to give careful consideration to the representations made by both hon. members on the point, I propose to reserve decision on this matter for a short time. It seems to me that while both hon. members have certainly put forward a worth-while suggestion regarding improvements that ought to be adopted in the procedures of the royal commission vis-à-vis its relationship with members of parliament. I do not know whether the converse is true, that the failure of the commission to serve well the request or requirement of members of parliament constitutes, to that extent, such an interference with the ability of a member to discharge his duties that it raises a prima facie question of privilege.

However, it is certainly worth while to put this representation on the record, and in order to be absolutely clear on the precedents, I would prefer to reserve the matter for 24 hours, if that is agreeable.

DIVORCE ACT, 1976

MEASURE TO REMOVE MATRIMONIAL OFFENCES AS GROUNDS FOR DIVORCE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-415, respecting divorce.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes a fundamental change and reform of our divorce law. The present grounds for divorce are a series of matrimonial offences. The bill proposes to substitute the irretrievable breakdown of marriage as the ground for divorce. The bill provides the presumption of breakdown if the parties have remained separated for one year. It provides that no divorce shall be granted for two years after the date of marriage except by special order of the court.

It provides, further, that the children and spouses of the marriage shall be assured of adequate maintenance before the divorce is granted. This bill is based upon a working paper of the Law Reform Commission of Canada and upon the Divorce Reform Act, 1969, of Great Britain.

UNITED STATES OFFICIALS IN CANADA

Question No. 1,604—Mr. Beatty:

Has the government any knowledge of the presence of any officials of the American Government stationed in this country, except for those people listed in the October 1974 Diplomatic Corps Directory published by the Department of External Affairs or members of the United States Armed Forces and, if so (a) what are their names (b) where are they stationed (c) what are their responsibilities (d) for what organization do they work (e) on what date were they first stationed in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned: The government is aware of the presence in Canada of all foreign diplomatic and consular personnel in Canada, including those of the United States of America, whose presence is required to be notified by a sending state to a receiving state in accordance with international law and custom. The names of the diplomatic and consular representatives and of national representatives to ICAO appear in the departmental publication, "Diplomatic Corps and Consular and Other Representatives in Canada". The names of the members of the administrative and technical staff of the embassy do not appear in this publication, but are on record in the department. The Government would agree that the names and job titles of these support personnel could be made available to those members of the House who wish to inspect them, although it is not routine for the Government to publish them.

In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned: While this Department does not maintain any official record of United States officials stationed in Canada, we are aware that there are 93 United States Customs employees and 46 United States Immigration employees located at various points in Canada at the present time. (a) We do not have information concerning the names of these employees.

MEASURE TO ADD NEW CLASS OF INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-69, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I was waxing along last night about the minor attachment period.

An hon. Member: And you are waning today.

Mr. Leggatt: I hope to wane shortly. I was trying to bring to the minister's attention a problem in respect of the minor attachment period and the reason we should be thinking in terms of eliminating this period, making one attachment period which a claimant could understand without the assistance of a bureaucracy of lawyers, accountants and union officials.

An hon. Member: Don't include lawyers.

Mr. Leggatt: In any event, I think the minister misunderstood in that he thought I was seeking to reduce the minor attachment period to the existing attachment period. I am suggesting somewhere between the two, at a cost that would not be too significant in terms of the fund but would be worthy of looking at in terms of simplifying the whole program dealing with minor and major attachments to the working force.

This is an area that certainly should be investigated, because the eight-week attachment period and the time it takes for one to re-establish his major attachment to the work force is a disincentive to re-employment. I do not think anyone, no matter where he stands in respect of the principle of unemployment insurance, is in favour of provisions which are in fact disincentives to those seeking employment from actually going out and looking for work.

I was dealing with matters I felt had not been canvassed in this legislation but that I think should be dealt with if we are going to clean up and improve the act. One of the difficulties for a long time—other members have mentioned this—is in relation to the question of entrapment by the operation of the benefit control system. There is no doubt that any claimant who has had explained to him carefully what he must do to qualify would never be disqualified, particularly if he knows the rules, because he would then know the kind of answers to give the benefit control officer. What has happened in the past is that those who have not had jobs, and were perhaps not as bright as some others, were being disqualified, while the sharpies were being allowed to continue to receive benefits. That is a system we do not want to see prevail.

What is needed is a whole new approach in respect of benefit control officers. I am talking about a human approach and not an approach by an RCMP officer attempting to get a confession from a criminal, which is much like what has happened in the past. The change would require a humanistic approach to the claimant, because the weak are now suffering and the strong are getting away. I think that no one in this House wants that situation to continue. We need clear legislative guidelines in respect of benefit control officers, and I think a careful look should be taken in respect of previous occupations.

In terms of the question of suitability of employment under this act we have not had any change. There are guidelines which are exercised when someone who is unemployed has a special skill. They do not have to drop the skill level immediately but are held at that level for a time. I am not sure of the formula, but as a result of discussions with certain individuals I understand that in fact the formula varies to some extent.

In any event, there is a formula, for example, whereby an unemployed teacher does not have to accept a job for a period of time if there is no teaching position available. This may apply also to an accountant, a welder or someone else. It is my view that where work is available, people should accept the work. I do not think we need an unemployment system which perpetuates a class system. I see no reason, if I should be unemployed, why I should not be required to take work that is available.

There is dignity involved in work: some of it may not be something a person would want to do for the rest of his or her life, but I do not think there is anything against moving up and down in the skilled levels when people are unemployed. I do not see why, after a period of time at a skilled level, they should not be required to take available work. In other words, I do not see why the chief chef of a hotel should not be required to flip hamburgers at Macdonald's if he is unemployed. I do not see anything wrong with that. I think the minister should pay attention to these points in respect of the amendments.

Too much attention has been paid by this House and the media to alleged abuses of the fund. The facts are clear: the cost to the fund as a result of abuses is minimal. I listened carefully last night to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) who said that because of the deficit there must be something rotten in respect of the fund. The reason we have a deficit is clear: there is too much unemployment. There is nothing very complicated about that.

I defy the hon. member to cost the abuses and to tell me what percentage of the deficit is a direct result thereof. It is almost nil. I am not condoning this, because of course we should be as vigilant as we can in getting rid of any cheaters in view of the fact it destroys the fund and its credibility in the minds particularly of workers who are unhappy to pay for the cheaters. We in this party are just as unhappy as anybody else that there are abuses of the fund. The workers in the mill in my riding are not particularly happy to be paying for the guys the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary suggests cheat. There is no reason why they should. So certainly we want to see enacted any kind of enforcement that will improve the operation of the fund.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary put forward some views which probably are widely believed, but I think there is a misconception in this regard. He started off by saying:

> I think we must decide whether this should be a welfare scheme or an insurance scheme, Mr. Speaker. I submit it is really a welfare scheme. It has taught people not to work and, as a result, we are losing the work ethic in Canada.

That was the theme of his speech, yet he concluded with these words:

> I received a telephone call today from one of my constituents who is approaching the age of 65. He has paid into the unemployment insurance plan all his life. Now that he is about to retire, he will not receive any benefit.

He cannot have it both ways. There happens to be a welfare provision within the fund. He wants to retain that but does not want to call it a welfare fund. There is a clear inconsistency here. In terms of the sort of philosophical approach the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary takes, there has to be some welfare provision within the fund; it simply cannot be a bald fund dealing only with common aspects.

I should like to deal briefly with the amendments the minister is proposing. One of the more contentious is the question of the additional time one must wait when a quit occurs. Initially I was sympathetic to that view, and still am. In respect of those persons who quit, as opposed to those who are laid off as a result of lack of work, there should be a significant distinction in the length of time they wait before they are paid their cheque. Quite frankly, I think that if you have two people working on the same job and one is fired because of misconduct, or possibly because of a drinking or some other problem, and the other person is laid off because there is lack of work, it is inequitable that both should have approximately the same length of time to wait before they receive their benefits.

The difficulty in respect of such a provision is that a tremendous number of people are not legitimately fired for misconduct. There is great potential for abuse. There is difficulty involved in extending the time for those who quit and thereby encouraging people to try to hold a job and at least to try to find another one while they are employed, rather than collect from the fund. I think this is a worth-while objective, but the difficulty is that no one has properly defined "misconduct", "just case" or the other qualification "refused suitable employment".

Even though there is a body of jurisprudence under the Unemployment Insurance Act, it is a vague generalization and there is still a bias in favour of the employer. In fact, the additional waiting period the minister seeks in the bill could work great hardship on some people. I have a tendency to favour the additional disqualification in the hope that we might have some tightening up, but I am not sure the minister is ready to tighten up the bias which naturally flows in favour of the employer. The reason for the bias in favour of the employer, first of all, is the attack by the media on the fund and the principle of unemployment insurance. This attack has been quite overwhelming. If one puts oneself in the position of either a benefit control officer, a board referee or even an umpire, one finds that the pressures by the press media and what one might see as the prevailing public climate create a tendency to see dishonesty where it does not exist, and a tendency to move against the person seeking the benefit because of the rumours heard about people skiing on Whistler Mountain wearing a "UIC Ski Bum" shirt. Therefore, there is a built-in bias in favour of the employer. So simply by extending the period of disqualification for benefits in respect of a quit, we do not cure the other half of the problem.

I submit the problem is that while there should be a distinction between those laid off and those who quit, we must take into account the other part, which is the question of defining fairly what is misconduct and what is just cause, and also correct the inbred bias in respect of the operation of the fund by the various officials within it. If that could be done, I would certainly support the principle the minister is attempting to place in the fund.

An incredible clause is the amendment to section 24(1) which deals with the reduction from 75 per cent of insurable earnings to 66⅔ per cent. The minister has not attempted to make any distinction between those with dependants and those with none. I cannot imagine a more regressive step under the bill. I submit that the financial savings probably are not large. I do not have the figures and I do not know if it is the hard-heartedness of the minister or whether there is a real financial reason for the change, but considering that we are in an era when we have adopted, I think, a pretty firm philosophy that those with dependants should receive more benefits than those without—and the minister must surely have supported the family allowance provisions which this government instituted some time ago—it is difficult to understand why we take this regressive and retrograde step of denying dependants proper and adequate support under the unemployment insurance fund. It is clearly a conservative, retrogressive step.

If we continue to say that because we increased family allowances some years ago, therefore they do not need it—and that was the logic that allowed this government to take away the milk and bread subsidies—we will wipe out all the social benefits that we have been successful in achieving over the past 15 or 20 years. You cannot keep saying: We have this program, therefore we will cut the other program. It is very clear that in this country the rich continue to get richer and the poor continue to get poorer, and every time this kind of legislation comes before the House it displays the kind of hard-heartedness that I did not really expect from this minister, although I might have expected it from some of his colleagues.

The other amendment with which I wanted to deal briefly concerns coverage to the age of 65. Without going into it in detail, the justification is the improvements that have occurred in terms of retirement benefits, and therefore this provision is unnecessary. If ever there is still a group in our society which needs the help of all of us, which needs continuing benefits, which needs additional health care, housing and all the other things we should be providing, it is those who are 65 and over—and to take away this benefit is a callous approach. The savings to the fund are minuscule and the benefits are significant to those who have spent their whole lives working. So I believe this to be an unfortunate move. The decision not to grant advance pay under section 28 is, again, clearly a retrogressive step. It is no skin off the government's nose to advance pay so someone does not have to get emergency food vouchers to keep himself going. Again, it is a hard-hearted and callous approach to the act and certainly does not improve it in any way.

I think the coverage of LIP and LEAP sponsors is progressive. I think this is a mixed bag. There are amendments that certainly weaken the support. I think the changes in terms of maternity provisions are desirable, but of course the key problem in the bill and the key reason that I cannot support it is the change in the financial formula. If ever there was an abdication of the government's responsibility in terms of creating a society with full employment, here it is. To suggest that no longer do we rely on a 4 per cent unemployment rate, and to admit tacitly that in fact 7 per cent is a normal unemployment rate for this society, is a tragedy for Canada. It is a tragedy because before we know it, not only will governments but people will accept it; and that is where the permissive rot is starting.

We have heard a lot of talk here about the work ethic. I happen to be one who believes in it. I think we should do what we can to encourage the work ethic, but you do not encourage it when you have a government which says, "We will now think about 7 per cent as being a normal rate of unemployment rather than 4 per cent". You do not do it by having a government which does not give you unemployment projections when it is asked, and you do not do it by having a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who a year and a half ago said that maybe work is now becoming irrelevant and we are entering a new era, while shrugging his shoulders.

There is a certain consistency in that philosophy when you take that statement with the changes in the unemployment insurance fund and line up the two. That is where the abandonment of the work ethic is—it is on the government side. We are a party which believes in full employment. We believe in a guaranteed full employment act. We do not want unemployment. We have unemployment insurance because of the system we live under, but we still believe we can create a society where there is work for all. We want from each according to his ability, and to give to each according to his need.

When you say "from each according to his ability", that means everyone in our society has something to contribute to all of society. People tend to look at the NDP and say, "Oh well, you people are great as the welfare party. You have done fine on the social reform legislation and we recognize that". But they forget the second part of the socialist ethic which is absolutely key to our philosophy, and that is, from each according to his ability. This means full work for everyone, with everyone contributing and being a meaningful member of the society. It is that philosophy that has been abandoned, although I suppose it has never been accepted on the government side. That is why we oppose this legislation, because it still does not deal in any significant way with the question of unemployment.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Madam Speaker, I am indeed much interested in taking part in the debate on this legislation, more especially as it gives me the opportunity to make the necessary clarifications regarding the problem of unemployment insurance in general.

Let me first of all point out the speech made in the House by my colleague the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne). I think he has demonstrated in a very thoughtful and specific way the real problems raised by this legislation. As he was telling me, we have here a series of efforts on the part of public servants with a view to improving the legislation. But unfortunately, those public servants seem to know nothing about the actual problems faced by unemployment insurance claimants. Indeed, it would seem that the problem of unemployment per se is not understood as it should be. While we would all tend to expect a definite improvement following the amendments brought in by the minister, we must unfortunately realize that this is only attempted improvement and that finally nothing has been improved with the introduction of those amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Apparently, this stems from the fact that there is hesitation about the very concept of unemployment, that is whether we should really help those who for any reason cannot remain in employment or whether the purpose of that Act is to help them, or still whether it is rather a fight to prevent the largest number possible of unemployed from receiving benefits.

Madam Speaker, when day in and day out one has to refer a tremendous number of cases submitted by unemployment insurance claimants, one does realize that it is often the second way of thinking which prevails, meaning that UIC officials are involved in a fight against the unemployed in order to prevent them from receiving benefits. Of course, this warps the fundamental principle enshrined in the Unemployment Insurance Act which is aimed at helping those in need since, even though they are unemployed, they must continue to live.

I understand that one should try to prevent any abuse from those who avail themselves of unemployment insurance benefits more or less honestly and even fraudulently. Of course, we understand this. There is no doubt that we would need to have a completely different system in order to eliminate the existing phenomenon of people seeking unemployment. Why does this phenomenon exist? It would take too long to go over all the explanations to show that it is caused by the deficiency of the system itself. We could partly solve this problem by accepting, for instance, to implement in Canada, an annual guaranteed minimum income plan such as that favored by the Social Credit Party, but since we have not reached that point yet and since the government seems determined not to accept any such proposal, we can only criticize, as objectively as possible, the minister's proposals concerning improvements to the existing Unemployment Insurance Act.

I therefore say that under this policy of trying to prevent people from receiving unemployment insurance when they do not necessarily have the right to do so, we are being utterly unfair towards those who really need and are truly entitled to benefits. Bill C-69 contains nothing which could completely eliminate the problems that stems from the present legislation, and we deplore it. On the contrary, the government seems to add even further problems. For instance, it was already difficult enough for people aged 65 to support all the pressures placed on them to prevent them from being truly unemployed when they were dealing with the unemployment insurance office. The government think they can solve the problem by saying: Well, people aged 65 or over will no longer be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. Madam Speaker, others have said so before me, but I would like to repeat that this is an outrageous case of discrimination.

And until it is proven that the individual who is 65 can no longer work it is discriminatory to suggest that at 65 someone is ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and I think in addition that is a direct attack against the work of those people most of whom are now 65 and plain manual workers. Most of them started to work at the age of 15 which means that quite often they have been working for 50 years. So they paid unemployment insurance since the legislation came into effect. They cannot get it in their heads, no matter the explanations that could be given to them, that they are not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits if they are still capable of working, even though they may be on compulsory retirement.

So we are against this amendment which reduces the possibility of benefits from 70 to 65.

Another aspect of the bill seems to spell improvement, but it is so shy that it cannot be termed real improvement. It is the extension apparently granted to those who leave their job because of illness. We should have made here a much clearer, a much more precise improvement as, once more, it is already distressing enough to have to leave a job because of employment shortage or because you become physically unable to work and we should not worsen the situation of a person unable to work because of illness. It is already distressing enough to be ill and it should not be worsened by all kinds of petty annoyances concerning the initial period or the additional period. Madam Speaker, this is certainly a reason that should be readily accepted at the same level as regular unemployment insurance because any man obviously needs an income to live and when he is sick it is even worse and even more distressing. This is why I expected the minister to accept sickness as a valid motive—just as employment shortage is—and also to make it easier for pregnant women to draw unemployment insurance benefits. It would be a good way to recognize the contribution of women at a time when they encourage population growth in Canada.

Madam Speaker, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, when we see that this bill tries without any results to improve the legislation and that we can feel an underlying desire to further restrict those who claim unemployment insurance benefits, we must conclude that this bill is not satisfying and does not meet the actual interests of the people. And in a period like the present one where an unemployment problem really exists, it is not the right time to complicate the situation even more. And I repeat, the unemployed has to live.

Madam Speaker, if we really wished to improve the unemployment insurance legislation we should change its principle. It should rather become employment insurance. If we had a commission deeply committed to find employment, and possibly create some so that a person would not have to be left without income by reason of shortage, then it would be another matter. But in spite of all the suggestions made, instead of paying unemployment insurance benefits, it would now be possible to promote local initiative projects for instance. We could even transfer part of the moneys paid the unemployment insurance fund to local initiative projects, because it is always more meaningful to pay people for providing a service, for producing something. But not only does it appear that the amounts allocated to those projects will not be increased but, in keeping with the last guidelines set forth by the Prime Minister himself, even those expenses are to be cut down.

In that case, I would urge the minister to make up for the lack of employment—and therefore the necessity of paying benefits to a far greater number of unemployed—by simply providing incentives for job creation, one of which might be local initiatives. This would be a first step towards employment insurance instead of unemployment insurance as we now experience.

Madam Speaker, in concluding my short remarks, I would stress the fact that whatever the situation in our country now, a legislation should never punish those who have no option but to apply for unemployment insurance benefits. In other words, I would even say interpretations of the act should be more in favour of claimants rather than systematically aim at opposing them. For one, two or three unemployed workers who might appear to have a stretchable conscience when it comes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, there may be one who will be punished although he has an absolute right to benefits. Even if it were only to avoid unfair treatment for that claimant, I think the act should always be interpreted in its widest meaning. I make this recommendation for I am sure that all my colleagues here in this House also have had many times to deal with unemployment problems submitted to them by their constituents.

We are well aware of all the difficulties experienced by some claimants. Now that we try to improve the legislation on unemployment insurance, we should be careful and try to give those who unfortunately rely on such panacea the possibility of enjoying a decent life with unemployment insurance benefits. We should not force people to struggle constantly against the legislation and the civil servants. We should rather take the first alternative, namely to really help the taxpayer.

Madam Speaker, unfortunately I do not expect this bill to bring any necessary improvements and I hope that the committee will propose serious amendments to this act so that the Unemployment Insurance Commission be really upgraded.

● (1550)

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, the amendments proposed by the minister are the result of a post mortem conducted after the 1972 election by the then nearly-defeated Liberal government. That took its toll and a minister was removed from responsibility at that time. I think they realized that the amendments they originally proposed and the hand-outs they thought the public was going to accept so gratefully were working against their interests as a political party. It took them several years to bring in the amendments. All the comments made during the election of 1972 have not stopped since, with constituents reminding members of parliament that something should be done to introduce amendments in the House of Commons to rectify things.

The public did not accept what it was told when the 1971 amendments were introduced, and it has not accepted it since. The public was looking for restraint at that time, and it is looking for it today. Unfortunately, the measures proposed by the minister will not bring about the changes the public wants and which it has pointed to on so many occasions. We have to bear in mind what the public has said and what it will say about these changes that have been introduced.

Unless the minister is prepared to accept some changes, the proposals he has made will not go far enough. They do not deal squarely with the problems. We are faced with the prospect of a $4 billion bill, whether it is paid by the federal government, the employer or the employee. That is a frightening amount. We often wonder what has brought about inflation. I think the public is aware that it is the measures we have introduced in this House. We do not restrain ourselves in many instances. Many of the measures introduced were simply vote-getters for the Liberals in 1972. The public is aware of the cost and it has had its share of socialism.

For years the New Democratic Party has been saying that what this country needs is socialism, but now we realize what socialism has done. It has brought us to our knees and given us the most stringent restrictions on labour and management to the point where they are feuding. We are told to tighten our belts, but the public has been telling us for years to tighten the unemployment insurance belt. It is not that they wish to deprive people who require it, because the public can be fair, but people are aware of what is going on in the community and in many instances know who is drawing unemployment insurance.

[Mr. Matte.]

But what is the point of singling out one individual and cutting him or her off benefits? What the people want is a clean sweep of the entire unemployment insurance scheme. It does not do an employee who has been contributing for years any good to see a fellow worker collecting benefits and living on his back. The person who has been working and contributing thinks he might as well have the money as see it go down the drain. This is an attitude of many people.

It is time we faced reality, Madam Speaker. Canadians should be told how much individuals have been drawing in welfare benefits. It is not unemployment insurance any more; it is unemployment welfare. This is what the government intended by introducing these measures. The minister says that because you draw old age security at age 55 you cannot have another form of welfare. That is an admission that it has become a welfare scheme. The public does not want that; what it expects is an honest proposal. The public agrees to insurance against unemployment, but not to a welfare scheme.

If you drive a car and have a series of accidents, your insurance premiums are raised. If there are repeated fires in your factory, clearly there is something wrong with your management and sometimes you will be refused fire insurance. Why should it be any different with unemployment? The present program encourages people to draw unemployment insurance. Why not reward people who reach age 65 without drawing unemployment insurance. I say that if you have not drawn unemployment insurance, you should be rewarded. That would give one an incentive to work. Or if a man has been unlucky enough to be fired, laid off—even if he quits—the prospect of reward would encourage him to look for work. We could incorporate several weeks of forgiveness so that if a man is without work for a short period it will not be held against him. Certainly, if a man has not drawn money from the scheme he should be rewarded. Let us be consistent. Why should the steady worker's contribution be as large as that proposed?

We should take stock. Certainly, if an individual has constantly drawn on the fund, something is wrong. Perhaps he is in the wrong job. Perhaps his seasonal work leads to seasonal unemployment. Perhaps something is the matter with the individual himself. Perhaps that individual should be encouraged to look for a job in another area and get out of a rut. Sometimes a man knows what will happen year in and year out. That should be changed. The program should provide incentive for a man to look for work. Unfortunately, the present bill does nothing of the kind.

As I have said, we should reward those who work steadily. I am not suggesting any hard and fast rule. Surely the officials of the department can examine this idea. For instance, if someone has contributed steadily for 10, 15 or 20 years and has not drawn on the fund, he should be encouraged not to quit his job. We hear of people who are encouraged to keep their jobs after they are 65. Why should every employee quit at 65? I know what the regulations will say about the age of claimants, but I suggest you can circumvent regulations of that kind.

I say that we should once more make this an insurance scheme. The public would be grateful if the government once more were to make the unemployment insurance scheme a true insurance scheme. People do not like the present welfare scheme. In smaller communities of the kind which I and others in this House represent you could advertise jobs in the local post office. There is no point in going to the local Manpower office for workers. I have tried, and 1½ years after my inquiry help has been offered. Often the employers in small communities are looking for workers, but the local Manpower offices do not know about these workers.

I say it is a waste of time applying at local Manpower offices. Frankly, I do not know why people bother asking the offices for help. Why not put up on a notice board at the local post office the list of those persons drawing unemployment insurance, together with their qualifications? Then an employer who wants a worker can go to the post office and see what kind of help is available. This would be a simple procedure. In rural areas particularly, employers might want to hire workers on a short-time basis. At least those workers would be off the welfare rolls.

Perhaps we could provide a lump sum payment as a reward to those who have not drawn unemployment insurance over the years. I agree that some cannot carry on without resorting to unemployment insurance. Why not set up an unemployment insurance loan fund from which the unemployed could borrow and avoid the stigma of being an unemployment insurance recipient? They could borrow from the fund to tide them over until the next job. There could be a payback scheme. We could use many methods.

The trouble is that the minister and the department will not listen when we say the program should be an insurance scheme and not a welfare scheme. The government says that we cannot manage without unemployment insurance, that we have on our hands a revolution of sorts, that the people are rebellious and to stop complaints we must provide them with huge unemployment insurance payments. Somebody must pay—that is my complaint—and the people doing the paying are not those doing the drawing. I know that many would not complain aloud, even if so inclined. They think: I am helping somebody else. But since the government is asking the public to restrain its wage demands, I say it must cut spending somewhere.

The present bill merely increases a tax. The government is doing this for its own political benefit. It is up to the government to relieve the pressure on the taxpayer, to relieve the pressure on those who work hard and owe everything to the honest sweat of their brow. The government must show leadership. Instead of asking the House of Commons to increase both the employer and employee contributions, the government should consider ways to reduce contributions and save some of this money. Why does it distinguish between employer and employee contributions? Apparently, when government supporters mention employers they automatically think of huge employers who own factories, hide assets and rig books. Apparently, if you are an employer you are rich automatically. The minister appears to single out employers. Why add to their burdens? I cannot understand why the small employer who is willing to hire a few workers should pay a premium 1.4 times greater than that paid by the employee.

Why the discrimination? After all, the employer is doing his share by employing that individual. He had to keep the books. Try to submit a late deduction and you are penalized. This was a political gimmick, nothing more, to make it appear that the government is on the side of labour. Who is the employer? In many instances, a simple businessman who himself is struggling for survival. If he closes down his shop, both he and his employee are without a job. I employ people on a little farm I operate. My worker has Saturday or Sunday off and I have to sit there on a Sunday afternoon while the sun is shining, keeping the books and making sure everything is figured out. If I do not, someone in the department will send me a nice letter threatening me with a penalty. Small businessmen have appealed to me from time to time to get this aspect cleared up if ever an opportunity presented itself.

I suppose there are cases of individuals taking advantage of the scheme. On the other hand, there are plenty of individuals who do not draw benefits to which they are entitled. I have received complaints from people who honestly answered the questions directed to them, but the commission comes along with trick questions designed not to get information but to fix things up so that claims need not be paid. I am all for action being taken in cases where there is an attempt to deceive, but I want the commission to be honest when it comes to the type of questions asked. After all, if a person has been getting $4 an hour and he is asked what he expects to receive, he is going to say $4 an hour; he does not tell the commission he expects to receive $2 an hour. If they asked whether he would be prepared to work for less, the answer might be different. Instead, they say afterwards that the applicant is restricting himself because nobody is prepared to pay $4 an hour in his area.

It is often difficult to get employment in rural areas because there are so few employers. The commission seeks to avoid payment of claims by telling applicants that they are restricting themselves because they want to work in their own areas. But, Madam Speaker, that is where their families are living. I know cases where the commission tried to send applicants from Saskatchewan to look for work in the heart of Ontario, leaving their families with no certainty they would find permanent employment. It was just a way of disentitling the claimant, and this is not what the insurance scheme was set up to do. It was not set up to make things difficult; it was put there to help in time of need.

A great many applicants, especially those who for various reasons lack sufficient education, do not know where these comparatively simple questions are leading. They give the answers which they think are correct, and then, bingo, there is confusion for three or four weeks, after which a demand is made for repayment of benefits. No doubt it occurred to someone that it would look good to check over a few of the claims. I am sure no member wants that kind of complaint to be referred to him. It is true that upon reviewing the situation the commission often agrees to reconsider the decision, but I say we should not find ourselves in such a situation.

First, we should provide an incentive not to use the fund except in cases of real emergency. This might be done through requiring a lower premium in certain circumstances. Or it might be possible to make limited sums available as loans in appropriate cases to bridge temporary unemployment. Then, again, an arrangement might be made for workers to receive a credit from the fund on their retirement in acknowledgment of the fact that they had never become a burden to society. Such a plan might lead to a net benefit since, as things are, there are many who say to themselves, "If I am going to pay for the rest of my life and get nothing, I had better find a way of getting some of the money back before I retire." Such an attitude might well be the result of the amendments in the bill before us concerning workers who reach the age of 65.

I express the hope that the minister will be receptive to these ideas. I have known a lot of politicians in my day and many of them find it difficult to talk about unemployment insurance because, of course, there are voters back home who will be paying attention. Also, there is always another political party ready to accuse them of being against the interests of the workers.

I say to the minister that every worker wants amendments which are sensible and fair. They want the government to show restraint. Above all, they want guidance from the minister. Hopefully, the hon. gentleman can find time to consider the suggestions which have been made to him, and I hope that in committee some of the complaints which have been conveyed to us and expressed in this House will be taken seriously. I trust he will not view any concession he may make as an expression of surrender to another political party. We in this party have put forward our ideas in such a way that their adoption may even be helpful to him politically, and if that is the case, fine.

We want to see the fund back into such a good position that there will no longer be any question of increasing the premiums to be paid either by the employees, the employers or the federal government. Instead, we want the fund and the economy to be placed on such a firm footing that the hon. gentleman is able to say; "We are reducing the premiums because we have got the problem licked."

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Madam Speaker, thus far about the only agreement reached in this debate is that the Unemployment Insurance Act is a mess. Where the difficulty arises is over the question whether it is an insurance scheme or a welfare scheme. This is an important question because the issue of an increase in premiums really hinges upon the answer. Then one must ask oneself another question: Who is responsible for unemployment? Is it the government, or is it society collectively as represented by the government? If it is an insurance scheme, then obviously it is right to raise premiums. If it is a welfare scheme, not only should premiums not be raised but premiums should be abandoned altogether. If unemployment is the responsibility of the government it makes no sense to suggest that premiums should be raised. If unemployment is something that you cannot do anything about, then it is a social problem that must be borne by society in general.

Let me make my own position quite clear, Madam Speaker. It seems to me that the Unemployment Insurance Act has in fact become a welfare scheme. Since unemployment is a social problem, it should be the responsibility of the government. In either case, those responsibilities are not individual responsibilities but social responsibilities and as such should be borne out of some form of general taxation rather than financed by premiums. This is the argument I wish to make.

It seems to me that we are going absolutely in the wrong direction. The government is trying to shuffle off its responsibility in both these areas by putting the load on the individual instead of accepting responsibility both for the rate of unemployment and the fact that unemployment insurance is a cross-subsidization scheme. It is true that when unemployment insurance was first introduced into this country it was a reasonable insurance program, but over the years governments in Canada have moved it from an insurance program to a welfare program. They have brought various people into the scheme. There may have been good reasons for doing this, but nevertheless by bringing in groups like fishermen, seasonal workers and farm labourers, the government has destroyed any credibility that the scheme had for being called an insurance scheme.

An insurance plan depends on unpredictability. That is what insurance is all about, whether it be car insurance or fire insurance. It depends upon not knowing who is going to have an accident or a fire, and under what circumstances. Fishermen have been brought into the scheme, and we know fishermen will be unemployed every year for a certain number of months. We also know that farm labourers of certain kinds will be unemployed. These events are predictable. This is why it is not an insurance scheme but a subsidy program.

As I say, if it is a subsidy or welfare program—and a good argument can probably be made for having a subsidy or welfare program in this area—then it should be accepted as a total social responsibility instead of calling it an insurance scheme. Whatever credibility the plan may have had initially for being called an insurance program has been destroyed by government after government. I think we must recognize the scheme for what it is.

There is nothing wrong with calling it a welfare program, but if it is a welfare program let us treat it as such and not perpetuate the fraud of calling it an insurance scheme, asking people to pay a premium and telling them that the premium is somehow related to the risk involved. It is a cross-subsidization program, which means that one province is subsidizing another province, that one industry is subsidizing another industry, that one group of workers is subsidizing another group of workers. In the social context there is nothing wrong with that; this is done through redistribution programs of various kinds. But that is not insurance and it does not call for premium payments but for the application of a general taxation policy.

Since government either cannot or will not do anything about unemployment, it must assume responsibility for funding this scheme instead of throwing this burden on the shoulders of the individual. In proposing amendments to increase premiums, the government is saying, "We cannot do anything very much about unemployment but we are going to make you pay for it. We are going to make you pay for the failure of government policy and planning. We will take ourselves off the hook and make you pay for it". That is grossly unfair. No government is entitled to absolve itself from that kind of responsibility at the expense of the individual workers of this country.

Everyone rattles the Unemployment Insurance Act, yet everyone is guilty of abusing it. I do not think you could point the finger at any one group of our society or at any one province; everyone is guilty. I have listened with considerable interest to my hon. friends in the Conservative party denouncing the Unemployment Insurance Act. Yet whenever I ask them what they would do, I do not hear very many constructive proposals. They do not tell me which groups they would remove from the plan. In criticizing the Unemployment Insurance Act, denouncing its inequities and telling horror stories about the act, in saying that the act is not generous enough to certain groups, not one member has made a speech critical of the Unemployment Insurance Act without saying, "I know all kinds of cases of individual injustice". But hon. members cannot talk out of both sides of their mouths. They almost won the 1972 election by their attacks on the Unemployment Insurance Act, yet at no time did I hear any constructive proposals for improving the act.

The truth of the matter is that very few of us can be totally critical of the Unemployment Insurance Act for fear of offending our constituents. Of all the political parties in this House, the Conservatives have the most fear of offending their constituents because so many of them are living off unemployment insurance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: I am being a little rough, Madam Speaker, but I am being rough intentionally. I get fed up with the cant on this whole subject. Everyone is for motherhood, truth and justice until it comes to doing something to improve matters. They say $4 billion is too much to spend. But which groups would they eliminate from the plan? Would they eliminate farm labourers, fishermen, loggers, or maternity benefits? Where would they make cuts? I have yet to hear their program on that.

It reminds me of the sort of arguments made during the election campaign about cutting government expenditure. The only cut that they suggested really was Information Canada. When they were asked what government expenditure they would cut, whether they would get rid of old age pensions, or family allowances, they would not answer. The same can be said of all these critics of the Unemployment Insurance Act. When you ask these people what benefits they would remove, they do not reply. They do not reply because they are afraid of their own constituents. They are afraid of offending them. They try to please both sides—those who do not like the plan and those who live off it. That is the great dilemma we are facing. We have created a Frankenstein for ourselves. We cannot live with it yet we cannot live without it.

The present system of premiums should be abolished and replaced by a general tax, perhaps not by an income tax because that is high enough already, but some kind of payroll tax. This would make more sense than employer and employee paying individual premiums. For example, we might use a system similar to workmen's compensation. In that event, if we wanted an insurance scheme we could risk-relate it to the industry involved. Every industry has a pattern. The way in which workmen's compensation is risk-related has had a marked effect on the attitude of industry toward safety. When their premium goes up they do something about safety in their plant. Not as much as they should, but there is some improvement. It seems to me we should do the same thing with unemployment insurance.

Many industries in this country could not survive without the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The biggest abusers, while having the loudest mouths, are the inefficient industries of this country that live off the Unemployment Insurance Act and do more to abuse the act than any individual in our society. For example, the fruit growers have criticized the act and said how much they suffer under it, how terrible it is for them. I came back to Ottawa on a plane one day with a gentleman from the Okanagan Valley who ran a fruit farm. He was very critical of the Unemployment Insurance Act and then went on to tell me how he hired married women for eight weeks and promised them at least eight weeks' work so they could qualify for unemployment insurance and he could pay them the minimum wage. He could not run his farm without the Unemployment Insurance Act. He depends on unemployment insurance in order to get his labourers, and he is not the only one; there are all kinds of industries like that in our society.

This system is very convenient for them. They take on labourers like a commodity and they let them go like a commodity, at which time the labourers go back on unemployment insurance and society pays for it. If they did not have this scheme to fall back on, these people might be a little more responsible in the way they treat their employees. They would have to be a little more efficient in the way they run their industries; they could not run them from the seat of their pants, hiring and firing at will.

Let me give an interesting illustration of that in respect of the automobile industry. There was a time when that industry had extensive lay-offs in good years and in bad years. They always said that the models changed, so that everyone had to be laid off for six weeks or two months. This was the case until the unions said that if the industry continued to lay them off in this way, they would have to pay the employees during those lay-offs. They brought in an agreement under which, if the employees were laid off, the companies had to pay them.

The automobile industry suddenly found that the work was not as seasonal as they once thought it to be. They began to keep everyone on all year long. They evened out their level of production, instead of hiring thousands of employees and working the hell out of them for part of the time and laying them off for two months. They levelled out the work in the industry. This has been the case, generally speaking, for the last five or six years since the unions negotiated that kind of agreement. There has been steady employment, as there should be, in the automobile industry since then. But at one time they dragged in thousands of people when they were required and laid them off when they were not, giving the industry this yo-yo effect.

Unemployment insurance permits this kind of thing to take place. It is important to note that in this kind of society which is disorganized and free-wheeling, a backward society, we have no alternative to unemployment insurance; we could not exist without unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance is required by this Liberal government which cannot manage its affairs, cannot provide full employment and has no plan for the economy. The government uses this means of preventing a revolution taking place. If the government did not have that kind of support, the people would not be able to live in this kind of society.

People have many needs, whether they be housing, transportation or other things which are required. There are many needs in the world today. How can there be unemployment with this system that treats labour as a commodity? This liberal society does not have an answer, so the government brings in unemployment insurance. It is much like LIP, which is a sort of middle-class welfare scheme. This government cannot solve the problems, so it pays the people off. Unfortunately, it is not the government that foots the bill for this type of welfare scheme. The individuals who pay are those who are industrious and work. Those are the individuals who pay for this scheme. Those are the individuals this government wants to pay even more.

In some ways, unemployment insurance would not bother me. It would not be of great concern to me whether unemployment insurance were an insurance scheme or a welfare plan, if in fact it helped the poor. If the people needed help so badly, I would not quarrel about how they got that help. The problem with this unemployment insurance scheme is that, generally speaking, the money does not go to the poor. All of us know from experience in our ridings that the poor are the first ones to be knocked off benefits. They are not clever enough, in most cases, to know how to work the Unemployment Insurance Act. The ones who know how to and do work the Unemployment Insurance Act are the middle-class people.

There was an interesting story that appeared in the Globe and Mail on April 4 this year, from which I should like to quote. It appeared at page 7 and reads as follows:

> In the 1973 figures, $686,000 in unemployment insurance went to Canadians with declared incomes of $25,000 a year and above; $20,000 of that going to persons with incomes in excess of $50,000 a year.

This is the fine scheme we have in this country! Of course, if you ask anyone about this they are likely to tell you the scheme should not differentiate in this way. That is how badly this whole thing is screwed up. We all know that the people who benefit most from unemployment insurance are seasonal workers who make more in a short season than many people who work all year long. West coast fishermen work four months a year and earn an average of $20,000. They then collect unemployment insurance for the rest of the time. What they do with that time, I do not know. Fishing in this country, with few exceptions, is not an occupation but a hobby. We are paying those people for engaging in that hobby.

I could give other examples of that where people around the country are engaged in fun activities. I once had a fellow from Newfoundland in my riding. He worked at a job but got into a few little brawls in the shop. If he did not like the foreman, he felt that he should punch him on the nose. After all, he is a bad guy and one should hit him. There are many people who are not very understanding about these things, and he lost his job.

An hon. Member: Like the guy who gets it on the nose.

Mr. Saltsman: That fellow lost his job and found it very difficult to understand. He had said some terrible things and hit the foreman, but had then forgiven him. He could not understand what the trouble was and why he should have lost his job. He looked for another job but found it very difficult to find one. After some difficulty, I thought we had him all calmed down and he found another job. I heard afterwards that he was doing very well and was to be made a foreman. This kid was only 22 years of age and had it made.

I thought we had accomplished something, and I suppose society would think he had been ground down into the dust and would conform. Then one day when I was on the train coming back to Ottawa I met this young lad and asked him where he was going. He said he was going home. I said, "Are you going home to visit your parents?" He said, "No; I am going home to stay. I have quit the job". I said, "I thought you were doing very well". He said, "Mr. Saltsman, that is not the way to live, getting up every morning at six o'clock, going to work, punching the time-clock. When the fishing season is here, they want you to work; when the hunting season is here, they want you to go to work."

He said, "They want you to work all year round. I am going home to do some fishing. When the fishing is not good, I will go on unemployment insurance. That's the way to live, Mr. Saltsman". You know, I think he is right. If your have a choice between living as a free soul or being chained to a machine, you should live as a free soul. Not everyone has that choice.

That is an exaggeration in order to make a point. However, the truth of the matter is that the people who pay for everything in this society are those who get up at six o'clock in the morning, whether it is raining, cold or hot, and go to work day after day, week after week, month after month. They do not have the opportunity to opt out. They usually are not unemployed and are not looking around for meaningful work. They do not say they want to stretch their horizons, but they pay for everything. They pay for unemployment insurance and they pay the taxes in this country—and they have no way out. This is the man the government is now saying must pay even more than he has paid, because the government cannot handle the problems of this society. The government is not assuming what should be its responsibility as the government and, therefore, these people have to pay more taxes. It is very difficult—

Mr. Korchinski: I am glad you agree with me.

Mr. Saltsman: Occasionally when I am talking, I get the feeling that I may be wrong. This just confirms it. There is great difficulty in discussing unemployment insurance because so little is known about the workings of the act and about who benefits and who pays. As I am saying this, I look across at the minister and see that he is there with a knowing smile on his face as if he knows. If he does know, he is not telling us. I sometimes suspect that the government does know all about cross-subsidization. I suspect it knows who is bearing the cost of unemployment insurance and who is getting the benefits. This suits the purposes of the government and it suits its purpose not to discuss it or talk about it because too many horror stories may come out.

My quarrel is not about unemployment insurance, which I think is a very necessary and important program in the society in which we live; my quarrel arises because this program has been so distorted and twisted that it is now an open invitation to cheat. I know of very few cases where individuals have really defrauded the Unemployment Insurance Act in the sense that they have done something dishonest or something they were not allowed to do under the act.

What happens is that frequently people spend a great deal of time examining the loopholes in the act and figuring out ways to circumvent having to work and still be paid, rather than search for work. That is a serious problem in our society. It is not so bad in our society that we think chaos will ensue tomorrow. That is not so; there is still a strong work ethic in society. What happens, however, is that the man who works hard, who feels he has a responsibility to work, and who rather than accept benefits really tries hard, becomes very downhearted. It is not only that those who take advantage do so, but many of them make a point of going back to the job and telling him he is a fool to work. They usually exaggerate the situation. Then the steady workers feel like fools for working and sometimes ask themselves why they should continue to work. That is a serious problem for society.

Although unemployment insurance is costing our society $4 billion, it seems to me it is a good thing that money is being spent, whether or not it is being spent fairly. I hate to think of the state our society would be in now if that purchasing power were not being pumped back into society.

While I do not like the operation of the act, I will not quarrel with it at this time for the reasons I have given. We will not always be in a state of unemployment. We will have to get out of it some time. It is important to devise an act that appears to be fair to the people who must pay for the benefits. We must do that because society is held together when people are willing to work and share some of the rewards of that work with others. If they are not willing to share, then it does not matter whether we are talking about a capitalist society or a socialist society, because any society is based on the willingness of people to work and if that willingness is denied we are in serious trouble.

I suggest that the Unemployment Insurance Act does exactly that and is badly in need of change and correction. In some ways the act should be liberalized. I do not see any reason for there being a qualifying period of eight weeks or 20 weeks. If a person is willing to work, and if the job is not too restrictive, he should be entitled to collect unemployment insurance if society does not provide a job for him. There is no justification at all for the eight-week qualifying period. Most of these eight-week periods are phony, in any event. They are manufactured. I think of pregnancy and sickness claims, although I do not know how one could call pregnancy a sickness or an accident. I suppose in some cases it could be an accident. Generally speaking, it should not be either. What is the justification for saying a woman who puts in a 20-hour week in a shop, which may be the only 20-hour week she has put in in her life working in a shop, is entitled to a pay-out, while another woman who remains at home with a sick child is not entitled to anything?

If we come to the conclusion that this kind of payment should be made, surely every woman with a child is entitled to it, rather than just someone who can manoeuvre the Unemployment Insurance Act. There is no justification for this. At some point the minister will have to make up his mind concerning what he really wants. One day, depending on how the wind blows, he states that he will close all the loopholes in the act, and another day he makes statements such as the one I am about to quote. I refer to a statement he made before the Senate Committee on National Finance, on June 18, 1975. He said:

> I must reaffirm that workers will not be forced to accept jobs that they do not want.

I presume he would also say, "or stay on jobs they do not want". Yet he will take the three-week disqualification period and change it to six weeks. What sense does that make? If the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act is to give people a greater opportunity to prove that they want to work, then obviously it makes no sense to increase or decrease the qualification period. That is not where the problem lies. Someone who wishes to quit a job does not go to the foreman and hit him. He finds a better way of getting fired.

Most employers are very guilty in the sense that they will seldom put down the real reason for a person leaving employment, because they want that person back. Very often these lay-offs take place in collusion with the employer. Most people who leave jobs would not be collecting unemployment insurance at all if the employer did not collude with them. Yet the employer is not investigated to the same extent as the employee.

I feel strongly about this bill in the sense that, despite everything the minister has said and despite all the trumpeting about the great changes taking place, we will not see the unemployment insurance pay-off come down a cent, despite these extra disqualification periods, because this is not where the problem really is: the problem is with the entire philosophy and approach to the act. This government is not prepared to bring in changes to manage the economy in the way in which it should be managed.

So long as that situation exists, we will always have abuses in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act, because businessmen who harp about the abuses in respect of the Act will always look to themselves before looking to anyone else—they are the great abusers of the act, and those who support this system make such an unemployment insurance act necessary.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe the House is anxious to get to a vote on the second reading of this bill this afternoon. Therefore, I shall make my remarks at this point briefer than otherwise would have been the case. I want to make as clear as I can and in the simplest way possible that we will vote against this bill because it imposes additional burdens on the little people in this country. It is just as simple as that.

The minister and his colleagues can point to some improvements in Bill C-69 over the Unemployment Insurance Act as it now stands, but the effect of its major proposals is to place more of the burden of unemployment insurance on the little people and to add to the abuses which the little and ordinary people will suffer.

I want to say we in this party are glad we have unemployment insurance as part of our social structure. We are glad the trade union movement in the early years of this century campaigned for an unemployment insurance program such as already existed in other industrial and democratic countries. I will even say I welcome the fact that in 1919 the Liberal party at its great convention of that year pledged itself to bring in unemployment insurance along with old age pensions and health insurance.

I was proud of the fact that in 1925 and 1926 my predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth, in a minority parliament used his strength to put pressure on the government of that day in this field. In the main he tried to get both unemployment insurance and old age pensions. He got old age pensions from Mr. King, but so far as unemployment insurance was concerned, he only got a promise that that would come in later. Well, it finally came before parliament in 1940 and into effect in 1941.

I join the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) in saying that our economy today, apart from the fact that there would be great suffering on the part of individuals, would be in a great deal worse condition than it is if it were not for unemployment insurance. Therefore, we are supporters of the whole idea of unemployment insurance and we want to see it continued as part of our economic and social structure. But we want it to be a scheme that is fair. We want the burden of unemployment, which is a social responsibility, to be borne by society as a whole, not just by those who suffer most from unemployment or the fear of unemployment. We want the cost to be distributed on a basis that is fair. That is not the case at the present time and, what is even worse, this bill will take us still further in the direction of unfairness.

Let me list four or five ways in which, in our view, the bill does what I have said it does, that is, puts heavier burdens on the little people, and for these reasons we shall vote no on the motion for second reading. First, may I refer to the fact that the bill does nothing to resolve the abuses that are perpetrated on claimants. There has been a good deal of talk in this debate about abuse, although most of it has been the other way, but from all sides of the House there have been examples of abuse that individuals suffer, mainly because of the activities of benefit control officers, mainly because of the fact that there is no satisfactory definition of suitable employment. The provision cutting off thousands of claimants from benefits altogether or of cutting them back substantially because they are restricting their availability is not in keeping with the purpose and the principles of unemployment insurance. That is something that is not in this amending bill and it is one of the reasons we are opposed to it.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Another way in which this bill is hard on little people, and this has been put forward by my colleagues and by members in other parties, is the decision to reduce from 75 per cent to 66⅔ per cent the amount of benefit available to those who are in special need and who have dependants. No matter what kind of case the minister might try to make for treating all alike, he cannot get around the fact that that is increasing the burden that is placed on little people, and that is what is wrong with this measure.

Another thing that is wrong with it is the proposal to double the period of disqualification to which certain claimants can be subjected from a maximum of three weeks to a maximum of six weeks on top of the waiting period. This will simply add to the economic difficulties, the deprivation and suffering of many of our people. Who are the people who will suffer because of this? It may include some of the people who have been talked about here who abuse the system, but the tragedy is that it will include a great many honest people who have rights under this act but will have those rights curtailed by this provision.

Then there is the provision about the level at which the government picks up the cost. This, of course, is a matter that has been referred to by many hon. members because it is one of the main provisions of the bill. At the present time, as everyone knows, the premiums going into unemployment insurance are expected to pay the total cost of its benefits so long as unemployment does not exceed 4 per cent. Above that point, the government is supposed to pick up the tab, which in fact it does.

This means that at present the cost of unemployment insurance is borne partly on the basis of a regressive form of taxation on all people at a firm percentage, despite the fact that they are the little people, but part of it, the cost of unemployment over 4 per cent, comes out of general revenue which, to a more reasonable extent, is achieved through the practice of the principle of the ability to pay. But the new proposal is that that threshold is to be raised so that it will be a sliding average of the actual unemployment in the country over the immediately preceding eight-year period. This means that in the years that lie ahead, the threshold at which the government will come in will get closer and closer to the actual level of unemployment in that year. In other words, the cost of unemployment insurance is being put more and more on the shoulders of those who are actually working, those in low-income and middle-income brackets.

This is a departure still further from the principle of paying for social benefits according to ability to pay. The government does this in so many ways. We have it in our income tax structure, we have it in Bill C-73, we have it across the board. It is a constant battle to try to get our society to recognize the principle of the ability to pay, and we are sorry to see this minister go in the other direction in this piece of legislation.

The other item I wish to mention again—one that has been mentioned several times, but I am simply putting them all together in one package—is an illustration of the additional burden being put on the little people in the decision to cut people off from either contributing to or drawing from unemployment insurance after the age of 65. I regard as most specious the argument that we have heard from the minister—a good many Liberals have trotted it out as well—that the rationale for this is that the government is now doing very well for our older people. We have had the list of things that are available, such as old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, and so on.

Whenever we talk about the fact that there are no opportunities in these programs to enable people to keep up with the rising cost and rising standard of living, when we insist on substantial increases in these pensions, we are told from the other side that all these benefits are indexed, that they are escalated either quarterly or annually. That is a snare and a delusion if I have ever heard one. Ordinarily, in society the workers in trade union groups who are seeking collective agreements and those who are unorganized do not seek just a COLA arrangement, just an increase equal to the rise in the cost of living. They seek, and rightly so, a greater share of the gross national product and of the standard of living that their labour makes possible. To say to our people who are over 65 that they must be satisfied with just the same basket of goods and services that they were able to buy at the age of 65 is putting them in a category that is inferior to other people in our society.

The cost of living increases are always behind anyway, but even if they were kept up to date it is putting these people in an inferior position, and to say to them that this additional opportunity to draw unemployment insurance, if they are still working after 65 and meet the conditions of the act, is cut off is I say, grossly unfair. My feeling about the whole matter is that these arguments that are being put forward are not the real arguments. What the government has looked at is the figures and it sees that here is a chance to save more than $100 million a year by cutting off people between the ages of 65 and 70.

In other words, the same thing I have complained about with respect to the other points I mentioned applies here. The government sees itself in trouble about unemployment insurance. It has been under some pressure from its own people, heavily from the Conservatives and to some extent from the public. It sees this program only in terms of trying to save dollars, so it is going to save dollars by doubling the period of disqualification, by lowering to 66 ⅔ per cent the benefits to persons with dependants, by making workers pay more by going up from 4 per cent to the actual rate of unemployment before it pays the cost out of general revenue, and then, if that is not enough, by making old people between 65 and 70 literally kick in over $100 million a year by being denied their benefits under this legislation.

That is what we dislike about this legislation. We are concerned. As I said in the bit of history I indulged in a few moments ago, we have been interested in unemployment insurance for a long, long time and we regard it as an important part of our economic and social structure. We do not like seeing it abused by the kinds of things which are being done to it in this amending bill which is now before the House.

The effort to save money by taking it out of the pockets of old people or by taking it out of the pockets of dependants by cutting down what workers with dependants will get is, of course, all based on the notion that somehow the government is being efficient and doing the right thing if it just saves money. To hear some of the speeches in this House one would think that for governments to spend money is a sin. I suggest that if it were not for the collecting and spending of money in the provision of services, pensions and health care, and contributions to housing and unemployment insurance, we would not have a society. There can be no civilization unless we find ways of redistributing the wealth we are able to create so that our people share in the benefits of that society.

That is what a program like unemployment insurance is all about. It needs to be policed; it needs to be administered efficiently and carefully. Above all, it needs to be administered on the basis of fairness. But I resent the way in which the minister and his colleagues seem to have felt that they had to respond to this "save money" syndrome which we get mainly from those on my right. What is important is that the money which is collected and spent in our society results in meeting the needs of our people. That is not done by debasing the unemployment insurance scheme or by making the little people suffer, as is the case under Bill C-69. That is why when the vote on second reading is called, we shall be voting no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): I should like to point out to hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it will come as no surprise when I express some relief at having reached this stage in the debate after six days of speeches and 55 speakers to this point. Sitting here listening with the most complete attention I could give, subject to natural demands on oneself from other sources, has really been like watching the swinging of a pendulum back and forth, back and forth.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On your side, too.

Mr. Andras: Yes, I will do a more circular motion on that one. As noted by the honorable member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that is quite true. We have heard a parade of suggestion that this is a most colossal boondoggle, a fraud, it is permissive and unnecessary; but in the same speeches, as noted by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), I did not hear one hon. member—usually from the Conservative side—complete his speech without really swinging that pendulum right back again and saying that we should tighten up, cut something out, do this and do that, but that we should not touch this or that, and that incidentally there are some cases reprehensibly handled, and so on.

Before we put the question this afternoon and, hopefully, proceed from here to committee with this bill, I will not attempt to deal with all the points raised but I do wish to say very sincerely that almost every individual case has been noted. In many instances it was not a thousand cases but the same one cited a thousand times. The UIC ski team was three years ago and was an embarrassingly amusing story to me because I was not the minister at the time. That story was probably done to death in the 1972 election campaign, but it seems to be popular with some hon. members still. It rather suggests that there have been some improvements and changes if we have to reach back for that kind of anecdote.

As I have said, I will not attempt to refer to every speaker. I appreciate every contribution which has been made, in a general sense, and some of them in a very specific sense. I must deal for a moment with the opening speech made by the opposition critic, the hon. member for Halmilton West (Mr. Alexander). He put on quite a performance, which covered seven pages of Hansard, unfettered by fact and certainly uninhibited by very much substance. As is the joy of this House, he and I are becoming great personal friends, but as I have said to him many times, I must say publicly that even for a man as tall as he is it can be very painful to come down heavily on both sides of the fence. I hope he protects his anatomy if he continues to take that position.

He paraded the past to us. He rubbed our noses in some of the forecasting problems we had back in the days of 1968, 1969 and 1970. It would have been rather decent of him to go on and indicate that since those times our forecasts, or our estimates of expenditures and the like, before committee have been very accurate. But he did not do that. Then he went on to lay before the House certain facts and figures à la Hamilton West, from the research team of the Conservative Party. I cannot help but think of the old story about the big bad wolf. Our friend huffed and puffed and blew his own house down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: I wish to lay before the House, not in any sense of winning debating points but so that we can clear some of the underbrush of error which the hon. member for Hamilton West made—and many of the Conservative party members fell into the trap of taking his figures or suggested figures as gospel—so that we can then join together from here on, and through committee, at least on some basis of fact. In his opening comments, the hon. member for Hamilton West said that I did not tell the House in my speech that this program would cost $4 billion this year. I did not tell that to the House because it will not cost $4 billion. He knows very well that it will not cost $4 billion this year because he was at the committee when we laid before it the outside estimate, including administrative costs, of about $3.7 billion.

I hope the Conservatives will not become raucous about that and fall into the additional trap of saying, "What's $300 million?" They used to enjoy that kind of comment years ago but I think they will avoid it now. I am afraid it was a knowing error because about four pages later he went on to put the correct figure of $3.75 billion on the record. I do not know why that accident happened. He said I indicated that the premium increase would be 35 per cent. There is no record anywhere of any comment, formal or informal, public or private, where I have said any such thing.

He quoted some noted journalists-cum-economists who said that the premium increase would be from $800 million to $1 billion in 1976. I will lay my reputation on it that it will be in the neighbourhood of $490 million. I suppose someone will say, "What's $300 million?" or "What's half a billion?" Curiously, all the errors are on the side of his argument; never the other way. He said that the length of the benefit period for recipients increased some 51 per cent between April, 1974, and April, 1975. I can tell him that that is very inaccurate. The fact of the matter is that even in face of the higher unemployment we are experiencing today, during 1974 the average claimant received benefits for something like 17 weeks. That has come down to 16 weeks—and it is not an increase of 51 per cent, it is a reduction.

He indicated gleefully that the United States expenditure in 1973 was only $4 billion and that we would be spending, he went back up again to $4 billion as an illustration for 1976 in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I question whether any member of this House would have tolerated the United States unemployment insurance plan as it has existed until now. I do not think Canadians would have tolerated it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Certainly, I would not be very happy to see that continue. Let us get it on the record that as incomplete protection as the United States unemployment insurance plan provides in that country, their expenditures this year are going to be $20 billion. I just wanted to clear up some of these errors so that we can begin to deal with the matter properly. The hon. member also said that I had claimed that the act was riddled with disincentives. I never said any such thing, and I refute that.

I cannot touch on every speech, but I enjoyed the speech of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). He regaled us with a story about robins and horse manure. I think he confirmed what we all know, his expertise on the subject of horse manure. In that sense he was a little more down to earth, perhaps, than the preceding speaker.

Mr. Gilbert: Would you say he was a flop?

Mr. Andras: Until the day we reach the Valhalla that the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge and some others have described, and resolve the rationalization of all income support systems and social security systems in this country, until we devise a system of moving on to a pension plan and integrating all these things, I tell you as a minister who has had lots of scars on his back over the last three years, also having had the opportunity to meet with people in Britain, Germany, France, the United States and Sweden, that we have one of the best unemployment insurance plans in the world. It has provided direct cash in almost every instance. It has given very much needed income to people who through no fault of their own suffered an interruption in their earnings at a rate in excess of 2 million people a year since the changes in 1971.

I have heard accusations and criticisms to the effect that I referred to one of the beneficial effects of our plan by saying that it does have a redistributive effect. I make no apology for having said that. If you think it out, it is ridiculous to expect, if it is any good at all, that it would have any other effect. A person who has lost his or her job and therefore their income is, in the main, on the way to becoming very poor. If, through whatever method, you place income in his or her hands, then of course you are redistributing income. What is wrong with that? I think it is unthought-out rhetoric to make accusations that that is a logical or acceptable criticism of the plan that we enjoy in this country.

I would not be a party to emasculation of the unemployment insurance plan as we now have it, at least until that great day comes when we find a much more comprehensive, all-embracing program about which some suggestions have been made in the debate thus far. They are so embryonic, however, that we have a lot of work to do, perhaps together, to perfect the ideas over the years.

I think it is a great plan, but I think the pendulum has perhaps swung a little too far. I cannot stand before you and say it is perfect; there are problems. It is a costly allocation of resources, and even in this still very fortunate country there is not a bottomless pit of money. We have to decide whether this investment in people, as compared to that one, is producing the better or the worse result. There are rigidities in this act that have to be removed. We are trying to do that. I have indicated to the House that I hope to bring forward further improvements and amendments because it is a very significant plan in our society, our economy, and in the allocation of resources required to support it.

I am afraid there are some disincentives in the act and I think they should be attended to. In some of the amendments before the House today we are attempting to deal with these matters. I think we should be extremely careful, though, about using words like "cheater" or "abuse". I am not just playing semantic games. I spent many hours searching my soul about this so that we could understand each other and what really takes place. The person who voluntarily quits with or without cause—and we are addressing ourselves quite heavily to him in this bill—is not in any legal sense violating the terms of the act. He is making a personal choice which is his right. Having made it, however, that does not automatically entitle him to assume an income paid for by other people.

In regard to disentitlements, people often ask what the percentage is of cheaters or people who misuse the plan. I prefer the term "misuse" because in the main it is applicable to most of the failures to meet the obligations under the act. I think most of it is misuse and a lot of it is misunderstanding because it is a far too complex legal document. It is very difficult to get the basis for assessment of that percentage. A disentitlement could be for one day—it could be for one hour. Well, that is a little tough. The computer would blow a gasket figuring out the deductions in that case. But it can be one day, one week, one month. Disqualifications are precise—they are for a period of time and are usually for reasons that you all know—anyone who voluntarily quits without cause, refusal of suitable work and so on. Indeed the same claimant can be disqualified in the first place and then disentitled later but I defy anyone to tell me precisely what the percentage is.

Having said all that, the incidence of misuse of the plan and even in some cases abuse of the plan, is too high for my liking. We want to protect the integrity of the program in the eyes of the public of Canada who, after all, is paying for it. I say this because even at present levels of unemployment most Canadians who are capable of working, thank goodness, are enjoying a job. We are, in all conscience, maintaining a vigilant attitude and constantly reviewing that aspect as vigorously as we continue to review our ability to provide services to claimants who need them.

Let me talk more specifically about some of the amendments and controversial provisions contained in Bill C-69. The question arises, how is the program to be paid for? In all probability we are heading for expenditures of about $3.4 billion this year because, thank goodness, unemployment in the last quarter is not climbing. Unquestionably, that is a large amount of money, a large amount of federal government and therefore public expenditure, and a sizable percentage of the gross national product.

The facts are as many hon. members have said, and I do not deny them. In the main, the reason for that figure is that unemployment is at present levels. That is the main reason for the increase in cost. Another reason is that built into the plan is the escalator of the average wage, which determines insurable earnings and, therefore, maximum benefits. The maximum insurable earnings will be $200 per week in 1976, up from the present $185 per week. So there are many built-in cost escalations; in many ways I say thank goodness. But this poses a question which really needs simple arithmetic for its solution.

If you are paying out more money, you have to take in more money. We had to raise more money to fund this plan for 1976 and, perhaps, the future. So it became a question—and I heard some most interesting comments on it—of whether this should be paid completely out of general taxes or whether the program should be maintained by tripartite payments. We chose the route of continuing with the premiums of the employee and employer, with the government sharing the cost. We altered the threshold to allow us to assess more realistically the unemployment situation of the last eight years. The threshold figure for 1976 is to be 5.6 per cent which is based on the eight-year moving average ending last June.

Much has been made of this being a regressive tax, Mr. Speaker, of this being another horrible burden brutally perpetrated on the working people of this country by the Liberal government. Let us get this in perspective. The premium will be paid by nine million employees, by working people whose incomes range from the very modest to the maximum insurable earnings of $200 per week in 1976, and by employers who will pay 1.4 times the employee premium. That means that 58 per cent of the additional $490 million to which I referred, that being the premium revenue increase for 1976, or $280-odd million, will be borne by employers, not employees.

Let me explain to hon. members exactly what this means. The present unemployment insurance premium, at $1.40 per $100 a week income based on a 40-hour week, cost the employee 3.5 cents an hour. Under the new threshold, the increase for that employee, once this bill receives passage, in 1976 will be 25 cents per week on $100 of earnings. For that same employee the additional cost will be six-tenths of one cent per hour. That is the increase in premium we are talking about. It will be 25 cents a week, or $13 a year. The employer of that same employee who is earning $100 per week in a 40-hour week will pay an increased premium of nine-tenths of one cent per hour for that employee.

Let us consider how this will affect the employee earning the maximum insurable earnings of $200 per week which, as I have just indicated, will be the figure for 1976. The $200 per week, 40-hour week employee will see an increase of a little over one cent per hour in the premium he must pay, and his employer will see an increase of 1.7 cents per hour in the premium that he must pay. So although the principle may be arguable, let us not exaggerate that this is deliberately loading an unconscionable burden on the backs of employees and employers.

For years in this country we have funded unemployment insurance on a tripartite basis, whereby the cost was shared by the three main participants, the employer, employee and the government. Before 1971, the portions of the burden were 41.5 per cent each for the employee and the employer and only 17 per cent for the government, with the government paying the cost of administration. Had we continued at the 4 per cent threshold level, at an unemployment rate similar to that which we experienced in 1975, the shares borne by the government, employer and employee would be, in 1976, 53 per cent for the government, 27 per cent for employer and 20 per cent for employee. The threshold changed, but this does not take the government off the hook financially. It merely restores the balance and, at the new eight-year moving average threshold, the respective shares of the burden would be 38 per cent, 36 per cent and 26 per cent.

Insurable earnings, as I indicated earlier, are indexed to the average industrial wage as collated from T-4 slips. They rise with the increase in earnings, and they also are affected by a moving average. So, Mr. Speaker, I really cannot buy the idea that the government is to be relieved of any concern and that the bureaucrats will say, "To hell with unemployment; we don't have to worry about it any more." How realistic is the suggestion that the government will not remain totally conscious of the burden of unemployment and will not do its best to fight it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Concern has been expressed about the increased disincentives which we are proposing to apply to those who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause, who are fired for misconduct or who refuse suitable work. I am concerned about an anomaly, a paradox to do with the present unemployment situation. Despite present levels of unemployment, leaving aside the numbers of existing job openings, there is a continued increase in the numbers of people who leave their jobs without just cause. That number exceeds 250,000 a year. When you consider that number as a percentage of the total claim load—which is a sensible relationship—you will see that it is in excess of 10 per cent. Somebody said that it is only 2 per cent of the work force. Mr. Speaker, 41 per cent of Canadian workers change jobs every year. We are not talking about the right to change jobs. I am talking in terms of 250,000, plus, people who have attracted disqualifications under the Unemployment Insurance Act, and in those cases no appeals were rescinded.

Mr. Rodriguez: Give us a breakdown of that figure.

Mr. Andras: I will give the hon. member a breakdown in committee. I want to put these figures on the table. I am not being provocative; I want to get these figures on the table and I am sure hon. members will want to look at them, too.

● (1730)

On the question of jurisprudence, I worry too, from time to time, as to how well our appeal system is working. The jurisprudence has been established for 30 years, though, and if there is valid criticism of this kind of change it should more properly be addressed to an examination of the appeal system itself. I have asked the Unemployment Advisory Committee to conduct a review of the appeal system over the summer months. It really has not been touched for 30 years. It is the subject of an examination, also, by the Law Reform Commission and I hope that before too long we shall either validate it or make necessary corrections. I think we shall find that there is a little rust in it; it needs to be brought up to date; it needs a better balance, particularly for the unorganized worker who faces a negative decision.

I turn now to the position of those over 65. This is the most difficult problem I had to wrestle with and place before members. I want to begin by asking hon. members by what stretch of the imagination can one visualize that this change is suggesting that people aged 65 and over be barred from work? There is nothing whatsoever in this change in entitlement which will affect a person's right to work, or access to work. It simply means that unemployment insurance, in my opinion and in the opinion of many others, is not a program designed to provide even a short-term pension plan. I admire the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for his unrelenting effort to assist senior citizens. I question the route he takes very often, because I think it would lead to very severe distortions, crippling one plan by requiring resources which should more properly be allocated to another.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You may disagree, but you always come around sooner or later.

Mr. Andras: Let me put my problem squarely before hon. members, Mr. Speaker. The 1971 act established that at the age of 70 there would be no payment of premiums and no more entitlement to unemployment insurance. I have indicated that there have been changes to other, and I think more appropriate programs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his time has expired. The special order allowed 30 minutes to each speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Give him five more minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): The minister could carry on with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Andras: Another control factor was accessibility to the Canada Pension Plan and, of course, there was a three weeks return of benefits available. They had the choice of taking three weeks' benefits or the Canada Pension Plan. Obviously, they decided not to go that silly route under the act because it wasn't very profitable for them. But here is one of the major errors in the research by the Conservative party. They said, "There's no dough in it, anyway; it affects only 5,000 people." But the question is not that simple. We are dealing here with $120 million a year.

There is a matter here which I am bound to take into consideration. It is this. We have extrapolated from the labour force survey the people aged 65 and over who tell the survey that they are unemployed. We have compared that figure with the number of unemployment insurance claimants at any given time, and the comparison is startling, I am sad to say. The labour force survey indicated that the average monthly number of those aged 65 or over, unemployed in 1974, was 7,000. The average number of claimants aged 65 and over was 17,500. It ranged to a ratio of 5,000 unemployed but 18,000 drawing unemployment insurance benefits, to that average. I will give hon. members who are interested more details when we reach committee stage, but that is the problem.

Mr. Benjamin: It should tell you something about the pension plan.

Mr. Andras: When one tries to apply the criterion of availability for work—which I think is a fundamental pillar of unemployment insurance integrity—to this gap and to identify those involved, it becomes a brutal exercise.

Mr. Benjamin: And that is a brutal way to cure it.

Mr. Andras: Now I want to touch for just a minute on the reduction from 75 per cent to 66⅔ per cent affecting people on extended benefit periods and claimants with dependants. It is my view that this plan should be wage-related. I do not deny the need for more income for people with larger families, but I think this has to come through other programs, not through this. To those who disagree, I want to pose this question: If you disagree with this reduction from 75 per cent to 66⅔ per cent in respect of wage-earners who have families, and who therefore attract this additional benefit rate, would you agree to a reduction from 66⅔ per cent, as it is now, to 45 per cent, or 50 per cent or 55 per cent in the case of people who have no dependants?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where is your logic?

Mr. Andras: We shall pursue the matter further when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that the best use you can make of your extended time?

Mr. Andras: There are those who argue that to approach this question with any sense of saving money is not a proper thing to do. I do not agree. I think we must all look carefully at expenditures and keep them in the right place. Before we get into committee I want to give hon. members our forecast of the financial implications of these amendments in terms of the benefits paid. The disqualification change we rate at a savings of $80 million. I am basing this on a 7 per cent unemployment rate, somewhat comparable to the rate this year. It would fluctuate in accordance with whatever unemployment rate we experience. The sickness benefit, increased flexibility, represents an additional cost of $15 million. The change in the qualifying and benefit period will mean an additional $15 million—that is a cost increase—and the change in the dependency rate represents a reduction of $30 million. The change in the provision respecting those 65 years of age and over represents a saving of $120 million.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Mr. Andras: The advance pay change represents a $5 million savings. The total is $235 million, but for the sake of caution we have reduced it by some $35 million because there are overlaps between these programs. Hon. members know, of course, the figure that I have placed on the premium increase, so the total effect is the combination of those two.

● (1740)

I should like to be able to talk to the House more about the appeal system and about the administration which I think is vastly improved and worthy of great commendation to the people running the UIC. I should like to talk before committee about experience rating. I would also draw attention to the publication and circulation of the study a month or two ago on advance unemployment insurance statistics, for which we have all been waiting. The figures to which I have been referring, on an actual basis as they occur, will be available for examination and discussion in the public eye, so no longer can it be said that some information is not available. I will follow up the case problems put on Hansard and try to get back to each member who has indicated that a particular case is still outstanding.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to a spirited discussion and debate before the standing committee when we reach that stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the seventh report of the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills, praying for the passing of an act incorporating Northland Bank and, in French, Norbanque.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Unemployment Insurance Act

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Andras) which was agreed to on the following division:

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO DISPOSAL OF FUNDS RECEIVED FROM SALE OF SKY SHOPS STOCK BY SENATOR GIGUÈRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Cossitt: —to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. This is a motion which is self-explanatory. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Prime Minister advise the House whether or not the government has information in its possession that Senator Louis Giguère disposed of approximately $95,000 received from the sale of stock in Sky Shops Export Limited by passing on, after deducting expenses—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, if the trained seals will stop talking so loudly I might be able to read my motion.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: I do submit that a member of the opposition is entitled to read a motion without members on the government side of the House interfering with that right of free speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: I would like to finish my motion if I may, Sir.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Cossitt: The motion continues as follows:

—by passing on, after deducting expenses and making possible payment of capital gains tax, the balance of the remaining moneys to the campaign funds of the Liberal Party of Canada and, if so, whether the government will therefore consider this further reason for a full judicial inquiry into the entire situation with the terms of reference for such an inquiry to include complete examination of all donations received by the Liberal Party of Canada in the months preceding and following the federal election of October 30, 1972.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

PROPOSED INCREASED PENALTIES FOR SERIOUS DRIVING OFFENCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since a very high percentage of traffic accidents are due to reckless drivers who regularly violate the highway code and since Ontario Solicitor General Roy McMurtry has already made representations to have the federal government impose stricter penalties to drivers who are regularly guilty of serious motoring offences, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That this House consider the opportunity of imposing stricter penalties for drivers who are regularly guilty of serious driving violations and that these penalties include the suspension of the driving permit for periods up to a life term for drivers who are particularly careless.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the hon. member's motion therefore cannot be put.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF SWIMMING AND DIVING EVENTS TO WINNIPEG—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the fact that there exists a very likely possibility that the major facilities for the Olympic games in Montreal will not be completed in time. In view of the fact that the President of the International Olympic Committee, Lord Killanin, has indicated a willingness for partial decentralization of the games and because of the fact that Mayor Juba of Winnipeg today reaffirmed his offer to make the world's largest swimming and diving facilities in Winnipeg available to the organizing committee, it is obvious that the time has come for us to concern ourselves not only with the integrity of the mayor of Montreal but the integrity of Canada as a whole. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That this government, in order to safeguard its already vast financial and moral commitments to the games, request the olympic organizing committee to move the swimming and diving events to Winnipeg in order that COJO then may concentrate their construction efforts on the main stadium complex.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS BY MEMBER FOR NIPISSING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I too rise on a question of utmost urgency and importance. The matter relates to a statement made by a leader of the committee representing the Government of Canada in the State of Alaska. The statement by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) was made in reference to hearings held in the State of Alaska on the trans-Canada pipeline route. The hon. member defended a Canadian route to the press which quoted him in a front page report in the Daily News Miner of Fairbanks, Alaska on October 11, 1975 as saying, and I quote:

The native rights have been extinguished in the Northwest Territories;

And further that:

the provinces of Saskatchewan and British Columbia are not controlled by socialist governments;

And that:

foreign investment legislation is not enforced in Canada . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to put a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 he can do it forthwith.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, in light of these misleading statements by the hon. member on behalf of the government, I move seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government be required to issue a reference immediately to the appropriate committee of Parliament to inquire into the circumstances leading to these statements.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Jelinek.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General about the state of negotiations with the Post Office employees, whether the negotiations have broken off and what progress he can report to the House.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for the opportunity. Talks broke off about twelve o'clock at my insistence in my capacity as delegate of the Treasury Board. They broke off because all non-monetary items of substance had been resolved and initialled. I had offered a mandate which I felt was very fair, equitable and equal to that of the letter carriers and recommended by the conciliation board chairman of $1.70 over a period of 30 months plus a COLA clause, plus a weekend premium, plus shift differentials. I have no intention of recommending to my colleagues that that mandate be exceeded, a mandate which will have to eventually, if accepted by the union, be approved by the Anti-Inflation Board.

I feel morally that I have bargained in good conscience and that every copper within that mandate is now on the table for the union's acceptance. I gather they are meeting this evening to see whether to accept or reject it. I hope they will act in a democratic manner and place the package before their membership from one end of the country to the other so that the membership may have the opportunity of expressing itself democratically and without coercion on whether or not this is a satisfactory settlement in the light of the present conditions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank the Postmaster General for his reply. There are many questions that I would ask him but I would not wish to ask any that might prejudice a resolution of the issue, so I will leave it at that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON USE OF PART-TIME EMPLOYEES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question also for the Postmaster General. The minister said to the House that all non-monetary matters were settled. I should like to ask if what he said pertains also to the issue of part-time employees.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, questions relating to part-time employees and their participation in weekend premiums and shift differentials was not even the subject of negotiations because, in my opinion, if it is socially unacceptable for regular workers to work on weekends, it is socially unacceptable for part-time workers to do so also. That and the clause on automation was accepted some considerable time ago, and the only issue that remained was whether or not we are to exceed the recommendations of the independent chairman of the conciliation board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to be perfectly clear on this. At this point that is what I really want to do. It is my understanding—and will the minister correct me if I am wrong because I suspect it is very important in the negotiations—that in fact there has not been agreement achieved pertaining to part-time employees and, more specifically, concerning a formula that they have been discussing with the government representatives. As I understand it, their urging is that the government come forward with some specific formula pertaining to part-time employees, and this has not been done.

Mr. Mackasey: I must point out to the hon. gentleman that even if we were agreed on the formula this would not bring an end to the strike, which is significant. What is significant is that the strike will end only, in the opinion of the union, when we provide them with a 35 hour work week and a sum of money between 38 per cent and 52 per cent, which is completely irresponsible on the part of the union negotiators.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REASON GOVERNMENT OPPOSED TO LIFTING CEILING ON COLA CLAUSE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I conclude from what the minister said that the issue of part-time workers has not been settled, contrary to what he said earlier. Since one of the points the postal workers are asking the government to comply with is to lift the ceiling on the COLA clause, and in view of the fact that if the government's own anti-inflation program is successful next year, it need not worry from a financial point of view about lifting the ceiling on the COLA clause—and if its program is not successful, all the more reason for the workers directly affected to get the benefit of an increase, which would make up for the increase in the cost of living—why, in terms of this side of the monetary issue, will the government not agree to that?

● (1420)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, at the moment there is only one bargaining unit with any COLA clause in the public service, and that is the letter carriers.

Mr. Broadbent: There should be more.

Mr. Rodriguez: Don't brag about it.

Mr. Mackasey: The only other was an arbitration award which would provide a sum of wages equal to the cost of living. If CUPW were to accept a COLA clause similar to the letter carriers, it would then be the second bargaining unit. This COLA clause is capped, but conceivably at the end of the contract, and since it is a cumulative feature, adjusted quarterly, it could result in an extra 60 cents an hour on top of the 30 cents extra which prevails at the time. That is much more generous than the COLA clauses which exists in the socialistic provinces of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF INTERVALS AT WHICH SALARY INCREASES EFFECTIVE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just pointed out that the increase offered to letter carriers is $1.70 an hour, over a period of 30 months. Could he advise this House at what intervals the increase will be paid? Will there also be a raise geared to the cost of living index?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is not a collective agreement with letter carriers but with postal workers. I would prefer that the unions explain themselves to their members at what dates this increase of $1.70 will be distributed. I think it is the right of the union to tell its members the conditions of the agreement. I hope it will clearly explain our proposal to the membership across Canada.

DORVAL—LEASE TO SKY SHOPS—GENERAL POLICY OF PUBLIC TENDERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of the replies he has given in this House in respect of the lease extension granted Sky Shops Export Limited at Dorval.

In view of his remarks in the House, can the minister confirm for us that Mr. Eric Winsor of his department was correct in stating, as he did in his letter of March 17, 1970 to Mr. Lapointe, that, and I quote:

—it has always been the policy of the Department of Transport to invite general public tenders—on such leases and lease extensions?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is, no doubt, an accurate statement of general policy, but in the case of any specific circumstances changes do occur.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: It has indeed been the specific policy to take into consideration special circumstances.

An hon. Member: What are those?

Mr. Mazankowski: Don't try to cover up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: In the case of Dorval, certain extensions to leases without tender have been granted to bring them into line with a particular joint termination date. In the case of the Sky Shops lease in particular—a duty shop operation which was completely dependent upon international traffic for its viability—the decision to allow for an extension, which then had three years and seven months to go before the termination of the existing lease, permitted the construction of appropriate facilities far more suitable for the operation and was considered one of the circumstances which allowed for an extension without tender.

DORVAL—INQUIRY WHETHER LESSEE AT MALTON OFFERED EXTENSION SIMILAR TO SKY SHOPS WITHOUT COMPETITIVE BIDS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I find that answer very interesting. The minister has placed emphasis on the gradual transfer of the duty free business from Dorval to Mirabel as a reason for this unusual lease extension to Sky Shops. Since during the same period this government was also proposing a new international airport at Pickering, can the minister tell the House whether the lessee at Malton was offered or given a similar extension without any opportunity for competitive bids?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member may have missed a rather key point. There was in the proposal for Dorval a proposal for some important capital reconstruction. I do not know whether any similar situation existed in the case of Malton. In any case, the date of transfer of traffic was rather further away, if not, as it turned out, more hypothetical.

DORVAL—ALLEGED DEPARTMENTAL CONCERN ABOUT SPREAD IN RATES BETWEEN SKY SHOPS AND MALTON LESSEE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, a further supplementary. Can the minister explain the apparent contradiction between his statement yesterday that the rates in the Sky Shop lease compare "very directly" with rates charged at Malton when Mr. Winsor in the letter I referred to previously, stated at that time that he was concerned about the spread between the two and the fact that the lessee at Malton was paying 15 per cent even then in 1970 for a franchise which was not as all embracing as the one held by Sky Shops?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be helpful if we tried to be a little more careful about what our references—

An hon. Member: Right on!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I thank hon. members most sincerely for their support of that proposition. The hon. member for Central Nova I think is one of the more responsible members in the opposition and I wish—

[Mr. Lang.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I, of course, do not have the particular letter in my hand, but I believe in fact there was no particular reference to the 15 per cent in it but that it was an addendum from other sources. That is one problem of accuracy which I know was unintentional. Secondly, the fact of the matter as I understand it at that particular point in time was that the Malton lease was on the basis of 15 per cent up to a particular level, namely, $150,000 in sales and then 5 per cent thereafter and was subsequently renegotiated to a figure of 15 per cent and 8 per cent after the $150,000 maximum. At the time in question, of course, the Dorval lease was very much out of line because that lease, having been entered into in 1964, was running at a 5 per cent level. In the letter from Mr. Winsor there was reference to the fact that certainly something closer to the Toronto level would be expected. In his letter he did not in fact go on to refer to the 15 per cent, if I am looking at the same letter or thinking of the letter to which the hon. member referred, although I know the hon. member added the 15 per cent in his own hand subsequently to that letter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF LEASE EXTENSION TO SKY SHOPS AT DORVAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice arising out of the information contained in the petition that has now been circulated, I understand, and is within the purvue of the minister, the petition signed and filed by the hon. member for Central Nova. Can the minister tell the House whether he and his advisers have reviewed this material in terms of the possible legal implication to the events involved and have they reached any conclusion or initiated any action as a result of that review? Particularly, I should like to ask whether the minister has conferred with the Solicitor General with respect to a possible RCMP investigation of this matter or whether he can inform the House if the RCMP is already on the case?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to all the questions, we are reviewing the material which was submitted to see whether there is appropriate action for the law officers of the Crown.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF PAROLE OF CLAUDE PITRE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Solicitor General.

In view of the criminal kidnapping of a nine-year old child and extortion attemps committed yesterday in Montreal by four bandits, two of whom were on parole, under surveillance or not, and one of them Claude Pitre against whom I had asked for and obtained a 25-year imprisonment sentence in 1961 and whom I had called the Hold-up King, could the Solicitor General let the House know the circumstances of their release on parole and what new steps he intends to take without any further delay to ensure the greater peace and security to which all the citizens of this country are entitled?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, Claude Pitre had been sentenced to 25 years in 1961, as the hon. member pointed out. He served 14 years before being granted parole. He was granted day parole on November 4, 1974, and that seemed to work well. He had a job outside prison and worked steadily. On June 6, 1975, he was granted full parole and continued to work regularly. He was last seen by the parole supervisor on October 14, and November 4, and everything seemed to be going well until the unfortunate event of yesterday. I can only tell the hon. member that we have checked with the parole board. Seemingly, they had checked this matter thoroughly. They checked with the community authorities, and the police. The man had seemed to be working out all right after a long term of imprisonment. Despite all this, we are still looking for ways to make the parole system more secure. The Minister of Justice and I will shortly introduce such measures in this House.

[Translation]

SUGGESTED SUSPENSION OF ALL PAROLE TO PERMIT STUDY OF SYSTEM

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Pending the introduction for review in the House of the new program the government has elaborated to fight against crime and violence, and as a means to improve the safety of the Canadian public, would the Prime Minister accept the following recommendation, namely that any parole under surveillance or otherwise and the related program be discontinued immediately for a period of some 90 days to give the House sufficient time to examine the government program and make sure the new legislation is enforced?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say first of all that, not having examined the hon. member's proposition, I do not know if we could legally discontinue this program under the act. The National Parole Board has powers, and I do not think the government could automatically tell it what to do. On the other hand, as far as the basic problem is concerned, I do not believe the hon. member's proposition is especially humanitarian and progress-oriented, because it would apply indiscriminately to the deserving and the undeserving.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a last supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister following the answer he has just given.

Considering that in the past, the government had recourse to and implemented the War Measures Act and also that they did not hesitate to implement controls, and that these measures can momentarily affect the liberty of some citizens, does not the Prime Minister believe that, as far as the security of citizens in general is concerned, a temporary parliamentary measure like the one I am suggesting, could be at least examined by the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon member's reasoning, he would suggest that we should put aside the normal process of law to invoke the War Measures Act, which would grant us the power to do that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Those were your words!

Mr. Trudeau: I beg your pardon, those were not my words, Mr. Speaker. I indicated to the hon. member that under the act the Parole Board had some powers and that I did not know whether we could intervene in spite of this act. The hon. member is also asking us to take arbitrary powers, since in my hypothesis the act does not allow us to do so, and he is suggesting that this should be done under the War Measures Act. I think he is going a little too far.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—PROPOSED INCREASE IN RATES ON CATTLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. C. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I have given him notice. It has to do with the intention of the railways to raise freight rates on live cattle on November 14, despite the specific reference on page 19 of the anti-inflation guidelines to regulated industry using their powers over prices and quality of service in order to ensure conformity with the guidelines. As the proposed increases are 15 per cent on single deck and 25 per cent on double deck cars and exceed the guidelines, which means, if the increase is implemented, that the cumulative increase imposed since January 1 of this year would amount to 64 per cent on single deck and 87 per cent on double deck cars, will the minister give assurance that he will take this matter under immediate consideration and do everything in his power to stop this unwarranted, undeserved and inflationary increase?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the BC Telephone decision showed how regulatory agencies can adjust their decisions to the guidelines. We intend, in relation to freight rates, to ask the Canadian Transport Commission to give a similar assurance that any changes in rates shall come within the guidelines.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICE MONITORING COMMITTEES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with a price monitoring committee which has been formed, of course with no official status, on a voluntary basis in the constituency of Nickel Belt. This committee has monitored increases in food costs since Thanksgiving Day. As our committee has received over 30 telephone calls a day reporting price increases on some items of up to 50 per cent, within as short a period as one hour, is the minister prepared to establish, or have the Anti-Inflation Board establish, in each population centre of Canada price monitoring committees which would make price increases public, accept complaints from citizens and file reports with the anti-inflation tribunal for investigation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the first thought which comes to mind is the speech of the hon. gentleman's leader, who complained about the vast bureaucracy this would create. I think it would be more helpful if the hon. member would bring together those significant statistics and give them either to me or to the Anti-Inflation Board. I will be pleased and happy to consider them.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS IN IMPLEMENTING CONSERVATION MEASURES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and follows on my motion of yesterday about the report of the International Energy Agency which was critical of steps our government has taken concerning energy conservation. Has the minister replied to this report which was published a few weeks ago? Also, will he ask the office of energy conservation to report on any follow-up measures which may be taken shortly?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the report to which the hon. member alluded created some misapprehensions. The point is that it compared the 1974 over 1973 performance of Canada and other countries. It did not point out that the economies of the other countries did not perform as actively as ours, and that their growth rates were slower than Canada's. Nor did it point out that prices increased more in those countries than in Canada. The comparisons, for these reasons, I do not think are fair to Canada. I agree with the hon. member, that there is a real need for energy conservation. I believe that the program we launched and announced this past year, the information program of which, indeed, was commented on by the International Energy Agency as one of the best of its kind so far as its information program is concerned. It is an important start. I urge the hon. member to make clear to the provinces that they have a part to play in this as well.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FAILURE OF FRANCE TO INVITE CANADA TO ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some ten days ago I asked him a question concerning Canada being invited to the economic summit conference in Paris. At that time he said the matter had been brought to the attention of the president, or government, of France. What progress has been made since his last report to the House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in a sense, we have not progressed to the point at which Canada has been invited to attend the economic summit. We have been supported in our wish to be present at that summit by the President of the United States, the Chancellor of West Germany, the Prime Minister of Britain and the Prime Minister of Japan. They understand the arguments we have made, to the effect that Canada has a contribution to make at that conference, that we are economically important and that no other country can speak for Canada at that conference table. We still hope that the president of France will be persuaded that these are valid arguments which justify our presence at that summit.

● (1440)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is the same argument we have heard for weeks. I ask the minister whether representations had been made through the ambassador in Paris to the president of France about the humiliating position in which that country has placed Canada—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —at the same time pretending that Canada is deserving of at least some consideration. Has that been made clear to the president of France? If not, I then ask the alternative. Is it not about time that we told them where they can go for placing Canada in that humiliating position of being on bended knee, asking France to permit Canada, whose contribution to France has been tremendous? Surely this country should receive at least reasonable consideration.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the right hon. gentleman that that is one posture Canada will not take in order to be represented at the conference, namely to go on bended knees for any purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We are not going on our knees at all. We believe we have strong arguments for our presence. We hope they will convince the French president. I think it is quite clear that if the president of France continues to prevent our attendance at that conference, it will not be helpful in terms of our bilateral relations. However, for our part, we would not want that eventuality to occur.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

APPOINTMENT OF MR. JUNEAU TO STAFF—REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF DUTIES

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister and I hope I might be permitted a short supplementary. Arising out of the manner in which the Prime Minister has just today disposed of Pierre Juneau, the defeated Liberal candidate in Hochelaga, will he tell the House the details of the appointment of Pierre Juneau as a special assistant to his office—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cossitt: —and specifically what duties Mr. Juneau will perform that are not now being performed by his already overly large staff?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Juneau will be filling the position of policy adviser.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, is this an extension, continuation or indication that government policy will continue to be appointing defeated Liberal candidates rejected by the people to high paying positions in the public service?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ALLEVIATE NOISE FROM HUMPYARD IN EDMONTON

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you for your recognition, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Transport. There are still shrieks and squeals at the CNR humpyard in Edmonton. They are having a deleterious effect on the health of ten to 15,000 people. Little action has been taken lately to rectify this condition. Will the minister take it upon himself to intervene on behalf of these worthy citizens?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be glad to see whether I can ease the pain of any of the people in that neighbourhood. I know that CN has some plans to extend yard service in order to improve service out of Edmonton. However, I will check into the exact details in relation to the hump.

OLYMPIC GAMES

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS U.N. RESOLUTION RESTRICTING SOUTH AFRICAN PARTICIPATION

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Since Canada agreed last Thursday to co-sponsor a resolution put forward before the United Nations Special Political Commission censuring the restrictive practices by the Republic of South Africa in the selection of its athletes who are to take part in international sport competitions, and asked the member states to bar the South African athletes from those international competitions, has Canada considered the possibility, should the South African Republic change its selection policy, that our country would feel bound by this resolution and that as the host country for the 1976 Olympic Games we could not respect both the universality of the participation of athletes in the games and the recommendation expressed in the last part of the U.N. resolution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as regards the rule, the hon. member is well aware of it. The athletes participating in the Olympic Games are the guests of the International Olympic Committee, and in the present circumstances, this committee has excluded the South African Republic from these games. The question is therefore not at issue. But the hon. member asked a supplementary question and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it is hyothetical. What would happen if the South African Republic were to change its practices? I must say categorically to the hon. member that the International Committee would then have to revise its position. I think the best answer I can give the hon. member at the present time is the following: this assumption seems to me somewhat improbable until the next games, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps then, Mr. Speaker, I will be allowed to take the question as notice, to examine it, but for the time being, to consider it as purely hypothetical.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF OFFICERS AT TORONTO AIRPORT

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It has come to my attention that there is a serious cutback in the staff at terminals one and two at the Toronto airport for the clearing of immigrants coming into Canada. Has the minister given approval to reduce the department there by 1,400 man-years in order to help Treasury Board to re-allocate those man-years to fill the new department responsible for administering the wage and price controls?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Definitely not, Mr. Speaker.

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF REGULATION TO PERMIT GREATER COMPETITION BETWEEN CARRIERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's announced program of reviewing all aspects of air transportation in Canada, is the minister giving consideration to the removal or modification of existing restrictive regulations to allow a greater degree of competition in the interests of the travelling consumer, by airlines such as CP Air, and regional carriers and possibly having the additional benefit of tightening the Air Canada operation as well?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of how much additional competition can be brought into the system will certainly be a concern of mine.

AGREEMENT ON LAND CLAIMS WITH NATIVES IN JAMES BAY AREA OF QUEBEC—PROPOSED TIME EXTENSION FOR INUIT TO COMPLETE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the draft agreement of settlement with the native people in the James Bay area is being considered by a standing committee of the Quebec assembly, in view of the fact the hearings will continue until at least the end of this week in order to deal with the matter, and in view of the fact that meaningful negotiations cannot take place during that period of time, will the minister now consider extending the time to enable the Inuit people to complete their negotiations?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that negotiations will be conducted again tomorrow and over the weekend with the Inuit people. That was my information as late as yesterday. I think we may really find a way to accommodate the concern that they secure some additional time.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURES TO PERMIT PRODUCERS TO COMPETE WITH IMPORTED CHEESE

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

To encourage cheese production and enable Canada to resume its place on European markets, especially the English market, is the minister considering either the revival of the quality premium for cheese, or possibly an export premium to allow us to compete with English cheese imports in Canada?

● (1450)

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): We are certainly concerned about dairy production in Canada, including cheese production. As I told the dairy farmers yesterday, we have six months in which to work out a proper program of cheese production in Canada, covering imports and so on.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

Because of the huge quantity of French cheeses imported into Canada, as a result of the grants the French government gives its producers, which results in what one could almost call dumping in Canada, has the minister considered doing the same thing in Canada by giving the producers grants to encourage them to export their cheese to Europe?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: I have no evidence of cheese being dumped into Canada by any country at the present time. However, some Canadian consumers appear to be willing to pay as much as $4 a pound for certain of the imported cheeses; they do not seem to be aware that we make high quality cheese in Canada—as many as 60 varieties—and that there is no need for us to import cheese as far as I am concerned. We are concerned about developing a proper program. For instance, we in Canada spend $50 million advertising liquor and other beverages and only $8 million advertising dairy products.

ENERGY

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—REASON FOR FAILURE TO FORMALIZE AGREEMENT AND APPOINT GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES TO BOARD

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns the Syncrude project. In view of the fact that an agreement in principle was reached in Winnipeg last February 3 in connection with the project and in view of the fact that public money to the extent of $100 million has been invested in it, will the minister advise the House why no government appointments have been made to the board of directors and will he also tell us why the agreement has not yet been formally incorporated into a legal document which the House might examine to determine whether the public interest is protected.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The hon. member has himself given the answer to the first part of the question. It is because there is no agreement yet that we have not appointed a director to the board. As to the reason for the lack of an agreement at this time, all I can say is that negotiations are proceeding with the province of Alberta and we are hopeful there will be a successful conclusion in the very near future.

Mr. Leggatt: The minister uses the phrase "in the very near future". Could he be more specific? Can he give us an outside date by which the House will have an opportunity of looking into an agreement and considering the appointees to the board so that we shall be in a position to protect the $100 million of public money invested in that project in the absence of any legal agreement?

Mr. Gillespie: We are confident that an agreement will be concluded very shortly. As to the reasons for which an agreement has not yet been signed, there is a difficulty with the province of Alberta over certain of the principles which were agreed to in Winnipeg, and with respect to the price of certain utilities which would be supplied to the over-all project.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ALLEGATION BILL C-72 DOES NOT PREVENT INVASION OF PRIVACY BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. May I ask the minister whether, since he assumed his new responsibilities, he has had the opportunity to study the portion of Bill C-72 which relates to privacy and, if so, is he giving consideration to withdrawing that portion of the bill on the grounds that, while it provides for broad exemptions that can be used to legitimize the development of secret files on individuals, it does absolutely nothing to prevent invasions of individual privacy by the federal government?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I recognize the concern expressed in the hon. member's question. I have not had a chance to read the bill, simply because it is not coming before the House in the immediate future. Obviously, I intend to do so and, of course, the bill will ultimately come before the committee of the House where all comments and suggestions made about it can be considered.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED IMMEDIATE TESTING OF NATIVES LIVING ALONG MISTASSINI AND MATTAGAMI RIVERS FOR MERCURY POISONING

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs. In view of the fact that the federal department of health declines to conduct appropriate testing of the health of native peoples on the Mistassini and Mattagami rivers until the Department of the Environment has surveyed the mercury content of fish in the affected areas, and since many of these people are suspected to be suffering from, or do suffer from, mercury poisoning, will the minister urge immediate action by the department of health and the Department of the Environment before acts of civil disobedience by these native people take place?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): It is my understanding that these tests are already being conducted. In fact, several of the individuals involved have been flown to Montreal Neurological Institute for further testing. I am somewhat puzzled by the suggestion that there is a refusal to test.

Mr. Brisco: According to Chief Otter Eyes of the grand council of the Cree, that is not in accordance with the facts. The principal concern of the Indians relates to the fact that they have lost their fish production; they are living on welfare and the government has done nothing to enable them to supplement their incomes with any other means of livelihood.

Mr. Buchanan: There is no question there is a very genuine problem as far as normal activities are concerned, but I think Mr. Otter Eyes was himself one of the individuals flown to the Montreal Neurological Institute.

AGRICULTURE

REDUCTION IN VOLUME OF INDUSTRIAL MILK TO BE SUBSIDIZED—REASON FOR FAILURE TO CONSULT CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Agriculture? It relates to the announcement made by the minister last Tuesday in which he told us there was to be a reduction to the extent of about 5 per cent in the volume of industrial milk to be subsidized. This will result in a decrease amounting to some $13 million for the dairy year 1976-77 which will commence on April 1 next? Can the minister tell the House why he took this action without first of all consulting the supply and management committee of the Canadian Dairy Commission established in 1970 primarily for such purposes?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The consultative committee with which the Canadian Dairy Commission meets were fully aware of the reduction in subsidy to take place next year. Their main concern when they met with me yesterday related to the proposal for the importation of specialty and other cheeses from other parts of the world—that they had to share this market. They were fully aware that when I said last April that I had enough money for 100 million hundredweight of milk they had to live within that quota. This allowed for a 5 per cent increase. They are above that level; they know it, and I have only so much money for this program.

URBAN RENEWAL—SUGGESTED IMMEDIATE PAYMENT OF FUNDS TO QUEBEC FOR PROGRAM

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

As an agreement in principle has been reached a few months ago between the federal government, the Quebec government and the City of Montreal, under which federal funds will be allocated to Quebec under the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and in view of the fact, particularly, that in spite of the agreement those programs are not yet effective in the Montreal area, can the minister tell the House what prevents those programs from working at this moment, and what action he intends to undertake with the provincial and municipal authorities to make these funds available as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): We have been concerned about the delay. We are waiting for an agreement with Quebec on the rehabilitation program. I spoke to the minister responsible and to the president of the Quebec Housing Corporation on Monday. I understand there is a letter on my desk—I haven't seen it—which indicates that we do not need an agreement now, and that they will allow us to go ahead directly with the city of Montreal immediately.

TRANSPORT

LACK OF STOCK CARS IN WESTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister why, when the cattlemen of Canada have been going through a period of depression, the railways are adding to their problem by failing to provide stock cars for eastern buyers who consequently bid lower, taking into account the added cost of having to keep cattle in the yard after purchasing them.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there was an exchange in the House on this subject the other day. I have subsequently determined that there are cars in every region of the country and not just six west of Moose Jaw as earlier reported. CP alone had 100 in Alberta a day or two ago on the day of my report. As I indicated in the House, there is no way in which the railways can be expected to provide all the double decked or single decked cars required for the movement of cattle all over the prairies. If all the movement occurs within a short one or two-week period this is a physical impossibility which I do not think any of us should expect the railways to meet.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that these figures would indicate there are cars in western Canada sitting on sidings which are required at the stockyards why does it seem to be taking as long as three weeks for the return of these cars from eastern Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is suggesting that there is a longer return than usual, but both the railways have reported that they are keeping up with the handling and the return of the cars at a very good rate. If the hon. member has heard something specific about cars standing at sidings, I would be glad to chase down that particular story for him in order to determine why they were there for any length of time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the government House leader will tell us what he has in store for us for the rest of this week and for next week. Also, is he able to tell us what restraints he is going to place on the time of the House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, today we will take second reading and, hopefully, committee of the whole stage of Bill C-65. This will be followed not later than as the first business tomorrow by second reading of Bill C-52. On Monday and Tuesday, as hon. members know, the House will not be sitting. On Wednesday we will resume second reading of Bill C-58.

An hon. Member: Hurrah!

Mr. Sharp: Second reading of Bill C-58 has already been discussed for four or five days in the House and I wish to discuss with the House leaders the possibility of getting an allocation of time to complete second reading so that the bill may be referred to the committee, where I think it deserves most careful consideration. As long as it is at second reading stage, as it has been for five days, very little progress can be made. I think the House should make the decision to refer the bill to committee, and I hope I receive the co-operation of the other House leaders in this respect.

An hon. Member: Withdraw the bill.

Mr. Sharp: May I also take the opportunity to announce the allotted days for the balance of the period ending December 10. These allotted days will be Friday, November 14; Thursday, November 20; Monday, November 24; Friday, December 5; and Tuesday, December 9.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, in respect of the point raised by the government House leader, according to past practice the decision of this party will be made known in due course with regard to Bill C-58. In the event that the bill is completed before the end of next week, can the government House leader tell us what else he has in store for us?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the next order of business I would like to call is Bill C-20, the Citizenship Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I put my two Thursday questions to the government House leader? They relate to House business. In view of the promise on several occasions that we would soon have the bill to amend the Government Annuities Act, can we be assured that we will have it in time to deal with it before Christmas? My second question relates to the bill regarding Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war. Has that bill yet been approved by the cabinet?

Mr. Sharp: The answer to the first question is yes; and to the second question, no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the bill respecting prisoners of war still under consideration?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, as a suitable gesture of some significance, in view of the fact that within a few days we will be celebrating Remembrance Day, and in view of a number of answers we have received which have been negative or evasive in respect of prisoners of war legislation, will the government House leader assure the House that we will indeed see that legislation before the Christmas recess?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I cannot commit my colleagues. I can only repeat what I have already said in reply to the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the matter is under active consideration by the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are no other members who want to contribute to the discussion of this matter raised by the hon. member for Peace River—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question has reference to item No. 17 under government business, namely, the motion regarding the broadcasting and telecasting of this House and its committees which has been on the order paper since June 11. Can the minister assure us that action will be taken on this matter before we recess for Christmas?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would inform the House, as I informed the House leaders of the various parties, that the government is preparing material in answer to the kind of questions to which we know members of the House would like answers, so that when we do discuss this matter we will be discussing it on the basis of full knowledge of the implications.

An hon. Member: Before Christmas?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure whether we will be able to call this item before December 19, but I assure the hon. member that it is a project still very much in my mind.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT; MR. RODRIGUEZ; MR. COSSITT—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday a question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and a related question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). On the previous day a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) during the period set aside for responding to questions on the order paper.

Having regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Leeds, as I indicated at the time I have some concern about it in view of the fact that the hon. member was basically complaining about the fact that, in response to a question he had placed on the order paper, the reply by the government suggested that reference should be made to a certain citation in Beauchesne's which would indicate that the question was clearly out of order. The point of order raised by the hon. member for Leeds can easily be set aside directly, in the sense that, since there is no obligation on the part of the government to answer questions, there can be no point of order by an hon. member who has received an answer which is unsatisfactory to him. However, the matter is not quite so simple.

The point of order raised by the hon. member for Leeds two days ago raises a very important question. Since there is no obligation on the ministry to answer questions which are placed on the order paper, it has been the attitude of the Chair and the administration here that the Chair should not unnecessarily interpose itself between the question on the order paper and the response or lack thereof, as the case may be. That is to say, it has not been looked upon by the Chair as its obligation to examine with great scrutiny or great care the procedural regularity of questions put on the order paper. This is not to say that the Chair does not intervene; there have been many occasions when the Chair has intervened and suggested to hon. members that a question is clearly out of order and ought not to be put forward. However, that is about the limit of the intervention.

If it is seen that answers may be made with reference to the procedural regularity of the question, and that this in turn will cause a grievance or a point of order on the part of the hon. member who has put the question on the order paper, it certainly is not the intention of the Chair to change the practice of intervening or establishing a more substantial presence between the questioner and the person to whom the question is put. Therefore, I say at this point that the point of order is set aside but I propose to ask the House leaders and perhaps the procedure committee whether it is time for some organization, whether it be composed of administrative officials of the House, members of the Chair staff and/or members of the House of Commons, to formulate the responsibility of scrutinizing and intervening in respect of questions which are put on the order paper, so that those which are not in order will not proceed and, therefore, the situation cannot arise again. Again I say it is not the intention of the Chair to take that step, but I propose to ask the House leaders and, perhaps, in turn the procedure committee whether that might be a desirable development.

The point of order, as I say, is officially set aside on the ground that, since there is no obligation to answer a question, no point of order lies if an improper or unsatisfactory answer is made. But I will ask for advice as to whether something should now be done to determine whether some scrutiny should be made of questions put on the order paper, from the procedural point of view.

I now turn to the questions of privilege raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and the hon. member for Nickel Belt concerning the proceedings of the Royal Commission on the Concentration of Corporate Power. These questions involve the availability of, and charge for, minutes of proceedings of that royal commission to hon. members of this House. Both hon. members have raised a very legitimate and important grievance about a source of irritation affecting them in their work as members of the House.

Parliamentary privilege, of course, has very narrow scope, but I am sure hon. members are unanimous that it ought to remain that way. In effect, I suppose everything that affects the disposition of a member in his attitude toward his work, or the facility with which he is able to carry out his duties, could be construed in the widest possible sense as influencing or affecting his ability to perform as a member. However, that has never been the interpretation. In fact, the interpretation has been narrowed to almost physical resistance which prevents a member actually carrying out his ability to speak in the House or his ability physically to fulfil his duties as a member. I am sure I am on safe ground in saying that we would be unwilling to extend the privileges of Parliament to include complaints about the proper attitude or service, particularly of bodies that lie outside the parliamentary scope and in the area of a royal commission.

I say, again, that both hon. members have brought to the attention of the House—I hope with some effect—the practice of a royal commission in making available its proceedings to members of the House. I hope the point has not gone unheeded, but I must say that under the strict technical interpretation and very tight definition of a question of privilege that has been respected by this House for so long, in neither case does a prima facie question of privilege lie.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, in response to a question I answered that $50 million was spent on whisky advertising. I should have said all alcoholic beverages and soft drinks.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief question of privilege. I am concerned about a possible ambiguity or misinterpretation between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and myself this afternoon. We have already worked it out between us, but I hope the minister will agree he was not inferring that any of the information I filed would constitute editorializing with regard to the information I gave him.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would confirm that I was not suggesting any improper additions, certainly not by the hon. member. I was referring to the fact that the letter from Mr. Winsor in no way stated that it was 50 per cent, which would have been an inaccuracy on his part. The reference to the "15" and "5" in the letter which was supplied to me by the hon. member is in handwriting and was apparently added at a subsequent time.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, in my point of order I should like to refer to a supplementary question I asked a short while ago of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about whether the appointment of Pierre Juneau to his office as a special assistant indicated continuation of government policy to appoint defeated Liberals to high office in the public service. I realize, Mr. Speaker, as you have pointed out on a number of occasions and did so a few moments ago, that no minister, including the Prime Minister, is obliged to answer any question. I therefore understand the embarrassed silence when the Prime Minister did not answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would feel it unjust to allow the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) to continue giving the impression that it was a choice of the Prime Minister whether to make an answer to the question. It was, in fact, a ruling by the Chair that the question was not in order.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in a way this matter is related to the ruling you have made on the point of order. It relates to the oral question period. It is a well known rule, and Your Honour just referred to it, that ministers are not obliged to give answers to any questions put to them. However, this afternoon, in respect of the question I put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), I very clearly stated my question and the minister gave a very long answer which bore no relationship to the question. This created difficulties for yourself and for other hon. members and took up valuable time of the House. It did not permit ample time, either, for me to ask a supplementary or to pursue the specifics of the question of energy conservation. I think it should be made clear to ministers that if they are not willing to answer questions, they should remain silent rather than take up the valuable time of the House with non-answers.

SUPPLYING OF INFORMATION CONCERNING CBC

Question No. 2,530—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,295 which stated in part: "it has not been customary to require the C.B.C. to supply such details of its internal management and administration" (a) on what date and by whom was such a policy arrived at (b) what are all the reasons justifying such a decision (c) will the government agree to a change in this policy by making available to Parliament answers to all requests for legitimate information concerning CBC and its operations and (i) if so, on what date (ii) if not, for what reason?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): In reply to parts (a) and (b), I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a) and (b) parliament has not, as a matter of custom since the corporation's creation in 1936, required CBC to supply, in answering parliamentary questions, certain details of its internal management and administration. It is understood that parliament has had two reasons for following this custom: first, the independence of the CBC as a Crown corporation, established for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national program service; and, secondly, the competitive nature of many of CBC's activities. The appropriateness of the CBC providing certain categories of information has been considered on many occasions by various parliamentary committees and when the CBC has suggested that such information should not be made a matter of public record, its views have been accepted by them. Names of staff members and their functions in relation to specific programs and the costs related to such assignments, as requested in question No. 2,295, are examples of details which it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply. It is open to parliament to discuss the policies it and the CBC have followed in this regard and it would be appropriate to review them when the CBC's estimates are before the House of Commons Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. (c) No. The government makes available all information requested by members except where publication would be inconsistent with the mandate given to the corporation by parliament. This principle is well established and accepted with respect to information about government agencies and Crown corporations which are in competition with the private sector.

FILMS INVESTED IN BY CFDC

Question No. 2,935—Mr. Friesen:

With reference to the answer to Part 1 of Question No. 2,412, of the films underwritten in whole or in part by the Canadian Film Development Corporation (a) how many were X rated (b) which ones were actually completed?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: (a) Film classification is under provincial jurisdiction and varies in form from one province to another. (b) As of November 1, 1975, "Jos Carbone", "M'en revenant par les épinettes", and "The Far Shore" (1974-75) are in the final stages of production. "The Beast", "Floralie où es-tu?" (1972-73), and "Moss Tarts" (1973-74) are not completed.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows: 1. The answer to question No. 2,412 listed production companies which received assistance in the form of investments from the Canadian Film Development Corporation. All these companies are incorporated under the laws of Canada or a province.

INDOOR CAR PARKING FACILITIES AT AIRPORTS

Question No. 3,176—Mr. Reynolds:

Do the international airports at Montreal and Toronto have indoor car parking and did the Department of Transport recently close the indoor parking at the Vancouver International Airport and, if so, are there any future plans for indoor parking at the Vancouver International Airport in Richmond, British Columbia?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): At Montreal International Airport no indoor parking is provided. At Toronto International Airport indoor parking is available at Terminal 1, but not at Terminal 2. At Vancouver International Airport, the indoor parking area will be converted to an international arrivals area and alternate parking facilities have been provided. The feasibility of a parking structure is being studied.

NORTHERN ROADS PROGRAM

Question No. 3,177—Mr. Marshall:

1. Under the Northern Roads Policy requesting Yukon and Northwest Territories communities and industry to help formulate a northern roads programme for the next ten years, has any consideration been given by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to the inclusion of all of Canada especially the areas of Northern Newfoundland and Labrador and, if not, for what reason?

2. Does the government agree that these areas have been neglected, and, if so, what is its intention to compensate for this neglect?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. No. Responsibility for roads policy development within a province rests with the respective provincial governments. Only in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories is road development policy under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

2. See Beauchesne, (Chapter V, Section 171(bb)).

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TAX ON CORPORATE BORROWING, INCOME FROM MINERAL RESOURCES, AND PERSONAL INCOME

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax (No. 2), be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-65 is now before us for second reading. It contains important measures designed to promote the growth of investment to sustain the needs of the Canadian economy. Specifically, there are three measures related to investment. The first is a tax credit for investment purposes in production facilities. The second is a withholding tax for long-term corporate borrowings. The third is a resource allowance and change in tax rate for mining and petroleum.

There are also two other points I should like to cover. One is related to a reduction in tax credit for high income individuals and the second is certain technical amendments. Respecting the first amendment which I mentioned, an investment tax credit, as the House is aware, this government has in the past introduced tax incentives to promote the growth of a strong manufacturing sector in the Canadian economy. The high level of business investment which has been experienced in Canada in recent years is ample evidence of the success of this policy. Nevertheless, as I need hardly point out, new conditions have been thrust upon us and it cannot be assumed that the existing incentives are sufficient to sustain the necessary level of investment. Uncertain economic conditions erode business confidence and high financing costs jeopardize investment projects. Furthermore, competitive pressures from abroad are increasing and we will need to remain competitive as other economies recover. It is, therefore, essential that Canada should do everything possible, within revenue constraints, to provide extra support to sustain investment until current inflationary pressures are brought under control.

Accordingly, this bill introduces an investment tax credit as a temporary, extra incentive for investment in a wide range of new productive facilities. The rate of the credit will be 5 per cent of the taxpayer's investment in eligible property; that is to say, the cost of his investment would be reduced by 5 per cent and his rate of return thereby improved. Eligible assets would include new machinery and equipment, as well as new buildings, which are to be used primarily for manufacturing or processing in Canada. In addition, new equipment and new buildings to be used in the primary industries of mining, petroleum, logging, farming and fishing would also be eligible. This temporary incentive will remain in effect until June, 1977. The cost of the credit, which would be borne entirely by the federal treasury, will be about $200 million in this fiscal year.

I should like to make a few remarks on the second point which I mentioned earlier, namely, exceptions from withholding tax. The bill before the House will also relieve the difficulties being encountered by corporations in financing their capital investment. In recent years, an undue proportion of corporate borrowing has been of a short-term nature, and with the pressure on domestic financial markets it would be desirable to facilitate long-term borrowing from abroad. The application of withholding tax can be an impediment to borrowing funds from abroad; accordingly, this bill provides temporary exemption from the non-resident withholding tax for long-term corporate debt which is issued before 1979. This temporary exemption parallels that which is provided for government securities. There is already evidence that this amendment will have its desired effect.

The third point concerns resource allowance. Another important component of this bill is a fiscal program which will promote the adequate development of our resources. The resource allowance, which is a new concept introduced in this bill, will provide a more efficient way to encourage exploration and development for petroleum and minerals and, at the same time, recognize a provincial request for recognition of their resource levies. The resource allowance will be a deduction in computing the corporation's taxable income and will be equal to 25 per cent of its resource profits before the deduction of exploration and development expenditures, interest and depletion allowances. At the same time, the regular corporate tax rate would in the future apply to petroleum and mineral profits.

The combined effect of these two measures is that exploration and development expenditures and depletion allowances would become deductible against the full corporate tax rate, thereby decreasing the after-tax costs of such activity and increasing the effectiveness of these incentives. With these changes, I believe we will have a better system for taxing these resource industries and, at the same time, one which will maintain a fair share of revenue for the benefit of all of Canada. It is estimated that federal tax revenues for the balance of this decade will be reduced slightly, by some $40 million annually. However, with the change proposed in the federal tax structure, more tax will be collected from corporations which do little exploration and less from those which have extensive exploration programs.

The relative sharing of revenues between the federal and provincial governments and industry is substantially unchanged. Since the federal government will still have only a modest share of resource production revenue, the portion of revenues accruing to industry depends primarily on provincial action. In this respect, I am encouraged by the further adjustments which have been made by some of the provinces and we can hopefully look forward to greater stability in the fiscal arrangements for these industries. In this connection, it is often contended in some quarters that the gradual increase in the Canadian price of crude oil does little to increase the development of reserves, since it is claimed that hardly any of the price increase is available for industry. I would like to make it quite clear to the House that this is not so. Under the revised tax and royalty arrangements there is still plenty of incentive for those corporations that wish to explore.

[Mr. Trudel.]

According to our estimates, based on information representative of the industry as a whole, the portion of the recent price increase of $1.50 which can be retained by the industry in 1976 will be 28 cents even without further exploration; with maximum exploration the funds reinvested could be as high as 71 cents out of the $1.50. Surely this will provide the appropriate fiscal climate for the industry's future exploration program, yet at the same time retain adequate government revenues.

I will be very brief on the fourth point, namely, personal tax credit. Clause 3 of this bill reduces the maximum federal tax credit from $750 to $500. This reduction increases taxes only for taxpayers who have taxable income in excess of $22,973, to be exact. All other taxpayers will continue to receive a tax credit of 8 per cent, with a minimum credit of $200. This measure, which does not affect provincial taxes, will generate an extra $50 million of revenue in a full year.

The next point is on technical amendments. There are three other technical amendments to which I would draw the attention of the House. First, the amendment contained in clause 2 creates a more generous mechanism to transfer the benefit of the interest and dividend deduction as between spouses. As the transfer provision now stands, it ensures that if a supporting spouse's claim for his dependent spouse has been reduced because the dependent spouse has received dividend or interest income, the marital exemption may be restored by the amount of the spouse's interest or dividend deduction that would otherwise be lost. This meant that in 1975 the most that could be transferred was $666. The new mechanism would simply transfer all the unused benefit from the dependent spouse to the supporting spouse. In consequence, a maximum transfer of $1,000 could be made.

Second, clause 9 of the bill requires that in order to be eligible for the credit for contributions to registered parties and candidates, the donation must be in the form of cash or a cheque. This amendment, which was agreed to by representatives of all parties, ensures that no deduction will be given for the donation of time and services. In this regard it provides rules parallel to those which are applied to charitable donations.

Third, clause 10 of the bill sets out more effective contribution limits for registered retirement savings plans. It has been discovered that it was possible, with the co-operation of employers, for many employees to obtain the full deduction of pension plan contributions, plus the full deduction of registered retirement savings plans contributions in respect of the same year. This meant that instead of employees getting a maximum yearly deduction of $2,500 in respect of the combined contributions to a registered retirement savings plan and to a pension plan, as contemplated by parliament, some were able to get deductions of up to $5,000. Clause 10 will close this loophole.

In conclusion, this bill contains four important fiscal measures. First, the tax credit for investment in productive facilities; second, an exemption from withholding tax for long-term corporate borrowings; third, a more efficient system for taxing resource industries; and fourth, a reduction in tax credit for high income individuals. I believe these measures will make an important contribution to expanding the productive capacity of this country to ensure adequate growth during the time when the program to combat inflation begins to take hold, and I urge all hon. members of this House support the bill.

● (1530)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the first words which must be pronounced in this debate, following those of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Trudel), are words of congratulation to an old friend who has finally made it to, shall I say, a very prestigious post.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We have known him from old as a very capable, very congenial and co-operative chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and I am very pleased that he has now come to the position of Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. After all, one could speculate in this regard, looking at the members on the treasury benches and seeing how many of them have been parliamentary secretaries to ministers of finance, and I immediately look around and see the new Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) who was the hon. member's immediate predecessor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Having said that, I now turn to the bill because, as someone has said, to every flower there must be tied a brick. I am not going to fix the parliamentary secretary with any responsibility for the contents of this bill, and I am not going to fix the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) with responsibility for its contents except to the extent that he was a member of the ministry which presented the budget on June 23 last.

It is very anti-climactic today to become overly excited about Bill C-65 which deals with a number of budget proposals touching on income tax. Some of them are of a remedial or tidying-up nature and some are of a corrective nature in that the government is trying to undo some of the horrible mischief and havoc which was created before by the 1974 budgets, especially among the resource industries; however, my colleague the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour) will deal with that subject much more adequately than I can. The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) will deal with investment credits, manufacturing, processing and that sort of thing. My chief concern this afternoon is to see that, hopefully, this debate will take a reasonable time. I do not think it should last the whole day in committee of the whole House and I hope we can deal with this matter expeditiously and get on with other matters.

First, I should like to take issue with the parliamentary secretary and the ministry in dealing with the last point raised by the parliamentary secretary. That is the move by the tax department—I should be talking to the Minister of National Revenue, because this is the sort of thing which is inspired down in his department—to plug the loophole, so-called, between registered retirement savings plans and registered pension plans, and saying that an individual cannot avail himself of the two provisions. I want to know why. If an individual is in a position or in employment where a condition of the employment is that there is a registered retirement plan, why on earth discourage him from going as well into a registered retirement savings plan? The savings plan is an investment plan.

We hear exhortations from one side to the other from the government about saving and investing but right away, on the other hand, comes a disincentive to do it, a prohibition. As a matter of fact, this point came up during the course of last winter. A delegation of railroad men visited me. They had heard about this move. It is a condition—I want the Minister of National Revenue to ponder upon this—of employment with the railroaders that they have a registered retirement plan to which they make no contribution. This is done by the employer. These individuals want to participate in a registered retirement savings plan because they do not want to reach age 65 and say, "Here I am; support me", as far too many people in this country are induced to do. They are induced to think that the state will support them with the old age pension, but the old age pension was never designed for total support.

However, here an individual, through an RRSP, may make provision for himself and his wife in the event of his decease is to be precluded from providing a comfortable retirement for his widow unless he pays the full shot. Why this discouragement? As far as I am concerned, this is a retrograde step. It may be all very nice from an administrative point of view—but why do it? Why not encourage people to invest on both sides? In the same way, why is it not possible, for example, for a member of parliament to enter into a registered retirement savings plan? Everything is taken up by his retirement pension; the whole allowance is taken up and there is no possibility of getting into a registered retirement savings plan.

Why should an individual not be allowed to do that? There is no favouritism shown to any individual when he is encouraged to save. It would be far better for Canadian businesses if they could have access to funds saved by Canadians. Then we would not have to have all sorts of artificial rules with regard to Canadianization of Canadian corporations. We would not get into the nonsense we will be getting into with Bill C-58, where we have artificial rules simply because people do not have money to invest. It is difficult to get at Canadian money, because we have a savage tax system. Our income tax system is one of the most savage in the world when we compare ourselves with countries with whom we compete. I am not talking about the type of tax system they have in Britain. We know where Britain is going; it is going down. Far too many good Brits come to Canada—true, to our advantage—and those who remain are being bled, bled, bled to the point where there is no longer any initiative, no encouragement.

Why do we have to try to do that to Canadians as well? The government has plenty of other revenue. Surely we have to stop this madness and let people benefit from the fruits of their labour, their initiative and their thrift. I know I am making a Conservative speech and hon. members of the party to my left who are egalitarian and say, "To each his own. Take what you want, but put back as little as you"—

● (1540)

Mr. Cullen: You are leaving yourself open.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They did yesterday. The hon. member for New Westminister (Mr. Leggatt) yesterday expounded on that theme.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): From each, according to his abilities.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is, put in what you care to; take out what you want.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is a Conservative interpretation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is everybody's interpretation of it. I think I have made the point and I will not belabour it. It was a good move to consider the spouse where both spouses are taxpayers. If the unused portion of the investment credit, whether interest or grossed up dividends, was unused by one spouse it could be used by the other in whole or part and an appropriate portion could be transferred. This applies to a taxpaying couple who have investment income to a potential of $2,000, because if there are dividends from Canadian corporations it is not that much. I think that is a step in the right direction.

As far as a tax cut is concerned, it would only apply to plumbers, electricians or mechanical engineers in the metro area. I think it is beginning to include some electricians and carpenters in the province of Alberta who will have up to and over the $22,000 income referred to by the parliamentary secretary in order to come within the reduced ceiling of the tax cut. In the lexicon of the New Democratic Party in the last year we have seen a new term, those people called the middle income people. Most of their people are middle income. Teachers certainly—some university professors are higher income people—and tradesmen too. Those are the categories of people who will be affected. On the basis of one set of expenditures there need not have been any change in the tax cut. We know the minister said in June that there would be a budgetary deficit of about $3½ billion, but it is now likely to be $5½ billion or nearer $7 billion. The $5½ billion stuck in my memory as the cash requirement for this year. I am not going to object to this change and I do not think my colleagues will.

There are some changes with regard to political donations that I think are of a very technical nature, but they have not caused us any problems. Having covered the high points of this bill, I would recommend to my colleagues that we give it second reading and move as quickly as possible, after the other second reading speeches, to consider the bill clause by clause.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I should like to join all members of the House in congratulating the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel), the hon. parliamentary secretary. We are delighted to see him back in the House and on his feet after his serious accident.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: All his friends are most pleased with his excellent reading of the speech. In some ways, it may even be an improvement over what we had a right to expect.

[Mr. Cullen.]

The hon. member is a man of good and common sense, but as I listened to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) suggesting he might become minister of finance some day, I was rather appalled because it seems the minute one becomes minister of finance, no matter how much common sense one has, it leaves him.

Mr. Cullen: That is only in NDP governments.

Mr. Saltsman: I am not going to be quite as accommodating on this bill as the hon. member for Edmonton West. I think it is a thoroughly bad kind of budget, not so much in what it does, because it does not do a great deal, but in what it does not do. If we needed any further convincing that we are dealing with a government that in many ways seems devoid of common sense, we have the evidence of Bill C-65 before us to confirm that view. Whatever rationale these budget measures may have had when they were originally introduced, that rationale has disappeared with the introduction of the government restraint measures. Now those restraint measures are a central policy set of measures; they are virtually the cornerstone, from here on, of all government policies. For the next three years all government policies will have to revolve around about those measures.

In looking at the various other things that come before this House, we have to ask ourselves to what extent, whether it is a budgetary measure, a monetary measure or an industrial development measure, it fits in with the government's avowed intention on the restraint program. The restraint program is important to the government to the extent that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has staked the life of his government on making it work. Many of the people in the government are staking their reputations on making it work. It is in that context that we have to look at this particular budget.

We are told that other policy measures that have come before the House will be judged by the restraint program. For instance, yesterday we were debating the unemployment insurance amendments. The argument made for some of the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act was that they tied in with the government's policy of restraint. I am surprised that in presenting this measure to the House so little has been said. I do not recall anything being said about the way these budget measures are going to tie in with the restraint program.

I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is not in the House. I understand that he has important business to attend to and could not be here. In his wrestling inflation to the ground, the minister often looks as though his shorts are coming down and this leaves him in a rather vulnerable and ridiculous position. By whatever logic one wants to look at the government's restraint program, it is quite clear that the only effective restraint in that program at the moment is restraint on wages. In the other elements that it is supposed to restrain, profits, dividends, professional incomes and interest rates, the government realizes—as I think most people do—that it cannot be done. These things can only be restrained directly in a minor way. It is difficult to come to grips with profits by setting margins. Margins over what? Over when? How do you measure profits? To what extent do you want to work directly on profits because of the consequences such work would have on them?

For obvious reasons, the government has backed off dividends. It could not make dividend controls stick. Even if it could, it is not sure it wants to. As for rents, the government was to set up some rental review boards but this, again, will be an imperfect attack. As for professional incomes, the government itself acknowledges that there is no way to restrain professional incomes. Speaker after speaker from both sides of the House pointed out that controlling professional incomes is all but impossible. The argument about interest rates is that no one can control interest rates; they are part of an international phenomenon and we must live with them as best we can.

Therefore we come to the central part of the government's incomes policy, the restraint of wages alone. This has brought on, justifiably I think, much bitterness in this country, and not because Canadians generally, or those in the trade union movement, oppose an incomes policy. Probably, most in this country support an incomes policy. Most in this country feel that an incomes policy is necessary. The question is, will the incomes policy treat all forms of income alike, or will it take the short cut and control only salaries and wages? That is the thrust of the present policy.

The government argues—with merit, I think—that it is difficult to control all elements of society directly with an incomes policy. Probably they are right. As the government sees it, they can control directly with ceilings and guidelines, wages and salaries. If that is right, it is vital to make our income tax system more fair. Increments in profits, dividends, rents, professional income and interest income should be taxed away under the Income Tax Act; but that will not be done. This bill goes in the opposite direction. I leave aside the treatment of income over $22,000 and other minor provisions affecting income at that level. Other provisions governing resource taxation, the 5 per cent investment tax credit, and the removal of the withholding tax on interest on long-term corporate bonds all make it easier for capital to work profitably. Actually, capital is treated better than some of the other elements of society.

What has been this country's tax policy? Let us go back a number of years. We will find that the thrust of our income tax policy has been to place the greater part of the tax burden on the middle income earner and a smaller part on the corporate sector. The corporate sector has been largely relieved of its responsibility to contribute to society. A succession of tax measures increased depreciation allowances and therefore improved the profit potential of the businesses concerned. This was done deliberately and consciously. Recently the government lowered the proportion of total taxes corporations must pay. This bill rescinds none of these measures. There is no gesture to restore corporate taxes to previous levels. Present levels are scarcely in harmony with legislation which seeks to be fair, which seeks to implement an incomes policy.

If the government expects confidence, and expects people to co-operate willingly on any policy of restraint, it will need to bring in a new budget which will cancel some of the measures I have mentioned. In addition, this bill ought to be withdrawn. It does not fit the times. If anything, it will exacerbate our present condition, not improve it. I suggest that the government should withdraw this bill and introduce a new budget which should contain measures which will make it possible for all Canadians to live with an incomes policy.

What should the new budget do? First, it should provide for a sharply progressive rate of income tax because, admittedly, incomes other than straight wages and salaries will escape the restraint program. We should introduce a sharply graduated income tax, or a surtax, with which to recover excess income and make it less desirable for certain people to push up their incomes. At present, many areas of the economy are not covered effectively by the restraint policy and the government cannot recapture a substantial proportion of additional incomes exceeding the guidelines which certain people are earning. The guy who works in the factory is not happy to see his wages controlled, particularly after he has tried to catch up for three years in which corporate profits have soared. He will not be content to see his wages restrained while people better able to pay taxes escape paying their fair share. If you are to make any incomes policy work, you must make the tax system more progressive. In addition, the new budget should provide for tax credits for those unable to pay taxes.

The government argues that we need the restraint program in order to help those whose bargaining position is weak. Well, let us help them—not with talk, not with rhetoric, but with concrete action. Let us give the poor tax credits and so improve their bargaining power. The poor should be compensated for their lack of bargaining power. A properly structured tax system, that is, a sharply graduated tax system, will tax more heavily those with high incomes and give tax credits to those whose incomes are low. Further, the budget should restore the balance between what the corporate sector pays and what individuals pay by way of income tax. This restoration is long overdue and is necessary if the government wants to retain credibility. If the restraint program is to be credible, surely the government must collect more taxes from corporations. But it is not doing this. If anything, the thrust of government policy has relieved the corporations of their obligation to pay their fair share.

Obviously, some people will say I am advocating socialism. They will say, "You want to take from the rich and give to the poor. That is nothing less than income redistribution." I admit that that is part of socialist policy. Of course, socialism is more than that. But my suggested program is a necessary concomitant to any incomes policy because the minute you bring in an incomes policy you move in the socialist direction. The minute the government says, "No longer will we let the free market decide how much any individual or group is to get", it denies the validity of the so-called free enterprise system and says that it is not working, is not functioning properly, is not fair and the public must intervene in the setting of incomes.

On what rationale can you intervene in the setting of incomes? How are you to do it? How are you to decide how much "A" is to get and how much "B" is to get? It is impossible. Ultimately, society concludes—whether it be capitalist or socialist—that we must move in the direction of egalitarianism. You must move to sit on those whose incomes are high, restraining them more than those at the bottom. More than that, you have to take from those whose incomes are high and bring up those at the bottom. This means that the only kind of incomes policy that has any chance of working in the long run is one that moves in the direction of egalitarianism or equalization of income.

● (1600)

I see that my friends in the Conservative party are slightly appalled at that suggestion. They should have thought of that when they started talking about wage and price controls. It cannot work. It cannot be acceptable in any other form. Any kind of policy-setting by public design that does not move in the direction of egalitarianism will not be acceptable to society. Those who bring it in without understanding the consequences are making a terrible error in judgment. It does not mean that when you get through with this exercise, everyone's income will be the same. No one knows at what point society will say it has had enough egalitarianism and we must stop. Whether there should be a ratio of 1 to 3 for those at the top, 1 to 2, or 1 to 1 is a decision that society has to make.

What I am arguing is that any incomes policy must be seen to be moving in that direction in order to have any hope of success. As far as the tax bill before us is concerned, there is very little beyond the one measure that moves in that direction. Quite the contrary; it moves in the opposite direction, with those who get their income by profits and dividends being more favoured.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Because they saved.

Mr. Saltsman: The hon. member for Edmonton West says it is because they saved. I am sure it is because they saved. Obviously, you cannot take taxes from those who do not have any money. However, it must also be said that the poor would love to save. The poor do not have anything against saving. They would love to save if only they had enough money to save. In order to save, you need to have some kind of surplus.

Surely the hon. member is not going back to the sixteenth or seventeenth century where saving was a sign of virtue and all people had an equal opportunity to save. The way to have money today is by denying yourself; all you have to do is look around society and you will see how true that is. I know that those who deny themselves the least are the ones who save the most. They have enough to live on, as well as enough to save. Those who deny themselves the most are the ones who cannot save anything. They do not have enough to live on, let alone to save. The idea of saving being a Calvinist virtue and rewarding beyond measure those that save is not supported by either the facts or the logic of the situation.

We are looking at an inflation policy and budgetary measures that really have to deal with all sorts of problems in our society. I am sure that when he has an opportunity, the parliamentary secretary will tell me that this budget and this bill were not designed to do those things I am talking about but to stimulate investment, and for no other purpose. If he says that, I will be inclined to agree with him. That is certainly the purpose of this budget. What I am saying is that that kind of budget is out of whack with other things the government is trying to do.

We in Canada have far more than an inflation problem. At the moment, we are all very much concerned about inflation. We should be concerned. It is a serious problem, something that must be dealt with by public policy. However, in the course of dealing with inflation we should not lose sight of two other important measures. One I have referred to is the need for egalitarianism, equality in a democratic society, and the need to use the tax system for that purpose. The other important point is that at the same time as we are moving in the direction of equality and controlling inflation we must be doing something about unemployment. Unemployment is a serious problem. It may not be quite the personal tragedy it was before we had unemployment insurance and other social welfare measures; however, it is a national tragedy of the greatest importance.

It has been estimated that every 1 per cent of unemployment results in a loss to the gross national product of between $2 billion and $3 billion a year. We pay out almost $4 billion a year on unemployment insurance. That probably results in a loss to our gross national product of upward of $10 billion. Statisticians deplore the fact that our gross national product is not growing. They say this is because people are not working hard, or something else is happening. They ignore the fact that it is not growing because of the enormous level of unemployment we have in this country. You cannot expect the gross national product to grow under those circumstances.

I do not think the gross national product is everything. It is not the end of life. However, it is important for many reasons. It is important because we have many problems in our society and we need wealth to solve them. Also, we have a responsibility to other parts of the world which desperately need our help and resources. When we waste our resources and talents, and mismanage our economy, we are short-changing the hungry and desperate of the world who need our help. It is immoral not to give help and it is immoral to destroy the basis on which that help could be based. Therefore, it is important that we get back to full employment as soon as possible. I want to discuss that question in conjunction with the kind of stimulation that is needed in the budget.

The rationale for an incomes policy is this: if you do not have an incomes policy and you stimulate the economy to full employment, you get an unacceptable level of inflation. Therefore, a restraint policy is brought in for the purpose of containing inflation while at the same time moving to full employment. A restraint program cannot be justified on any other basis except that you are using it as a way of moving toward full employment.

There is virtually nothing in the budget measures before us to give anyone any degree of confidence that we are moving toward full employment. In view of this restraint program, what we should be doing in budgetary measures is stimulating the economy by increase purchasing power. We can do that by providing purchasing power at the lowest end of the income scale, to those who need to spend, to those who want to spend and to those who have the greatest need. We do not need to do that by stimulating savings. Savings are important, but we have learned that savings in themselves do not serve any useful purpose. Savings are only important when they become investment. There is no necessary connection between savings and investment. Those who have studied Keynes and have worked with that theory have been rather convincing in demonstrating that saving can just as soon put you into a depression as into anything else. The important thing is investment.

The question arises: how is this investment to be encouraged? Until now, the policy of the government, of which this budget measure is an extension, has been to stimulate business investment directly by increasing capital cost allowances, reducing corporate taxation, allowing a 5 per cent investment tax credit, and so on. Mr. Speaker, we have passed through a period of years during which there has probably never been a greater stimulus to investment in this country. I am referring to the last three or four years. What has been the result? Despite the fact that the climate for investment has been most favourable, by and large investors have not responded. The government has fallen over itself to make sure that conditions here are among the most favourable in the world.

When the United States brought in the DISC program, the rationale for moving to take measures in the taxation field was to offset the effects of that program in order to make investment as attractive here as it is in the United States. What has been the result? We still find unemployment running at 8 per cent. So where is the stimulation? The point is that unemployment in Canada is not related to investment. The nation has enormous unused capacity. Given confidence in the economy and purchasing power in the hands of the people, there would be no problem. The machinery is sitting around idle. It is under-used. Without providing any additional investment, we could easily put hundreds of thousands of people back to work.

The problem is not lack of investment. It is under-consumption and lack of confidence in the future of our economy. If a situation is conducive to profitability, a businessman does not need to be stimulated to invest. In these conditions, you cannot stop them investing. If there is purchasing power around, and if a prospect of profit exists, a businessman will find ways of investing without regard to government stimulation or lack of it. In the long run, the most effective way of encouraging investment or the employment which goes with that kind of investment is by increasing purchasing power, and there is nothing in the budget which moves in that direction.

This budget really comes from another age. One might have thought the government would have anticipated some of the views which have been recently expressed. After all, hon. gentlemen opposite always talk about a contingency plan which is lying around somewhere. There were all kinds of things they could do. But somehow or other nothing effective emerged, and every time and emergency was discovered it was dealt with in one way or another. Well, the last emergency was the resignation of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) as minister of finance. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton may have left the treasury benches, but the melody lingers on. This is his budget. This is his idea, brought in in another age, under another set of circumstances, and being brought before the House for approval although, in fact, it should have been withdrawn and new budget measures placed before the House, measures which would harmonize with the new objectives of the government.

I am not saying that a budget of itself would bail us out of the mess in which we find ourselves. I do not think that can be said. Nor can an incomes policy of itself prove to be of any significant value. But if there is to be hope in this country, any kind of confidence in our economy, the various measures brought forward must mesh with each other and make sense. It is on this basis we reject the bill before us and the measures it contains. It does not make sense. It does not meet the problems we are facing today. The sooner the government withdraws it and replaces it with something intelligent, the better off the country will be.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief because, like hon. members who spoke before me, I hope this bill will be referred as soon as possible to the Committee of the Whole.

First, I wish to congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister (Mr. Trudel) for introducing this bill and I welcome him back to this House after his serious accident. When I heard about it I told myself: I think his political life is finished. But I realize that there are miracles and we are very happy today to see the parliamentary secretary back in the House discharging his new duties. We wish him a fast recovery.

Mr. Speaker, this government is a past master at presenting bills like the one before us. It concerns tax credits promoting investments by big corporations first and to encourage to a lesser degree medium size companies and not at all the individuals.

I think that is the extent of the bill. We are very satisfied with the encouragement given in the fields of mines, oil and gas because, necessarily, the government must do something in that respect if we want to meet our needs in the years to come. I hope that some day Canada will cease to depend on foreign countries because a country becomes independent to the extent where it can be self-sufficient. I believe that the encouragement in those fields is a step in the right direction. However, I believe that the government should keep its eye open.

We always speak about granting funds to big corporations for exploration, drillings, and mineral exploration. In some other fields we have also been granting funds for research. However, I think that the government has no way of knowing if those amounts paid by taxpayers are really spent for exploration and if they really meet their objective.

Now, I understand part of it is actually spent on research, but when you examine the budget of those companies you often realize that only 30 or 35 per cent of federal grants do go into research. There are so many accounting tricks and those companies have such expertise in rigging books that research value in the end is minute. This does not mean we should stop granting tax credit as a form of incentive to those companies exploring for raw materials. But I just wanted to insist on those remarks for everyone nowadays in aware of shameful abuses in that respect, and I meant to bring that matter to the government's attention, hoping they will keep a closer watch in the future.

As regards small savers, again I think little effort is made. They are asked and urged to invest. In my opinion, if the government were serious, they actually would provide incentives for small savers to invest. I believe our economy as a whole would benefit from that. People think there is no capital available. Well, there is, and I think the government would progress tremendously if for two years they stopped taxing new capital entering the market as an incentive to new investors. There is so much money hidden today, which people cannot take out, because the government is there like an ogre, ready to lay hands on everything and empty all chests through all sorts of taxes.

If ever the day comes when government will not tolerate tax relief, will not even grant tax exemptions to have hidden moneys unfrozen, we shall be left without investments. You know that everyday we meet people who do not look rich. I meet farmers in the country and some of them who do not look rich at all ask us to try and hide $50,000, $60,000 or $75,000 they do not want to declare because they would be crushed by taxes. That is when you realize that if one day the government decided to let that money which could help the economy come out I think it would be helping first the whole country by allowing those people to invest money that they cannot bring out because they will have to give up 50 per cent or 60 per cent in taxes. I do not blame them. Indeed, I do not blame them at all. I simply say to them, you are doing the right thing, keep it in your wool sock, because you are going to get about 30 per cent or 35 per cent that will give you a return.

I think that the effort is not great enough in that direction. It is all very well for the government to say we need investment, we need small investors, but the only way is, as I suggested earlier, to give a special exemption for a new capital that would come on the market. It is understood, as the speaker of the New Democratic Party suggested earlier, that a small businessman, a small industrialist invests to meet consumer needs. That's the snag because until the government decides to encourage consumers many small investors will be forced to practice restriction like now.

We have to use restraint because of consumers' lack of purchasing power. In turn, they cannot pay because workers are overtaxed. In other words, their basic exemption is too low. If the government decided tomorrow that the basic exemption for single people were to be $4,000 instead of $1,800, and $7,000 for couples, buying potential would increase. This would spur our secondary industry, our small industry. Large manufacturers would profit thereby. This would boost the economy. Our Canadian economy cannot reasonably be revived without first increasing buying power. And the only way to do that today is to increase basic exemptions.

Labour leaders cry for higher salaries. We are all running like mad after salaries. Fatter pay cheques are not the solution. As one farmer put it: It does not matter what amounts of money we are getting all year long. What counts is what is left over come year end. As I said, the important thing is what is left over. The rest, the amount of money earned, is relative.

A worker may earn $5, $6 or $7 an hour. With today's inflation, a $7,000 basic exemption for man and wife, and $1,000 per child, that makes for basic guaranteed income. Without that, he will find his buying power does not balance his expenses. It does not even balance his debts, because prices rise too fast. Things are going so fast now that we realize salaries cannot match price levels. Because for the last four or five years, every big corporation, every manufacturer has been increasing production by 30, 40 or 50 per cent, while salaries have been tending to catch up for a few years at most, for 18 months.

I think that if the unions worked together they would be strong enough to say: To begin with, we will ask a reasonable basic allowance. And then, we will try to have wages equalized. I think that from that point of view, an actual promotion of investment would be undertaken, because he who has the means will encourage those who want to reinvest in his trade or industry. I think that it is a step forward to develop our economy.

Finally, I will dwell on that later, the bill refers to gifts to political parties. I think that explanations are in order because some difficulties have been encountered. Those who have not experienced any have often been encouraged and protected by politicians. There have been some difficulties, because when we consider both acts, the Income Tax Act and the Canada Elections Act, we note that some provisions are contradictory. Besides, this was confirmed the other day by senior officials.

The two acts are in contradiction. I believe that the act must be clear and precise because people have faith in it. They are told: Your receipts are not valid. They are made up in accordance with the Income Tax Act, but not with the regulations established by the chief electoral officer. This is where we need some clarification, in my opinion. We can try all we want to play on words today, but I believe that we should be discussing the legislation which was implemented in 1974. It is not really the people who have been trapped between the two acts. I look forward to the discussion in committee of the whole because we shall certainly ask for some precisions on this point.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Right now!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): The hon. member for Lévis said: Right now. We shall do so in two or three minutes if there are no other speakers. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly not delay the discussion.

Now, there is no mention of the interest rates. The first point, in my opinion, if we sincerely wish to slow down the economy, is the basic exemption, and the second point is the freeze on interest rates. Before freezing anything else, including wages, prices and incomes, we should first of all freeze the interest rates. I cannot forgive the government for not having done so. I was on the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs when the ceiling on bank interests was removed. This was done by an irresponsible government, Mr. Speaker. I strongly objected to this and I will never forgive the government for having removed the ceiling.

Today, a bank or any individual can lend money at an interest of 10, 15, 20, 30 or 200 per cent. The legislation on usurious practices no longer applies. This is why inflation increases, Mr. Speaker. If an individual is in trouble with the bank over an 11 or 11½ per cent interest rate, to get out of trouble, to pay the bank, he goes to a certain finance company which shall remain nameless, which will lend him money at the rate 24, 28, or 30 per cent, with a bonus of 15 per cent, so that he may reimburse the bank temporarily. This is what happens. The worker is caught in between and he must pay, but he realizes it. I checked the finance company account of a man who owed them $250 and at the end of two years, he was late in his payments, had renewed his loan and in refinancing, the company had added the interests and figured interests anew for another two years and that went on for two years; he owed $750. What can you do? I went to the finance company, I made a scene and told them that it did not make sense. They replied: That is our way of doing business. If that is their way, it is the way of thieves. Here in Parliament we favour thieves because every ceiling of interest rates has been removed. When the interest rate was 7 or 7½ per cent and a man lended money at 10 or 12 per cent, he was considered a usurer; he paid a fine and went to jail. Today, the man who lends you money at 200 per cent is not a thief but a financier! Can you imagine that? That is the dilemma we are in today. The problem was created by the government. We shall have to be more serious, Mr. Speaker, and I hope this bill is a foretaste of a forthcoming reform, that it is the beginning of the end, and that we shall have at last a tax law which is tailored to the workers' ability to pay and limit somewhat the thirst for money of finance companies.

[English]

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) both on his appointment as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and the rapid recovery from his brush with disaster a few months ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Balfour: This afternoon I should like to offer a few brief comments on the taxation amendments put forth in Bill C-65 which relate to the mineral exploration and resource development industries in Canada. May I first identify some of the main elements of this section of the act. I regret that the June 23 budget retained the most regressive measures of the budgets of May 6, 1974, and November 18, 1974, namely, the denial of a deduction from income of provincial royalties, mining taxes and similar charges, the implementation of the earned depletion scheme effective May 6, 1974, with the maximum claim limited to the lesser of 25 per cent of production profits or one-third of eligible expenditures, and the 30 per cent declining balance limitation in respect of development expenses.

In effect, Mr. Speaker, the retention of these provisions indicates that the government feels that federal-provincial wrangling for bigger pieces of the resources pie is more important than the well-being and economic stability of the resources industry.

It is now obvious that such measures were introduced with one aim in mind, namely, to force the provinces to back down on their royalties regime and allow the federal government to appropriate a bigger share of revenues from resource income. To the industry caught in the middle it simply amounts to paying tax twice on the same income. It is now proposed that the special basic corporation tax of 50 per cent and the 15 per cent resource profit abatement of federal tax will be withdrawn effective December 31, 1975, so that the net federal corporate tax rate will be 46 per cent for mining and oil and gas income, the same as the general corporate tax rate, and the abatement privilege will increase to 25 per cent.

For this purpose, production income is to be calculated after operating expenses and capital cost allowances, but before interest, exploration and development expense and earned depletion. The amount of the deduction is not dependent upon the actual level of provincial royalties and taxes, so that the federal tax base will continue to be insulated from changes in such levies. The new allowance is to be available to all taxpayers. The 15 per cent resource profit abatement was restricted to corporations, and since exploration and development expenses will not reduce the 25 per cent deduction the new rules will reduce the effective after-tax cost of such expenses.

The proposed 5 per cent investment tax credit for new machinery, equipment and buildings acquired after June 23, 1975, and before July 1, 1977, is to apply to such assets acquired for the purpose of exploration and development, operation of mines and oil and gas wells, and processing ore to the prime metal stage.

Mr. Speaker, in so far as these measures at least make a modest attempt to rectify the injustices I have referred to, we support them. Unfortunately, they do not go far enough and certain contentious measures which still remain in the budget proposals can only further curtail badly needed exploration activity for hydrocarbon reserves. Vast amounts of capital are required to be invested to seek out new energy sources. No one seriously questions that proposition. However, under the existing tax regime of the federal government, what is required will not occur. Instead of encouragement, investors are offered disincentives to take risks, and in the end the people of Canada will be the losers.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, one of the major provisions of this bill is the reduction in the maximum amount of the 8 per cent tax credit from $750 to $500. The effect will be a very slight tax increase for taxpayers with incomes above $25,000. It is expected to increase federal tax revenues by about $50 million in a full year. It seems to me, from my experience in this House in the past year, that whenever this government uses fiscal policy, the result is always distribution of income that leaves the top 20 per cent of the Canadian population in its relative income position, while reducing the income of the lower income groups.

In order to back up that statement, let us look at the distribution of income, by income groups, for the years 1965, 1969, 1970 and 1974. In 1965, the bottom 20 per cent of Canadian businesses received 4.4 per cent of the total income; in 1969, 4.3 per cent; in 1973, 3.9 per cent; and by 1974, 4 per cent. So that from 1965 to 1974, despite the so-called transfer of payments that are supposed to have gone to the lower income groups in this country, we have had a diminution of income in those groups.

As a matter of fact, in 1974 not only were the bottom 20 per cent receiving only 4 per cent of the total income, but the second lowest fifth of the population, according to a recent Statistics Canada release, received only 10.8 per cent. So what we have here is a very unequal distribution of income in the Canadian economy. In other words, 40 per cent of Canadians are receiving only 14.8 per cent of the total income. When you look at the people at the top of the income bracket in this country, you find that in 1965 the top 20 per cent, or one-fifth, were receiving 41.4 per cent of all the income; in 1969 they were receiving 42.6 per cent; in 1973, 42.7 per cent; and the latest statistics available from Statistics Canada show that in 1974 they were receiving 42.4 per cent. So the top 20 per cent received 42.4 per cent, while the lowest 20 per cent received only 4 per cent. When you take the lowest 40 per cent, you find that they received only 14.8 per cent, while the top 20 per cent received 42.4 per cent.

We can praise the system under which we live as much as we want, and we can say that we have made great efforts through transfer of payments in the so-called welfare state which this party helped to initiate in this country, both at the provincial level and in fighting for it in this House. But again we are left with this enormous problem in Canada, and although we in the House often seem to feel for people in the lower income brackets, we are so taken up with our own positions and our relative prosperity—because many people work for this government—that we forget that the statistics I have read are symbolic of the suffering of 20 per cent of Canadians who are only receiving 4 per cent of the income, while in 1965 they received at least 4.4 per cent.

Where is this progressive and just society that we talk about? Why is it that we, as representatives of the Canadian people in parliament, cannot find a way to alter our tax system and our fiscal policy so that the people at the low income level in the country cannot be helped more? Why is it that we cannot make certain types of sacrifices which we know are necessary in order for these people to improve their lot? This is something that I think concerns many individual members of parliament. But we are caught up in the system because we are all part of it, and we lie back and say that it has its faults but that by and large the system is working. But who is it working for? It is mainly working for the top 20 per cent in this country who are getting 42 per cent and 43 per cent of the total income. We do not seem to have the will—despite the fact that they call themselves Liberals over there—to change tax policy in this country so as to distribute income justly.

I mentioned in the House previously my views on the other place called the Senate which is set up under our constitution, even though many of us think it is nonsensical because it is composed of people who are not elected but are appointed by the government of the day. Senators have all kinds of directorships and are on boards of various companies, so that by and large they make up part of the top 20 per cent and, together with a number of members of parliament, they do everything possible in order to maintain the status quo. Their humanitarian and Christian feelings, I am sure, tell them that there is something radically wrong in a country like ours where 20 per cent of the lower income group consistently get as little as 4 per cent of the income. Then we introduce a measure like this.

Somebody might say, "Look at what we did recently with the income restraint program." As a result of complaints, we increased the minimum of $6,000 to $7,280 and we have made it possible for people to receive $3.50 an hour. However, these are all possibilities; there is nothing there. An interesting exchange took place in the House yesterday with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). His comments give us an indication of his type of philosophy, when he spoke about lifting the minimum wage in the country which, as he mentioned, is largely under provincial jurisdiction. He said that roughly 10 per cent of Canadian workers come under federal jurisdiction. I remember when the Secretary of the State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), at the time when I was teaching at university, introduced the Canada Labour Code at the federal level. He was then minister of labour. I was sorry for him recently because he was humiliated by France.

I remember reading one of his speeches in which he said it is not the fact that there are relatively few workers under federal jurisdiction that makes the federal minimum wage so important but, rather, the symbolic effect of giving an indication to the provinces that they have to do better. Yesterday the minister, instead of replying as he did, that the labour unions should organize the unorganized workers, as a member of the government should have given the lead in raising the federal minimum income as a further inducement and an example to the provinces. We cannot let this go on.

I should like to digress a little and return to the point I was making about the Senate and speak about Senator Croll who headed the study on poverty in 1971. Some of us obviously have friends there who are outstanding Canadians. Senator Croll is one of them, as anyone who has read that report would know. In spite of everything we have claimed, the fact is that the relative position of the lower 20 per cent group in Canadian society is worse now than it was ten years ago. That should make every parliamentarian thoroughly ashamed. It means that we have not really tackled the problem of income distribution. It means that we are not prepared, ourselves, to make sacrifices and to call upon others in our society to make the necessary sacrifices so as to enable a just distribution of income to be brought about, so that people in the lower income brackets can have the food, clothing and shelter that is necessary in the Canadian context instead of having to spend—as so many of them have to—40 per cent to 50 per cent of their income on housing and, in the case of some pensioners, as much as 60 per cent on food.

In 1973, the last figures I have show that more than half a million old age pensioners were living alone in Canada, and that 60 per cent had an annual income of below $3,000. We suggest that we should be increasing pensions for these old people because they are a good part of the lower income group, as well as for those women who are heads of families left to fend for themselves in a very unequal society with regard to employment opportunities and the further handicap of lack of day-care centres. Regardless of our individual beliefs, we parliamentarians will at some time have to tackle the problem of poverty. Senator Croll put his finger on an important part of this problem when he said that much of the taxes the poor have to pay are regressive forms of taxation, which therefore do not aid transfer payments or change relative positions because poor people have to pay property taxes, excise taxes and indirect sales taxes, all of which fall upon them proportionately more heavily and hurt them proportionately more than higher income people. Poor people are thus kept at a perpetually low level, which is a terrible situation.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) spoke about the problem of unemployment, as have others on this side of the House. We do not dismiss the difficulty of having a stable price level and full employment at the same time, but we have seen the government using unemployment insurance to introduce regressive taxation once again. Proportionately, a person making $19,000 and a person making $7,000 will pay the same amount of unemployment insurance premiums. That is a regressive form of taxation which falls on lower income groups and keeps them down.

We will either have to introduce a negative income tax or some form of payments which will hurt those of us who are in a relatively comfortable position, if we are really sincere about wanting to improve the lot of the poverty-stricken in this country. We have been very lucky because they are spread over a wide geographical area in various provinces and do not have much of a political voice. Native people who have been traditionally kept in a low income and social position have recently been showing a militancy at which some of us are very much surprised. But the essence of their militancy and distrust is that they are suffering because of this terrible poverty and all that it entails: the undereducation, disease, malnutrition, unequal opportunities to improve themselves and the declining morale of families which all the sociologists have been writing about.

We in parliament are the only people who have the power to do something about this if we really want to. But we have not had the political will to change the tax structure, change the relative positions to which I have referred, because we have been saying that if we touch the 20 per cent who consistently earn 42 per cent or 43 per cent of the nation's income, we will somehow affect their incentive to work. As members, all of us have been employers, teachers, university professors of one category or another, and of course for the extra effort and training we have put in it is only human to want a good share of the the income of the country in which we have been raised.

However, the fact is that as parliamentarians, schoolteachers, lawyers or university professors we receive a certain satisfaction from our jobs which is called psychic income. Even if our income was reduced, with some exceptions we would go on doing the same kinds of jobs; and I am not referring to any special sacrifices because one is a clergyman and has accepted that role in life. I am just talking about the ordinary satisfaction which comes with professional life, whether it be in medicine, law, or teaching.

Despite all the transfer payments and expenditures of government, it seems to me we can only change the situation for poor people if we convince ourselves as parliamentarians of the need to really do something about it. We have not yet changed the situation although we have had some clues as to how to go about it. But surely this type of income tax which was introduced by the former minister of finance will not really change anything. Are we going to be satisfied, as members of this House of Commons, if we are re-elected or stick to politics, to return here ten years from now and find that the lowest 20 per cent of the population is still only receiving 4 per cent of the total national income? Surely not. Surely we take our positions more seriously than that, and surely we can affect our parties so that they will bring in policies which will change the relative tax structure in this country. If not, we ought to give up completely and resign ourselves to the status quo. We might as well keep having the lower 40 per cent of the population receiving 14.8 per cent of the nation's income, or thereabouts, and the upper 20 per cent receiving 42 per cent while we talk about how much we love the poor. No, more than that is demanded of us and our political parties must give a lead.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge has already said that this tax is largely useless in terms of the income restraint program which has been introduced by the government. I refer to the investment tax credit which is intended as a temporary, extra incentive for investment. As we understand it, the credit will be 5 per cent of the taxpayer's investment in new buildings, machinery and equipment for use in Canada in manufacturing, in processing, in petroleum or mineral production. The previous speaker referred to this in connection with mineral production, farming and fishing. We must keep in mind that this is in addition to what was in the budget as a reduced tax rate which now totals 40 per cent, and also there is the two-year write off for manufacturers and processors. The point I wish to make is that at the present time we do not hear very much opposition from the business community to this restraint program, called the anti-inflationary program, because, although there has been a little bitching by them on certain things, they well know that as it is written now, by and large there are certain qualifications.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Jamieson) said not only is it possible that we will roll back dividends as long as they are going back into investment, but we might also put all forms of control on the investment sector as long as it can be shown to increase productivity. On the face of it, that sounds a bit as if we will make jobs for everybody. They seem to forget, however, that at the present time unemployment in this country stands at 7.2 per cent or 7.3 per cent.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

NORTHLAND BANK

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface) moved that Bill C-1002, to incorporate Northland Bank, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. On the order of the day for second reading of Bill C-1002, I notice a discrepancy on page 2 of the bill, clause 5, which is an amendment to schedule A of the Bank Act. The English version shows authorized capital stock of $20 million. The French version, showing authorized capital stock of $20,000, is a typographical error and should read $20 million, as is clear on both versions of clause 3 of the bill.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the idea of a new chartered bank established in Canada's three prairie provinces was born in the minds of a small group of western Canadians a number of years ago.

Mr. Stanfield: This will be an emotional speech.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed that I have in my audience this evening, in the five o'clock show, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). It is not very often I have that honour when I am speaking, and I thought I would just mention the fact that he is here at the moment.

This group is now expanded to include citizens' representative of the social and business community of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. They wish to create a new financial institution to assist in the provision of the credit which the nation requires for expansion of its economy, with special emphasis on the rapidly growing needs in the prairie provinces. The feasibility of such an institution has been confirmed through a series of commissioned and private individual studies over a number of years.

The names of the bank, "Northland Bank" in English and "Norbanque" in French, were chosen as being indicative of Canada's geographic position in the world. It will identify for many people in many lands its general area of activity and origin. The authorized capital will be $20 million, divided into two million shares of a par value of $10. The initial capital subscription will be a minimum of $10 million. Firm commitments to subscribe are already in hand for more than 50 per cent of this amount.

The co-operative and credit union societies which are initiating the bank are independent companies operating in many different fields in western Canada. Their contracts with several hundred thousand Canadian citizens throughout the three provinces made these companies aware of the need for a new bank as a supplement to existing banking services in the expanding western economy. The head office of the bank will be in Winnipeg, Manitoba, with executive offices located in Calgary. Offices will be opened in Winnipeg, Regina and Edmonton, concurrent with the establishment of the branch in Calgary. These offices will be low in overhead but will project the essence of premier quality and integrity—the foundation upon which the bank will be built.

Imaginative and innovative approaches to the financial aspect of the expanding economic development in the prairie provinces will be paramount in the thinking and operational activities of all personnel.

The provisional directors are: Ronald Thomas Curtis, Manager, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Henry George DeCuypere, Manager, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Richard Earl Foster, Manager, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; Donald Victor Larson, Executive, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Philip Duncan Sampson, Director, Regina, Saskatchewan; Alan William Scarth, Barrister, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Gordon, Maxwell Sinclair, Executive, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; George Robert Viereck, Manager, Prince Rupert, British Columbia; Robert Alan Willson, Consultant, Calgary, Alberta; Hugh Malcolm Wilson, Banker, Calgary, Alberta. All directors are Canadian citizens and are committed to subscribing for shareholdings in accordance with the requirements of the Bank Act. Mr. Hugh Malcolm Wilson, the provisional president and chief executive officer of the new bank has 27 years of domestic and international banking experience, eminently qualifying him for the leadership position.

Mr. Wilson has travelled extensively, particularly in North and South America, Europe and the Far East. With the wealth of varied experience and exposure, the applicants are confident that Mr. Wilson and the qualified staff he will employ can bring the new bank to a position of early achievement, always with the safety and security of the shareholders and customers in the forefront of his and the management team's thinking and action.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this private bill. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) listed the people involved. I think this is a step which is very much in the interests of western Canada, where in the past we have suffered severely from lack of financial institution. Winnipeg was a sizeable finance and banking centre at one time but in the last 25 years the pattern of the country's economy changed and much of this business went to the east. I cannot help remembering in my own case about 20 years ago asking my bank manager for a loan of $2,000. I went back to see him a month later and he told me he had to write to Winnipeg. Then I found that Winnipeg had to write to Montreal to find out if I could have the loan. It was obvious then that as the head offices of the bank were concentrated in the east, the banks were unaware of western needs. The incorporation of Northland Bank will go some way to rectifying this situation.

● (1710)

The proposal for incorporating the bank has been studied for a number of years, I understand, and the concept of the bank has undergone change. It is not to be mainly a Manitoba bank. It has graduated, so to speak, and will serve all three western provinces. This is good, as it is better for the prairie regions and western provinces to rely on each other. The credit union movement will participate in this bank and is to be congratulated. The credit unions represent the grass roots of our communities and their involvement in the formation of the new bank is extremely significant.

That is all I shall say, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the formation of the new bank. It will give western Canadians a western-based financial house and lessen the dominance of eastern-based financial houses. I think it will make our region of the country more stable and self-reliant.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words in support of the bill to incorporate Northland Bank, a new bank in western Canada. As the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) said when presenting the bill, the co-operatives and credit union societies of western Canada are behind this bank. Credit unions and co-operatives have long played a vital role in developing western Canada. In Saskatchewan, particularly, they operated during the depression years on the principle of lending a hand to their neighbours. They began with minimal capital. Over the years they grew rapidly, to become large institutions. Credit unions in particular have served areas not served by the ordinary chartered banks. Although initially credit unions were viewed with suspicion by the chartered banks, a good relationship has grown up between them and now it is not uncommon for a bank manager to refer a customer to a credit union for a loan to cover something for which the banks are not able to grant credit.

The flexibility of credit unions has been somewhat limited, and the rate at which the western Canadian economy increased in the past few years, make it necessary for the credit unions to enter the banking field. It is fair to say that over the years a certain amount of criticism has been levelled at chartered banks operating in the west. Basically, they are eastern-oriented and tend to shift the savings of westerners to central Canada. It is said that this activity in the past limited the growth of the economy of western Canada. I do not suggest that that statement is necessarily true. But it can be said, I think, that when banks have their head offices in eastern Canada they are more apt to be in tune with the needs of the east than with those of the west.

The provisional directors and shareholders of Northland Bank are to be individuals and organizations who have had an extensive background involving the finances and economy of western Canada, particularly the prairie regions. I believe this new bank will become a valuable asset for western Canada in particular and for the whole of Canada in general, and I have no hesitation in lending this bill my support.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I speak for just a moment. We welcome the extent to which credit unions and co-operative societies and associations are to participate in this bank. Mind you, I also join the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) in welcoming the fact that the head office is to be in our city of Winnipeg. Perhaps some questions need to be asked, but they can be asked in committee. We are therefore happy to let the Bill C-1002 go to committee.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to say a few words and congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Guay) for having introduced this small bill: it may seem small but it may grow big.

I feel that a new bank in Manitoba can only be of advantage to the population of that province, all the more so because we are advised that the promoters of this bank are in the main co-operatives and associations.

To my mind, in accepting this bank, the government is taking one step towards freeing itself from the traditional chartered banks, something all Canadians also wish. One need only glance at the difficulties experienced by co-operatives, such as the caisses populaires, the credit unions out west, in trying to create the financial credit they need to operate, because of constant obstruction from chartered banks. I myself am a founding-member of a caisse populaire, and if we have managed to make some way in the world of finance only through agreements with the banks.

We can see here that the shareholders are big bankers. They form a special group. That is all very well and I congratulate the people in Manitoba. But when one realizes the importance of credit unions in the province of Quebec and that they have not succeeded yet, Mr. Speaker, in getting a bank charter—

An hon. Member: They never asked for one.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): I think that if credit unions had the same charter and the same powers as chartered banks, there would be stiff competition. We would have real shareholders, real owners of the bank. We often hear today: It is the people who own the bank. That is not true!

The owners of chartered banks are the big shots of finance and the individuals who hold shares in them are practically forgotten. It is to these big financiers that the chartered banks which are commonly known today belong. Indeed, I do hope from the bottom of my heart that our caisses populaires and credit unions will some day be able, like chartered banks today, to create credit. Then you will see that these chartered banks will not have long to live.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TAX ON CORPORATE BORROWINGS, INCOME FROM MINERAL RESOURCES, AND PERSONAL INCOME

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-65, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, (No. 2), be read the second time referred to committee of the whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order please. I must advise the House that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is really very little I can add to the able presentation made this afternoon on behalf of the government. I would say, however, that since the bill was given first reading in the House a number of amendments have been suggested to the government which we have agreed to accept. Therefore, when we go into the clause by clause study, my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan), will be glad to put these amendments on our behalf.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Morin in the chair.

On Clause 1.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, I wish to ask the minister whether, with regard to the amendments in clause 1, subclauses (1) and (2), the comments of the resource producing provinces have been favourable. May I assume what his predecessor told me, that these amendments were being made as a result of negotiations between the Government of Canada and the province of Alberta and others in order to soften the impossible position taken by the two sides as the result of budgets last year?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Madam Chairman. I think it is fair to characterize the clause as put before the committee this evening as distilling the discussions and—agreement may be too strong a word—understanding arrived at as a result of several federal-provincial conferences. In effect the changes will not result in any very substantial diminution of provincial revenue, although the province has made it clear and has since announced certain changes in its own royalty system and its drilling incentive system, which will make for a more favourable regime within the province of Alberta in particular.

I suppose that putting this into its most meaningful context, looking at the new tax system and taking into account the royalty changes and the drilling incentives, at the very minimum, for the additional $1.50 a barrel which the firms will get from drilling, they can expect a minimum of 28 cents. Assuming that they take full advantage of the exploration and development possibilities, of the $1.50 the company can retain 71 cents. Therefore it does provide a very substantial incentive for a firm that is prepared to engage in exploration in Canada. As a corollary, for a firm that is not prepared to continue exploration in Canada it is rather a disincentive. I think it is fair to say in general terms that as a result of this amendment alone the provincial share of the revenue is no less. However, the province of Alberta has made certain decisions itself that will have shifted a number of percentage points from its own account into that of the corporations.

On clause 2.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, may I make one comment. While it is very much appreciated that there has been this expansion to cover taxpayer spouses mutually, I suppose it is up to the Minister of National Revenue to educate the public further on this grossed-up dividend provision. It was announced that the benefit of the $1,000 would apply to both parties. Since this was an income provision before to which are added dividends, but on a grossed-up basis, to the value of $1,000, it becomes pretty hard for a lot of people to understand. They ask why they should be limited to $650 when it comes to dividends. An educational program has to be carried out, but the sooner the minister can find a way of getting rid of this I think the better it will be.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): All I can say is that I will take that under consideration for a future budgetary statement.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, as the result of further study it has occurred to us that it would be more appropriate to change subclause (4) of clause 4 of the bill, particularly with reference to the final line of the subclause, which reads "1976 and subsequent taxation years". The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been somewhat exercised on this question. He has pointed out to me, with some justification, that the final line of the subclause should read "1977 and subsequent taxation years". I understand that in his rather forceful way he is putting forward this amendment to the statute.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: It is moved by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development:

That Bill C-65 be amended by striking out line 12 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"1977 and subsequent taxation years."

Amendment (Mr. Buchanan) agreed to.

Clause 4 as amended agreed to.

On clause 5.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, I have one question for clarification purposes. I take it this is consequential, or shall I say part of the package of changes that are being made as a result of changes in the oil and gas taxation? Section 123.3 is one of those provisions that deal with that subject.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, that is precisely correct. It is consequential upon the first amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 9.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, we now move into another area, and we are here dealing with the election expenses arrangements. Here again further reflection upon this area indicates that it would be most appropriate to amend clause 9(1) by moving two amendments. I have reason to believe that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development might be prepared to amend the clause in the following manner, (a):

by striking out line 2 on page 10 and substituting the following:

"property acquired by him in the year, determined without reference to sub-section 13(7.1),"

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Session (4.1) on page 7 is the end of the election expenses, and there is an investment tax credit provision right in the middle.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am obliged to the hon. member. Indeed there are three amendments here. If I may continue, (b):

by striking out line 8 on page 10 and substituting the following:

"years, determined without reference to subsection 13(7.1),"

If the committee wishes I can go through them all now or take them seriatim.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Put them all in now.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The next amendment is (c):

by striking out line 24 on page 12 and substituting the following:

"of finished goods,";

Then (d):

by adding thereto, immediately after line 32 on page 12 thereof, the following:

"(12) For the purposes of subsection 13(7.1), where, pursuant to a designation or an allocation from a trust or partnership, an amount is required by subsection (7) or (8) to be added in computing the investment tax credit of a taxpayer at the end of his taxation year, such amount shall be deemed to have been received at the end of its fiscal period in respect of which the designation or allocation was made by the trust or partnership, as the case may be, as assistance from a government for the acquisition of depreciable property."

Then (e):

by striking out line 36 on page 12 and substituting the following:

"23, 1975 and subsections 127(5) to (12) of"

Again my colleague will move the amendments on my behalf, Madam Chairman.

Mr. Buchanan: I so move.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, there is a little difficulty here. In preparation of the drafting of this particular clause 9 we drifted all the way across election expenses and the aggregation thereof, which continues to the foot of page 7, and then moved into an entirely new concept, this investment tax credit. The amendments that the minister has been reading, as I apprised them, and having seen them earlier today, deal with what are qualified properties. We are into two different subjects here.

With the permission of the Chair perhaps I could direct the minister's attention to the first part dealing with election expenses and get from him the purpose of the changes, which seem to be somewhat grammatical for purposes of clarification, so that a number of small donations to a political party in amounts up to $100 can be aggregated. The original intention of applying the 75 per cent credit is not limited to the first such donation in the aggregates, which I suspect was the interpretation that could be placed upon the legislation as originally drafted.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As I understand it, Madam Chairman, the amendments in question arise from a discussion that took place between representatives of all four parties and the chief electoral officer on April 14, 1975, concerning certain unanticipated consequences of the new political contribution provision. The amendment was drafted to reflect the consensus obtained at that meeting.

I suppose the most important and substantive provision in the amendment, which also makes certain clarifying and technical changes, is that with respect to the definition in Section 127(4.1), referring to all amounts contributed to be cash or a cheque. This definition operates in conjunction with the provisions of 127(3.1), which refers to receipts being issued by parties and candidates to persons for services rendered. Section 127(3.2) provides that the amounts contributed must, of course, be deposited by the official agent of the candidate forthwith in a bank, credit union or trust company, and official candidates in northern isolated constituencies are excluded from this particular requirement for obvious reasons.

As a consequence of this there are three consequential amendments. The amendment to Section 231 of the act and Clause 12 of this bill provides that duplicates must be kept of receipts issued for amounts contributed, referring to "amounts contributed", taking the term of the art rather than the contribution.

The amendment also establishes a standard of verification to which registered parties and official agents of candidates must keep their records or books. The amendment in 12(2) of the bill changes the reference in 231(4) of the act from contributions to the newly defined term "amounts contributed", and the amendment to 13(1) of this bill brings this within the purview of the penalty provision. Under Section 238(2) of the act we cover persons contravening the provisions of the new Section 127(3.1) and (3.2).

I would have to acknowledge the fact that that particular section of the bill is a potpourri, but I am advised that the reason for two dissimilar amendments being put in together is basically for structural purposes in the act itself, and in particular so as not to disarrange the provincial tax credit. Perhaps in terms of presenting the legislation logically that might not meet such a standard, but I am advised that within the broader context of the bill there is certain logic to it, though not readily apparent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I guess we will have to take the minister's word for it. The problem that arises is precisely a result of the fact that the minister has finished his answer in that regard to Clause 9 and now we come into the tax credits.

While I have not given the consideration in depth that one would require to become an expert, I find some confusion in respect of the investment for the purposes of manufacturing and processing. While this does allow manufacturing and processing on their own there is a disqualification in respect of property in Clause 12(b), line 22. So one still cannot invest in a building which is used for storing, shipping, selling or the leasing of finished goods.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

If an investor were going to put money into a building for manufacturing or processing, how is it that that part of the building which might be used for warehousing of the finished products cannot be included? If the building were to be used for the purpose of storing raw materials it would be included, but that portion of the building used for administration, including clerical and personnel activities, would not. Am I correct, or am I making a wrong assumption and that these uses must be exclusive to the building? In other words, the building must be used exclusively for the storing of raw materials, and a building used exclusively for the storing of finished products will be disqualified, but if those portions of the building form a manufacturing unit there would be a qualification?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, the understanding expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton West is substantially correct. The purpose of the exclusion here was to make it clear that the government's tax credit is made available basically for productive or processing facilities as opposed to those further down the stream in the distribution section. It could well be argued logically that storing facilities of a manufacturer at the very end of the process might be included in that regard. I think the feeling of my advisers is basically that it is very difficult to include that particular storage without raising questions about storage for the distribution sector.

Going to the hon. member's final question, the storing of raw materials as an integral part of the productive or processing operations would indeed be included. The raw material at the beginning part of the whole mill operation would be included, even if there were storing facilities, but the facilities in which the product is stored preparatory to shipment would not be included.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, but then we come to the next one which refers to facilities for employees, including cafeterias, clinics, and recreational facilities. I find it extraordinary that while the manufacturing and processing part which has facilities for the storing of raw materials would qualify as an investment, that part of the building for administration and clerical activities would not. The cafeterias and other staff buildings for employees in the manufacturing and processing operations are part and parcel, particularly the cafeteria, but would be excluded. I find that somewhat difficult. Would the minister comment?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think it is fair to comment that if it were all part of an entirely new installation these facilities for the storage of raw materials would be an addition to the productive capacity and in that case would be included. Desirable an objective as it might be to upgrade the facilities for the working force by some addition in the way of an investment in these facilities, which would not result in an addition to the productive capacity, it would not be regarded as being within the terms of the amendment.

In other words, we are looking for additional processing or productive capacity, which we know is going to result in larger throughput as opposed to ameliorating the circumstances of an already existing plant.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): For clarification, I take it that if the taxpayer were to invest in the total package of production and processing, that is, starting with the raw material, storage, cafeteria and everything, there would be a totally new complex and these would qualify, but if there were an existing complex and an upgrading by way of a new cafeteria, or a new staff recreational room, these would not qualify in the same way as a new office section attached to an existing plant?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If it is all in one building or all in one continuous process the answer is yes. If, of course, it is split up in any way that it can be regarded as being an amelioration of existing facilities, it would not be covered. Obviously this is going to be a question of factual determination, and not an easy one in many cases.

On Clause 10.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, this is the one the parliamentary secretary and I had some discussion about in principle this afternoon. I take it this is the attempt by the Department of National Revenue to plug what they see as a loophole which allows employees to take the benefit of both a registered retirement savings plan and a registered pension plan. I will not repeat the argument I made this afternoon in principle. I think it is reprehensible to try to lump them together, particularly where an employee has no choice. The employer pays right into the pension plan without any consultation with the employee. They control the pension plan as in the case of the railways. An employee is not allowed to participate in any registered retirement savings plan, and this to me creates a disincentive to saving. Frankly I think this is counter productive to what we should have in our taxation system.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, basically it is a question of fairness between employees of one employer and employees of another employer. There may be some circumstances in which the former would be entitled to deductions but the latter would not. This is to provide a little equity between different employees or taxpayers.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On division.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On Clause 11.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This again is to repair some of the ravages of the tax reform of 1971-72 where there was a desire by FISC to lay its hands on every conceivable split penny. First of all, government obligations had to be exempt from the withholding tax because that would hurt the government's position in its sales of government obligations or holdings of government obligations by taxpayers offshore. Now we are coming back to a more original position where Canadian business can finance on a long-term basis, and the withholding tax as it now applies will more or less preclude Canadian businesses getting more advantageous financing, and will place them in a very difficult position competitively with other interests abroad. Perhaps a little more sanity in this connection is being restored to the corporate tax in this very narrow sector.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, the amendment really reflects in many cases the current state of the world capital market. I think it is fair to say that since my predecessor's introduction of this proposal earlier in the year a number of substantial placements have been made by Canadian corporations and other borrowers in foreign markets in longer term securities. Perhaps the temporary or occasional quality of this particular amendment is recognized by the fact that it is applicable up to the end of 1978. Obviously the government will have to have under scrutiny the capital markets at that time, and the necessity at that time of considering this particular exemption. As the House knows, there are certain opportunities for funded debt placement overseas of which we have taken advantage and which we feel can be taken advantage of, in effect placing further Canadian financing in a longer term debt form rather than shorter term or equity.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On Clause 12.

Mr. Peters: Madam Chairman, I am curious why there is a legal difference in the words "amount contributed" and the previous words "contributions made". This would seem to be more of a grammatical than a fiscal change, but I should like to know the reason for it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, this really is consequential on the earlier amendment, as the hon. member for Edmonton West pointed out. "Contributions" is capable of being interpreted as either contributions in cash or contributions as services. This is to make clear that we are talking about contributions by cheque or cash payment as opposed to contributions of time donated by people.

Mr. Peters: Do I take it then that the minister is saying that only cash or cheque contributions now will be considered? As I understand it this would be a contradiction to the electoral act where one of the major purposes is that the total cost of an election is to be recorded and in this case we consider only cash donations. I am sometimes confused between the act in the province of Ontario and the federal act. However, it seems to me we are saying that they can only be contributions by cheque or cash.

This could represent a major change so far as the electoral act is concerned and the ability of contributors to make contributions in kind, in time, or whatever it may be. Surely the minister is well aware of the fact that what this means is more transactions because if the person wishes to donate services, the services are paid for, he is given a cheque and makes the contribution. It seems to me if this does not mean that and that is not the purpose of it, we are making a major change in the reporting of electoral expenditures. I think this is why I am confused by the words "contribution made" which includes a number of things and the new words "amounts contributed". In my English I would consider them both to mean the same thing, but I gather technically there is quite a difference. If we accept it as the minister says it is, then it can only be a straight donation recorded by a cheque. It seems to me we are making a major change in the electoral act.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I think it is fair to observe that to a substantial degree the election expenses regime contains a recognition of the difference between services and money contributions, whether they be by cash or cheque. There are a number of exceptions to this general statement I will make, but in general terms when people work on behalf of a candidate in an election campaign that kind of contribution of individual effort is not the subject matter of restraint or restriction. What is involved here rather is an attempt to get out of the area of uncertainty the Chief Electoral Officer has in respect of claims of tax deduction for service.

As I mentioned earlier, the amendment here is one that was drafted to reflect the consensus of all the parties represented in the House. On April 14 members from all four parties in the House met with representatives of the Chief Electoral Officer and representatives of Revenue Canada concerning the payment consequences of the election expenses bill.

I do not pretend to be an expert on the Elections Expenses Act, not yet any way, but as I understand it, his colleagues along with mine and those from other parties were represented at the meeting and this was agreed as being a fair change in the way in which election contributions will be treated for tax purposes. This does not impair the ability to make services available under the Elections Expenses Act.

Mr. Peters: Madam Chairman, the minister has just uttered the magic words which will get my support, that my party and their representatives along with representatives of other parties have decided this. Looking at the act, I will be damned if I can agree with many things they did which they have not been able to explain. This is total confusion, but I sincerely hope the minister is not trying to overcome another problem with which I am familiar by making this change. I am not referring to those expenses to which the minister referred but rather to the expenses incurred by people who supply goods and services, such as conference rooms, printing facilities, or whatever it may be. They should be considered as legitimate expenditures in the calculation of the over-all election expenses, and there is a price for them before even the transaction is made. It will have to be made in the form of a bill, someone will get a cheque, and the cheque will be donated. It seems to me that this is not the way to solve the problem which the minister had in mind and which affects another matter altogether. I hope this is not really the result of it.

I am certainly expressing an opinion on behalf of no one but myself, but it seems to me that most of us have had difficulty in understanding the legal jargon in the elections expenses legislation. I think it has been fair and reasonable and I would not like to get it to the point where cheques are exchanged for the sake of having a legitimate contribution recorded.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member really speaks for me as well in his expression of concern about the complexity of the elections expenses mechanism and I cannot make any further or very detailed comments about that. What we are really considering here is to have the tax benefit contribution made in the form of money, using the word in the broader sense to mean either cash or a cheque.

Mr. Jones: Madam Chairman, in all fairness I wonder if the minister and his department will be prepared to give further consideration to the Income Tax Act and corresponding statutes in view of the fact that the Canada Elections Act does provide for the election of independents to this House. As the statutes are presently prepared and enacted they are discriminatory, inequitable, and unfair to those who find themselves in the position of independents or are not affiliated with any political party. Because of this the legislation should be extended in some way to organizations of independent members of parliament. Now it extends to them only during an election campaign. I think this is most unfair and inequitable, and it is something of which this House should be darned ashamed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I was looking to see whether the President of the Privy Council was with us this evening and I find he is not. However, I will be prepared to make the hon. member's representation to him that, as a candidate like any other candidate he has certain benefits at election time but that his basic point is that between elections he does not have the same basis of recognition. It seems to me that that is a valid question for the minister and for representatives of other parties to consider in this context.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Chairman, we were anxious to read the amendments brought in. We thought that this would really shed some light on the act but I realize that the more amendments we have, the more obscure the act is.

It is true. There was a problem. But I think the previous act was much clearer than the amendments we are voting this evening, because the problem had to do mainly with receipts. According to this legislation receipts for services will not be accepted any more. It will be necessary to produce cheques or even banknotes I think. I do not know if I understand well correctly but if an individual, an ordinary worker who does not even have a bank account gives us $20, we will not be able to accept his gift. How are we going to register his $20 with the cheque system? It is easy for a major party which sponsors banquets at $200 a plate to "play" with cheques but it is not so easy for a minor party which has to rely on $5, $10 and $20 notes. The trouble with cheques is that in order to write out a cheque, one must have a bank account, and if one has not, what happens then?

From what I can see, even a $100 bank note is not accepted.

You have to give a cheque.

The act should be made clear. We have trouble understanding the act, and the chief electoral officer says: "There is a discrepancy between the Election Expenses Act and the Income Tax Act. He is the one who says that. We try to make sense out of it and get more confused than ever.

If someone—I would like to have an answer on this point first of all—gives us, say, $20 or $25 cash, a bank note bearing the royal effigy, can we at least issue a receipt and register it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Chairman, I must admit that I do not fully understand the position of each party in the House. But I think it should be pointed out at this time that it is the result of an agreement concluded between the four parties of the House, including the Social Credit Party of Canada. I think that this is entirely possible and that the hon. member is right, but the present discussion represents an agreement, a compromise to which the four parties agreed. For that reason, I presume that it is just enough for the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Chairman, if I could draw the attention of our colleague for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) to page 7 of the bill, subclause (4.1) of the French version, the member will read as follows:

... «contribution» signifie un montant versé à un parti enregistré ou à un candidat sous forme d'argent liquide ou au moyen d'un effet négociable ...

That means a cheque. Then the cash or the cheque represents an amount contributed.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Chairman, we of the Social Credit are told that cash deposits are no good any more.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Next sitting of the House.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Peters: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated the next sitting of the House, and that is mandatory.

Mr. Stanfield: Why?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But there is no need to do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I am sorry. I did not hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made it clear to me that he would not agree to third reading this evening, so under the circumstances we agree that it should be considered at the next sitting, and perhaps we could go on to other business at this point.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed that third reading be delayed until the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND VARIOUS STATUTES TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS, BENEFITS, ETC.

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the President of Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that hon. members on the treasury benches will recall that earlier this session the government House leader agreed that after this bill had been given second reading it would go to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service rather than to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. That has been confirmed by the government House leader in meetings of House leaders several times. I wonder if that understanding could be included in the motion.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, the statement made by the House leader of the New Democratic Party is accurate. I recall that statement having been made by the government House leader—

An hon. Member: And you have no objection?

Mr. Blais: And we have no objection.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I should like to have clarification of the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is my recollection that the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations was a special committee set up to discuss the Finkelman Report, and that once that committee has reported it is defunctus, and there would have to be a special resolution to set it up again in order to deal with this legislation.

I have no preference as to which committee deals with this legislation, but I think there may be a procedural difficulty facing the House in trying to send a second piece of legislation to a committee which was originally set up with the limited power of considering a report dealing with staff. If we can continue on the present basis for tonight, and if that can be negotiated—and it will be agreed that there will not be a long debate on a motion to refer this particular legislation to the same joint committee—that would be fine, but at the moment I think it is impossible to accede to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, first I assure the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) that that committee is not yet defunctus. It will be around quite a while. In other words, the committee does exist, and this bill could be referred to it, but as I pointed out earlier when there was a motion before this House to set up that committee, the government House leader said that that committee would also deal with this bill. He has been asked about it several times, in public and in meetings of the House leaders. It has been agreed, and it is agreed tonight. If there needs to be another term of reference to satisfy the hon. member, perhaps that can be obtained, but I trust that the understanding we have had from the government all along will prevail.

The point is that the other committee is busy already and will be terribly busy when supplementary estimates are tabled, but the special joint committee on employer-employee relations is seized of problems relating to public servants, and I think we were all agreed that that was the place for this bill to go.

Mr. Sharp: Madam Speaker, I would just like to confirm that it was our understanding, in agreement with the House leaders of the various parties, that this bill could be referred to the joint committee. However, in order not to cause any interruption in the debate tonight, I would be quite happy to confirm this with the other House leaders, and I suggest that the debate continue this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is a minister not going to speak on this bill?

Mr. Francis: On February 17 of this year the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) moved for leave to introduce this omnibus bill containing amendments to the pension provisions of eleven statutes.

The major amendments which are contained in this bill are proposed by the government as a result of its consideration of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women which relate to the equality of status of females and males under the government's own pensions plans.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Since the largest of those plans is the Public Service Superannuation Act, covering more than 250,000 federal public service employees, the government referred those recommendations of that royal commission to the Advisory Committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act and to the National Joint Council for consideration and advice. The proposals which were made to the government as a result of this consideration by these two bodies form the basis of the major amendments proposed in the Public Service Superannuation Act. These proposals, in turn, have been extended as appropriate to the amendments of the pension provisions of the other acts included in this omnibus bill in order to ensure the equality of status for male and female members which was sought.

The most noticeable effects of these proposed amendments will occur in those plans where there was a difference in the benefits available to female employees who in turn contributed a lower percentage of their salaries to the pension funds than did their male colleagues. Thus, on the contribution side, under the three superannuation acts for the civilian public service, the Canadian forces, and the RCMP, the rate for female employees will increase from a basic rate of 5 per cent to 6.5 per cent. This will make a total rate of 7 per cent of salary for both male and female members when one includes the one-half of 1 per cent contributed toward the cost of pension increases under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act and the amounts contributed to the Canada or Quebec Pension Plans.

There are also amendments on the benefit side, with the major change being the provision of widowers' benefits on the deaths of female members.

New provisions are being introduced to increase the minimum benefits payable under these plans. This will apply to all members but will be of particular benefit to single employees and to those who are not entitled to an annuity benefit on termination of employment.

In the case of those ceasing to be employed after the legislation receives royal assent, the minimum benefit will be the greater of, first, a return of contributions with interest at 4 per cent from December 31 of 1973 and of each subsequent calendar year to December 31 of the year preceding cessation of employment, and, second, an amount equal to five years of annuity payments at the initial level which would have been payable to the employee if he qualified for an annuity on ceasing to be employed.

Also on the benefit side amendments are included to make it possible for participants in the supplementary death benefit plans which apply to members of the public service and Canadian forces, both male and female, to name the beneficiary of the death benefit. At the present time, the benefits are payable to the widow of a male participant and in all other cases to the estate of the participant. The royal commission's observation on this difference in treatment led to the recommendation by the advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act which the government adopted, that, as with private life insurance policies, a participant should be able to name the beneficiary of the death benefit.

The bill contains amendments concerning the effect on pension entitlements of pensioners from one plan who become members under a different pension plan in some other service of the Government of Canada. These amendments relate to the report made by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates to this House on November 6, 1973, that the various restrictions and limitations on the receipt of pensions should be removed in these circumstances.

In the light of this motion and report, the government undertook to conduct a complete review of the principles which should govern the pension plans for which it is responsible. As a result of this study the government has concluded that one of the basic principles under these pension plans should be that a person appointed to a position under a different plan should not forgo his pension entitlement. Another principle which was confirmed by this study as still being appropriate was that provisions of pension plans may vary for groups within the federal service. As a result, amendments are being introduced in the various acts where a restriction exists to permit a pensioner who is re-employed to receive his or her pension unless he or she again becomes subject to the same pension plan under which that pension was paid.

Provisions are also included to permit the transfer of pension credits from one government plan to another in certain situations where such transfer provisions do not already exist.

Those are the principal amendments of broadest application to several of these acts. In addition, there are numerous amendments consequential upon new provisions in other legislation or designed to remove anomalies in the interest of greater consistency, deal with problem cases and a variety of matters which have arisen in the course of administering the various acts to which this bill applies.

The bill proposes the introduction of contributions to the Judges Act, a feature which is common to most of the pension plans covering the federal public service. As hon. members will have noted, members of the judiciary appointed before February 17, 1975, will be required by this bill to contribute 1½ per cent of their salaries toward the cost of the improved level of judges' widows' benefits proposed under Bill C-47. Judges appointed after February 16 will contribute 6½ per cent of their salaries toward the cost of their own and their survivors' pensions.

This rate is the contribution rate also proposed under Bill C-23 for the new superannuation plan for Lieutenant Governors and is the same rate as is paid by Senators under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Similarly, another amendment to the parliamentary pension plan will increase the rate of contribution to 6½ per cent of the Prime Minister's salary in respect of the Prime Minister's pension. At the same time the minimum age at which a former Prime Minister can draw his pension will be reduced from 70 to 65, which is now a more normal age for the commencement of retirement pensions than when the higher age was introduced in 1963.

The increase proposed in the level of the pensions of the widows of former Prime Ministers from one-third to one-half of a former Prime Minister's pension corresponds to the increase proposed under Bill C-47 in the level of pensions for the widows of judges.

This completes my description of the substance of the most important of the 106 clauses in this bill. Clearly it would not be possible to explain all of them today, but there will be ample opportunity to do so when the bill is before the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, or the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates depending on the resolution of the matter referred to earlier this evening. Mr. Speaker, I recommended to the House second reading and passage of this bill.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, seeing me rise again on this occasion one might be inclined to say this is my day in the House, but I certainly do not want to give that impression.

It affords me a great deal of personal pleasure and satisfaction to speak on second reading of this bill. It is the culmination of many resolutions and private members' motions. We have seen them lauded sometimes and other times criticized, but eventually always ending up down at the very bottom of the list. When the subject matter of the motion I had put forward was accepted in the House I was very pleased. It was sent to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates where we heard witnesses from the armed services, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Treasury Board and others. That committee unanimously recommended the contents of that motion to this House and, hopefully, to the government.

On page 1, clause 2, under the heading Public Service Superannuation Act there appears this title "Equality of Status" and it is precisely that at which I have been driving. In many ways there was an inequality of status. In the present year, International Women's Year, I suppose many people think I am referring to inequality of status as between females and males. Yes, that did exist, but that is not with what my motion deals. It is not its purpose.

I felt for years that there was an incredible inequality of status affecting public service personnel such as members of the armed services, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, members of parliament and senators, in that they did not enjoy equality of status with regard to their superannuations. I do not know; I suppose it goes back to old General Lafleche, or to the mid 1930s, when it was deemed wrong for public servants to draw two salaries or benefits from the Crown. For example, on appointment to the position of deputy minister of national defence, the public service salary of the general and his pension entitlement were fused into the one salary, because it was deemed wrong at that time that he should draw two benefits.

As I have explained previously, people who have served in the armed forces originally were completely prohibited from joining the Public Service of Canada and drawing superannuation while serving with the public service. It was held at that time that no double benefit should be paid to any public servant.

The principle was set aside when members of the armed services, and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police up to and including the rank, or its equivalent, of warrant officer class 1 were allowed to retire on full pension and enter the service of the Government of Canada without any diminution or merging of pensions. But this did not apply to those of commissioned rank in either of the forces who wished to serve in the Public Service of Canada. If the position taken in the public service meant that the pay in the public service was more than the pay applicable to the rank of the employee at the time of retirement, a formula for the diminution of the superannuation allowance was applied.

Strangely enough, although it applied to the Queen's service in the right of Canada, it did not apply to the Queen's service in the right of a province. Therefore a great number of highly trained people, trained at the expense of the Government of Canada, were forcibly diverted into the service of provincial governments. I do not say that the provincial governments lost thereby or that the people of Canada necessarily lost. But I do say that the Government of Canada by so applying the formula prevented many superannuates from the armed services and the RCMP from working for the Government of Canada.

Of course we could not have a member of the Public service of Canada drawing a pension if he gained employment in the armed services. No, that could not happen. The position was even more anomalous with regard to members of the House of Commons and the Senate who, because they were entitled to pension by virtue of service in this House or the other place, could not take employment in the service of the Crown of Canada without losing their pension entirely. Mr. Speaker, they lost it. I think there was a return of contributions when they died, although at one time the contributions were lost. That is how brutal it was at the beginning.

This provision was modified slightly. Strangely enough, a member of the Public Service of Canada could, on retiring and enjoying either a whole or partial pension, be elected to the House of Commons and maintain his pension, which would be paid over and above his parliamentary or senatorial salary—the latter case applying if he were appointed to the Senate. Is that equality of status? Hardly. There was no equality.

I should mention that many members of this place, being qualifed as lawyers, over the years were appointed to the bench and, with great distinction, carried out the duties of the justices of Canada in all courts under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice. Strangely, even though they might have served here for 200 years and built a pension entitlement, when they went to the bench the pension entitlement was gone. They could not draw the pension. Actually only in recent years were their contributions allowed as an asset to their estates. I tell hon. members that this, in recent years, has served to the grave disadvantage of many members of this House who accepted court appointments.

On the other hand, lawyers who were practising in the provinces, who were members of the law societies of the provinces and who were appointed directly to the bench had, in many cases while in practice built up a pension entitlement, annuity or additional income which allowed them to enjoy their position on the bench, when pay for the bench was not too generous, with a degree of ease which made them completely independent. They were completely independent and above temptation. But the member of parliament who went to the bench without any pension had a hard time. I have heard many members of the bench complain that, frankly, on their salaries they could not afford to live at the level at which judges are expected to live. They had no accumulated pensions. They had accumulated a pension while serving this House, but they had not had the opportunity to practice while serving as a member of parliament, and that was that.

I am looking for equality of status, Mr. Speaker. This bill will allow members of parliament, or of the other place, if they have entitlement to pension to merge it into the superannuation scheme of the public service if they join the public service.

I do not suppose that we shall frequently see a member of parliament joining the armed services on retirement from this House, although of course, there may be wartime situations, in which case this possibility would arise. I think it is highly unlikely, but there is always the possibility.

I am not sure that this act now provides for a member of parliament to go to the bench, take his pension with him and receive it, which he would do if he were to become a provincial judge. Remember, the levels of pay of provincial judges in some provinces are the equivalent of county court judges under the federal act. There would be a terrible anomaly created there. A member of parliament, highly suited to go to a district court, might say that because he is going to be limited to salary he will become a provincial judge rather than a federally appointed district court judge. There again I want to obtain an equality status in so far as those positions and the entitlements under the pension plans are concerned.

I have not been able to examine the detail of the Superannuation Act. However, in so far as it applies to females, when in practice I came across a provision which I called the gold-digger clause and I think it should be severely modified if not totally eliminated.

A member of the Public Service of Canada may in his senior years marry a second, third, fourth time or whatever it may be. He may marry a woman more than 20 years his junior. At the time of his demise, he may be retired, still married and cohabiting with his last wife. At the time of the death, because the wife is more tnan 20 years his junior, the superannuation she would receive under the present act would stand abated under a formula of so much for each year.

I have seen cases where in middle years a man marries a woman more than 20 years younger than he. They are married for 30 years. The second wife is a mother to the children of the first family. I know of one case where the children and husband say that the second wife was a far better mother and wife than the first. The man died at the age of 85. His widow was age 61. Under the Superannuation Act she was not entitled to the full widows' entitlement.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Because of the gold-digger clause. The marriage took place before retirement. Had the marriage taken place after retirement there would be no survivor entitlement. That is what might be called the ultimate anti-gold-digger clause. The other one is unfair. If the parties, regardless of the age difference, have been married for ten or 15 years and at the time of death they were cohabiting together, living as man and wife, the widow should receive the full entitlement of the pension.

I have also had drawn to my attention something that I trust will be caught here by reason of a combination of the Income Tax Act and the Superannuation Act.

At the time of the tax reform in 1971 the then minister of finance indicated that through tax treaties there would be an elimination of any advantage then existing whereby a public servant retiring to another country for reasons of health or domestic felicity would not have any tax withheld. Because of the tax treaty in existence there was no withholding tax of 25 per cent. Mr. Benson indicated that this would be wiped out. I remember him telling me that any public servant who had worked for Canada, retires, receives a pension and lives in the Virgin Islands or the Bahamas will have 25 per cent deducted from his pension. That was it. That is under way at the present time.

I want to find out from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) whether that philosophy is still applicable. Will a public servant of Canada, or a member of the armed services or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who is living offshore be immediately penalized by having 25 per cent of his superannuation held back regardless of the amount of tax that he is paying in the country of residence? That 25 per cent would certainly not be refunded to him even if he paid a further 25 per cent in the country of residence. He would be paying 50 per cent of his pension for income tax. That was not only a foolish, but a prejudicial and improper proposal by the government with regard to former public servants.

There are many other details in this bill. One could go through them almost like prayer beads because they are very detailed. However, the explanations will come about in committee. As the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, the appropriate agreements can be reached so that this bill will go to a staff relations oriented committee where the necessary studies can be made and then have the bill referred back to this House and passed during this session of this parliament.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out, this is a bill of 89 pages and 106 clauses. Therefore we are hardly going to deal with it in detail at this second reading stage.

I am glad that the earlier commitment to let this bill go to the special joint committee that is dealing with public service matters is going to be honoured. That committee has held many sittings. It is seized of problems in the public service. I think that it is the proper body to deal with this legislation, much of which does relate to public servants.

• (2130)

In introducing the bill the parliamentary secretary pointed out that in some respects it is a housekeeping bill, a bill which includes many technical changes, the purpose of which is to correct anomalies that inevitably occur in the various pieces of pension legislation on our statute books. Although I shall have some critical things to say when I point out certain anomalies that have not been corrected, and even though I shall object to some of the things that are being done in the bill, I say that, on the whole, a good job has been done in making progress in our superannuation legislation, having regard to the various pensions that come under the aegis of the federal government.

I think it is appropriate that in this year that has been identified so often as International Women's Year special emphasis is being put on establishing equality of status between men and women. I am glad that the bill not only asserts that in fine rhetoric but also carries the principle forward in certain precise situations. I shall come in a moment to one or two instances in which equality has not yet been established as between men and women, but I suppose it is still a cardinal rule around this place that if we make progress at all, even though it be slow, this is something to be welcomed.

I am glad that the parliamentary secretary was able to report on the extensive consultations that have taken place with those who represent public servants, and that to a large extent the provisions in this bill have their support even if the bill does not carry out all of their wishes.

It may be just pointing to a small detail or two, but while I am noting what is good in the bill I welcome the fact that we are at the end of non-contributory pensions for judges and also that we are at the end of non-contributory pensions for retired prime ministers. As hon. members are aware, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) as a member of parliament contributes to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, but up until the present time he has made no contribution to the extra pension that he will get for being a retired prime minister.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And I do not think he should either.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Edmonton West says that he does not think he should.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Not the Prime Minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think that if a judge is expected to make a contribution to the generous pension that he gets, then the Prime Minister should do the same, and I am glad this requirement is in this bill. As a matter of fact, as the hon. member for Edmonton West knows, when the parliamentary secretary was speaking—or perhaps it was when the hon. member was speaking, I forget which—I made one of those suggestions that did not get on the record. Sometimes I think that what we should have in this place, at least for a day, is not a record of what is heard by the Hansard reporters but a record of what is said and not heard. At any rate, there was some suggestion made about lowering the age at which a retiring prime minister can draw his pension. So far as the present Prime Minister is concerned, I suggested that we could bring the age down to 50.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Careful, your slip is showing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think my hon. friend from Edmonton West agrees with me.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Philosophically speaking, of course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, philosophically speaking. We are not dealing in personalities at all. In any case, those are the points I wanted to make by way of stating my approval of the bill. As I say, I think those who have done the technical work on the bill have produced an excellent job, and that all of the various pension and superannuation statutes that will be amended by the bill will be in better shape when this process is over.

Since a good deal of what the parliamentary secretary had to say and a good deal of the emphasis in the bill deal with equality of status between male and female persons, I should like to say a few words about this particular aspect of the matter. It is true that there is to be equality on the contribution side, and I welcome this. Female employees in the public service will pay the same contribution as male employees, just as female members of parliament have been paying the same contribution as male members of parliament. There is also an attempt to establish equality on the benefit side, and I believe the details that have been announced go a long way in this direction.

I realize that when we are dealing with language, whether English or French, we have trouble with the use of the words "he" and "she". So we usually provide a general covering sentence or paragraph that says that when the act refers to "he" it can mean "she", that when it refers to "him" it can mean "her". I also note that although in most cases the language goes even further and accepts the fact that there will be female public servants who leave widowers, and that there will be female members of parliament who will leave widowers, when it comes to two offices in this country, that of the Prime Minister and the Governor General, as I read the legislation it is not anticipated that any woman will ever make it. I am really surprised that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is not here to object.

On page 76 of the bill there is reference to the possible death of a prime minister. I am not predicting it; I am just saying there is reference to it. Clause 88(2) provides:

> There shall be paid to any person who, on or after the coming into force of this subsection, is widow of a person described in subsection (1), if she was the wife of that person at the time he held office of Prime Minister—

There is no recognition that the Prime Minister might be a woman and might leave as a survivor a widower.

Then on page 81 of the bill we find the same thing with respect to the office of the Governor General. The possibility of a woman being governor general is not far fetched. A woman is Her Majesty's representative in the province of Ontario. Yet on page 81 we read this provision:

> (2) Where a Governor General dies while holding office as such, there shall be paid to his widow an annuity equal to one-half of the annuity that would have been paid to her husband if he had retired on the day on which he died.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is covered in the interpretations section.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I know that if we do have a female prime minister or a female governor general and one of them dies, the surviving widower will be covered by the interpretation section and by the rhetoric that is in this legislation. But since we found it possible to go further in all other cases and admit that there are going to be women public servants and women members of parliament, I think we might also admit that some day we might have a woman prime minister as well as a woman governor general in this country.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We have males and females enjoying equality of status and human rights.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend is quite right. The rhetoric is there. Legally the point is covered, there is no question. If we have a female prime minister who dies and leaves a widower, he will be covered. But the very capable persons who drafted this bill and do such a good job on these things just seem to have fallen into the expectation in this country that the Prime Minister will always be a man. I would gladly trade the man we now have as Prime Minister for a woman.

● (2140)

An hon. Member: How about Beryl?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us not be too specific. I am speaking philosophically.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That puts a low value on woman, though.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The more serious ways in which equality has not been achieved are perhaps two, and one of them is the point the hon. member for Edmonton West has already referred to, namely, in what he calls the "gold-digger" clause. I dislike using that phrase because it suggests right away that someone is trying to get something, but the hon. member is perfectly right in his contention that the provision we are talking about should be changed.

I am going to refer not just to a second wife who became a wife before the employee retired, such as the example already cited. I know of a case of a woman whose husband died just recently. They had been married for over 25 years after the husband had retired from the public service. There was no widow's pension for her because she married him after his retirement. To me, this is most unfair.

This situation runs through all our pension legislation including the Public Service Superannuation Act, retirement acts for personnel of the armed forces or the RCMP, members of parliament and so on. The only place that I know where a person having gone on pension and, marrying thereafter, leaves a pension to the widow is the veteran who gets a pension under the Pension Act. If that veteran's pension is 48 per cent or more, when he dies his widow gets a widow's pension under that legislation. The hon. member for Edmonton West suggested some things tonight that he knows I would not agree with, but on this point he was right, and I hope this can be looked at carefully in the committee to which this bill will be referred.

I would not want to open the door wide and make it possible for some lively young person to marry a retired public servant who is on a very high pension because she knows he is going to die within a few months. I do not mind establishing some time limit, but to make it law that there can be no pension if the marriage took place after the retirement, especially when we are moving toward early retirement, and especially now when so many public servants at high levels can retire at age 55 on full pension, if they have 30 years of service, and when members of the RCMP and the Canadian armed forces can retire in earlier years, I think the present practice is wrong, and that the provision needs to be looked at very carefully. I hope we shall do so in the committee.

The most serious violation of the equality of status as between men and women is one I have left to the last. I mean I have left this to the last of this part of what I am saying, and not to the end of my speech, so do not be misled.

This part of my speech relates to unfairness to women and to a piece of discrimination I think is the worst. I know it may take us a while yet to win this change, not only in respect of government pensions but in all pensions, but I think it is something that has to come.

I just cannot see the sense, the fair play, the decency or the equality of status in an arrangement under which you have a man and wife who have worked together, and I do not care which one has been in the home or which one has been out working, or whether it is both, building up a pension which happens to be in his name, and when he dies first her pension is cut to 50 per cent, but if she dies he gets the full pension.

I suppose there was a notion once upon a time that a widow could find another husband but that a husband perhaps needed a full pension so he could finance another wife, but this is not equality. I suggest very strongly that this has to be looked at, and it is time the government gave a lead in this matter in our own pension arrangements.

The members of parliament plan lets us do a little better for our widows than we have done for public servants' widows. We provide that their pensions will be 60 per cent, but the same story applies. A person can be a member of parliament for many years and build up one of these pensions, and he finally quits or gets defeated and together he and his wife have the joint pension. If the wife dies first he has the pension in full for the rest of his life, but if he dies first, despite all that she may have suffered because he was an MP, she gets only 60 per cent of the pension.

I have no illusions about the difficulty of winning the change I am seeking. I have no notion that this committee is going to solve this problem in the period between now and Christmas when I hope we will deal with this bill, but I think we have to start doing some work on it in respect of all of the pension plans over which the federal government has jurisdiction, and that applies to the pensions in the public service, the armed forces, the RCMP, diplomats, Prime Ministers, Governors General, judges, tax review board members, members of parliament and everybody else. I want to see the same thing in respect of private pensions too. I want to see the Canadian National Railways and the CPR start on this as well. I want this for pension plans generally.

The fact of the matter is that there are still quite a few pension plans around that do not have any widows provisions. This is really antediluvian, but there are still such plans, and there are plans with even less than 50 per cent for the widow's pension. But any difference at all is no longer valid.

Someone might want to suggest that this calls for more money on an actuarial basis. All right, let us put more money in. Let us not deny fairness because it would cost something to achieve fairness. Maybe someone will want to say that it would be a bit expensive to go for 100 per cent in either case. All right, let us settle for 85 per cent or 90 per cent. Let us provide that so long as the husband and wife are both alive the pension will be 100 per cent, but if one of them dies, no matter which one, the survivor draws 85 per cent or 90 per cent, instead of it being 100 per cent for the man and only 50 per cent for the woman. So long as we have that bit of gross inequality, and I think it is the worst one in the whole picture, we can hardly say we have implemented the fine rhetoric that is in this bill in respect of equality of status as between men and women.

Let me now move to some other things I hope we will look at in the committee. There are still a good many veterans around, certainly of World War II, and there might still be some around from World War I, who would still like to buy back their armed service pension credit for the purpose of their service in the public service. They were not able to do it at the time for financial reasons or—let us face the facts—these persons were in their late twenties or early thirties and not as conscious of pension requirements as they were a decade or two later.

The right is in existence, but what it cost now to buy back a pension credit for wartime service, and I am talking about veterans who served in the war and are now in the public service, is so astronomical they just cannot afford it. I hope this will be looked at. I think that is more important than some of the other things which have been dealt with in this legislation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is a toughie.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Edmonton West says this is a toughie, and I agree with him. In my view one of the issues he complained about and fought for was also a toughie, but he has won it. I did not agree with what he wanted, but this is his night to rejoice and not mine in that particular respect. I think that this right of the veteran with regard to his wartime service for pension purposes should be given a thorough review.

● (2150)

While I am speaking about veterans may I speak about Canadian armed forces personnel and Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel who have the privilege of retiring—in fact it is not just a privilege but is compulsory—at a fairly young age of 55, 50, or even in the late forties. When they have completed their tour of duty by compulsion they retire. Their pension arrangement at the point of retirement is not bad. At least it does not seem bad currently, but those who have been retired for a number of years think the present arrangements look pretty good compared with what it was at the time they retired.

However, retired RCMP and retired armed forces personnel have to wait until they are 60 years of age to get the benefit of the escalation of federal government pensions which is generally available. When that was introduced in the first place it was fixed at age 60 because that was the normal retirement age in the public service. Many public servants now can retire on full pension at age 55 and receive the escalation immediately. Some public servants retire at even a younger age. If it is for medical reasons they receive the escalation. But quite a few persons in the RCMP or in the armed forces who retire at age 48, age 50, age 53 or what have you must wait until age 60 before they can receive the escalation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If they retire on medical grounds they receive the escalation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I said that. If a man can get sick the day before he plans to retire, he can receive it in that way. He cannot get it after he has retired unless it can be shown that he was incapacitated due to service. My hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton asks whether that applies to members of parliament. Yes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And judges.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not sure about judges, but certainly members of parliament. It is a pretty general rule that the escalation does not begin until age 60. When one reaches age 60 he receives the full benefit of the percentage points accumulated over the years. If a person has been out for ten years and the cost of living has gone up by 50 per cent, then at age 60 he receives a 50 per cent increase in his pension that year, but he does not get anything back for the years in which he had to cope with the rising cost of living. There is no escalation in that case. I think this should be reviewed.

It is not unusual for me to raise this. I have raised it repeatedly with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), and have received dozens of responses to the effect that the matter would be given consideration, but it never seems to get any further than that.

With regard to escalation which is covered under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act which is being amended in some respects by this bill, I think the same arguments apply that apply in respect of the escalation of other pensions. I was not one of those who carried on or played any great part in the question of whether the escalation should be quarterly rather than annually. I felt that a few cents or a few dollars now or then really did not solve the problem but that the need was for more substantial increases in the basic amounts. However, once it has been established that some pensions are escalated quarterly then the persons who would get escalation only once a year feel there is discrimination and unfairness against them, and they are right.

The only pensions that are escalated quarterly now are the old age security pension, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan and war veterans allowances. The disability pension for veterans is not escalated. None of the pensions for public servants, the RCMP, or the armed forces is escalated quarterly whereas that is the rule, as I say, with regard to certain others. I think that should be changed.

Again, in relation to the whole gambit of pensions there is always a lag in respect of escalation. If you get an increase in January 1976 of 10.1 per cent, which is what retired public servants will get a couple of months from now, how is that 10.1 per cent arrived at? It is arrived at by comparing the average cost of living for the 12 months which ended on September 20, 1975, with the 12 months which ended on September 30, 1974. The cost of living in the later 12-month period is 10.1 per cent more than in the former period, so you get a 10.1 per cent increase in the pension in January 1976. But we are talking about a cost of living increase which took place in a period right back into 1974. In other words the formula that we now have means that we are always behind in the escalation of pensions.

This might not apply as much in this area as in respect of senior citizens—and I have in mind the old age security pension—but it still applies here. There also should be a special cost of living index that measures the actual cost of living experience of retired persons. The consumer price index now used, as put out by Statistics Canada, is a general one which covers the whole gambit of living costs, including many items that retired persons do not buy. We have been told from time to time that Statistics Canada is working on a special index. I think there should be one, certainly in respect of the old age pensioners. So, Mr. Speaker, I urge that some of these matters I have been speaking about be looked at in the committee. I have a few more suggestions but perhaps they had better wait until tomorrow morning. May I call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF CERTAIN CANADIANS OF ARAB DESCENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on October 30 when I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) about the surveillance of Canadians of Arab descent it was against a background of great concern about the inequity, if not iniquity, in having decent Canadian citizens smeared.

The outrageous and harmful article in the Globe and Mail on October 27 is but one of the efforts to malign the record and impugn the motives of one group of Canadians, namely, those who came themselves, or whose ancestors came from the Arab countries. The article itself was sufficiently disturbing, but the contradictory statements following it muddied the waters further. After discovering who Mr. Toupin was, the Solicitor General declared that the Arabs were not under surveillance, while security director Toupin was quoted in the same news item as saying they were. I am glad the minister reiterated his own view when he answered my question. Yet there is far from sufficient reassurance on this matter.

Four days after my question a young Canadian of Arab descent gave information on the CBC to the effect that he is being questioned by the RCMP. This young man, Ismail Munder of Winnipeg, declared that he was being interrogated about the PLO, the Montreal Olympics, and the Arab community. Mr. Munder claimed that he was being treated as a potential subversive. These are the young man's words. He is, I am sure, only one of many Canadians in this category. Therefore I am less than satisfied with what is going on. For many months I have heard of Canadians of Arab descent being watched, interrogated, and generally made to feel like second class citizens.

● (2200)

A good government in a good democracy must be ever zealous of the rights of the citizens and concerned lest the individual be made to suffer because of his membership in any linguistic, ethnic or social group.

Canadians of Arab descent, like all other Canadians have the right to be considered innocent unless and until they are proven guilty.

There is a far too prevalent tendency in this country and in the United States to degrade the word Arab and Arab peoples. It is subtly, and sometimes not so subtly, suggested that all PLO are terrorists. All Palestinians are PLO, so before long you get to the nasty implication that all Arabs are seen to be terrorists.

How many times, when the increase in the price of oil is discussed in the media, does one hear the expression "the Arab states have again hiked the price of oil"? Often this is followed by the use of the expression blackmail. Of course in OPEC are such prominent non-Arab states as Nigeria, Venezuela, Iran, Indonesia and Ecuador.

This same tendency to stigmatize and suspect whole groups is revealed in our government's immigration department. Time and time again when Palestinian leaders are invited to address perfectly reputable and respected organizations they are harassed, delayed, and made totally unwelcome at immigration centres and borders of this country. I spoke in the House some months ago about the treatment accorded Dr. Fayez Sayegh, a distinguished scholar and statesman, who was guest speaker at the annual meeting of the Canadian Arab Federation. This was as unnecessary as it was deplorable.

Of course any government has the right, indeed the obligation, to give thought to national security. In a world where terrorism is tragically too common there is a special problem. But it is wrong to assume that terrorism is unique to some frustrated Palestinian people. We know that there is much violence, and even in the Middle East it is not confined to Palestinians or Arabs. It is wrong to be snooping on decent Canadian citizens because their people came from an Arab country. Are our security people checking up on all Irish societies in this country because there is terrorism in Ireland? Surely not. But there is much snooping into Arab organizations in this country, which is reprehensible and indecent.

The Globe and Mail's sensationalist article has been injurious to many of the 90,000 Canadians of Arab origin with its reference to conspiracy, and students plotting this, and others scheming that. The minister, of course, is not responsible for the press, and the bias of the Globe and Mail on the Middle East crisis is too well known to warrant discussion. But I do call on the minister who, while often wrong, is still, I think, a well-intentioned man, to be just and fair in his treatment of Arab Canadians. I ask him to see that his security people do not trespass on the rights of decent Canadians because they happen to be related to people from the Arab world.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) may I say that I know that he has stated in his concluding remarks that the sensational article which appeared in the Globe and Mail is not the responsibility of the minister.

In response to the hon. gentleman's question I must repeat what the minister has already said, that is, that the RCMP has indicated that there is no plot among Arab Canadians such as imputed in the Globe and Mail last week. I repeat this, for I wish to make it very clear that I believe Canadians of Arab background are honest, hard working citizens, and their integrity and honesty should not be questioned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: Doubts of this nature cast upon any group in Canada because of ethnic background are most unfair and unjust.

However, as I am sure this House is aware, there has been an increasing amount of terrorist activity in recent years. This activity has not been limited to any one country. Indeed it would appear that no country is immune from these attacks. I am sure that this is of concern to all members of this House, and likewise to all Canadians.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has an obligation, through the RCMP, to ensure the security and safety of Canadians from these terrorist activities. The RCMP security service is in communication with all ethnic communities in Canada in an attempt to ensure that terrorist activity may be discovered before it can harm any citizen. It is part of the ongoing dialogue with people in Canada who may have information or who are prepared to co-operate in ensuring that terrorist elements are not successful in carrying out their acts in this country.

Although terrorist activity is not limited to any one particular time or location, the incident at the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich shows clearly that individuals or groups who favour these methods endeavour to select times and places which provide the greatest amount of publicity for their cause.

The RCMP security service is concerned about the possibility of terrorist activity at the Montreal Olympics, and therefore is taking every precaution to ensure that there are no such occurrences. They would be derelict in their duty as security officers, as would the Solicitor General, the minister responsible for the RCMP, if they did not proceed in this fashion.

The Solicitor General has stated publicly that the RCMP are aware of the existence of many individuals and groups who are sympathizers on both sides of the Palestinian conflict. As I have stated, the RCMP are always on guard against terrorism of any kind, and in this respect become aware of groups and individuals who are sympathizers to one side or the other. This is not limited to this conflict alone.

Once again I think it is most unfair and most regrettable if this story has cast a shadow of subversion, as has been described by the hon. member, on the many thousands of decent, law abiding Canadians of Arab descent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PROJECTS AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I think I may be setting a precedent tonight because I am bringing to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), through his very capable parliamentary secretary, a double barrelled question with regard to two matters of concern. One is the veterans housing program, and the second is a problem with regard to the disparity which exists between the war veterans, civilian war allowances and the disability pensions as they exist at present.

I wish I had time to bring forward a third question which relates to an editorial in the Globe and Mail. Some young whippersnapper had occasion to say that if the government was looking for restraint there are many areas under the Department of Veterans Affairs which could be curtailed.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Marshall: At some time in the future I would certainly like to be able to deal with that young whippersnapper and teach him what Canada is all about.

However, I wish to refer to the fact that as a result of the discontinuance of the Veterans' Land Act the government introduced two programs under veterans housing legislation, one as it applies to non profit housing, and one as it applies to some additions under the Assisted Home Ownership Program. As I have said many times before in the House, one of the things which is missing which I cannot understand is the availability of rehabilitation assistance for all Canadians. Whether veterans or not, all Canadians should be able to apply for loans and grants to rehabilitate their homes which are deteriorating because under fixed incomes they cannot keep up with the maintenance of those homes.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary will remind the minister, although I am sure he is aware of it, that somewhere along the line we have to influence the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson). We must convince him that it is a simple matter to introduce a rehabilitation program which would give veterans the chance to bring their homes up to a reasonable standard.

I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) is in the House tonight. I am sure he will recognize that when he was minister of energy, mines and resources we could have saved millions of dollars worth of fuel through good insulation for those homes throughout the country that had deteriorated. It would also have been a conservation measure.

I commend the government for bringing in improvements to the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act which mean that those veterans who are burned out and pre-aged have surpassed the disability pensions of those who were wounded and are receiving pensions under that criteria.

For example, a disability pensioner who is married and getting 75 per cent pension who has no other income gets $509.43, whereas his counterpart under the War Veterans Allowance Act gets $548.05. Besides that, the war veterans allowance recipient can get drugs for any disability, while the disability pensioner can only get drugs for the particular wound from which he suffers. In addition, the income of the WVA recipient is indexed quarterly while the income of the disability pensioner is indexed annually.

I have no quarrel with the Minister of Veterans Affairs or the government, but this points out that as a result of the amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act, for these men who have surpassed disability pension there has to be some way of resolving both pensions. The disability pensioner who has no other income has fallen behind and must be brought up, particularly today when inflation is hurting every fixed income pensioner in the country.

I appeal to the minister to have the Canadian Pension Commission and the War Veterans Allowance Board look into this matter. A disability pensioner who is receiving a pension from 5 per cent to 75 per cent and has no other income can qualify for a higher rate, but because he does not know this he is losing hundreds of dollars per year. I think the department and the minister should bring this fact to the attention of all disability pensioners in that category so that they may take advantage of what is available to them.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in replying on behalf of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). First may I deal with the question concerning the WVA group. I shall deal with disability pensioners and war veterans allowances. Actually, the hon. member raised two questions. I shall try to answer both.

I think the hon. member knows that the minister has held discussions with the officials of the commission, and a stuffer will be placed in the envelope with the monthly pension cheque in the very near future. This stuffer will advise that the quarterly adjustment affecting income ceilings for war veterans allowance may make possible increased WVA payments if application therefor is made. I think that is clear.

Canadian pension commission officials feel that all pensioners should be advised of these changes so that they can contact the Department of Veterans Affairs to determine if they are in receipt of maximum benefits. The minister would like to make it clear, in the circumstances outlined, that pension rates are based on the statute and not subject to change. Certain pensioners, however, if they have no other income may seek to have their pensions supplemented by WVA.

The hon. member gave notice of his concerns for people on war veterans allowance. I shall certainly be glad to bring his new ideas to the minister's attention. The hon. member should be congratulated on his concern for veterans.

The second part of the answer has to do with housing. I shall do my best to satisfy the hon. member. The question of adding to the veterans housing program a provision which would permit veterans, irrespective of their province or location within that province, to apply for assistance to rehabilitate their houses has already been brought to the minister's attention. I hope the hon. member will pardon me for going slowly. In a sense I am translating the document in front of me which is written in the first person.

The minister has stated that he will give the question his serious consideration. He would, however, like to add that in terms of priorities he believes he must delay consideration until such time as his recently announced program of special housing assistance for veterans is well established and he is certain that the machinery is operating effectively, to the benefit of those veterans concerned. In other words, he believes that consideration must await the time until he is able to assess the success of the special housing assistance for veterans program.

I may say to the hon. member that I myself have discussed this question with the director general of the veterans' land administration, who explained what is in the program. I think what he said would have pleased the hon. member. The minister wishes to add that such assistance as he has been asked to consider is of concern to his colleagues as well, especially as it would affect Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Such assistance goes beyond the provisions of existing legislation; therefore he will have to discuss the matter with his colleagues.

In summary, I can only reiterate that this matter will be given the minister's fullest consideration when he is certain that the present housing assistance program for veterans is fully and successfully operating.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House now being deemed to have been adopted, this House accordingly stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

PROPOSED PROHIBITION OF STRIKES DURING PERIOD ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM IN EFFECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion for immediate and serious consideration. Because of the fact that strikes and walkouts, particularly in essential services, continue to have an adverse effect on our economy, and as a result are a major factor in the continuing escalation of inflation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That this House instruct the government to incorporate into its anti-inflationary legislative program an immediate back-to-work rule for any striking groups or individuals within the essential services of our economy, and at the same time prohibit any further strikes or walkouts in the essential services for the duration of the controls period.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON PROGRAM TO AID NATIVES MOVING TO URBAN AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the many serious problems facing the thousands of Indian and Metis people who are now moving into our large cities, and in view of the fact that in 1972 the then Secretary of State, Mr. Gerard Pelletier, committed the government to a five-year program of $25 million for migrating native people, and in view of the fact that a large part of this program has not yet been delivered, including $11½ million allocated for administration projects, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urge the government to act on this matter without delay.

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER ACCOUNT FOR FACT STANDARD OF LIVING IN CANADA HAS DETERIORATED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of a report by the prestigious Conference Board of Canada that in 1968 when the Prime Minister first assumed office Canada had the second highest standard of living in the world, and that in 1975 Canada had slipped to eighth position and the prediction that by 1985 Canada will have become seventeenth in the world in this regard, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the Prime Minister, at the earliest opportunity in the House and while he is on his current tour explaining why he reversed his 1974 position on controls, give an accounting to the Canadian people of the circumstances involving his presiding over our country's steadily eroding position and the basis for this lamentable state of affairs, and whether or not he is prepared as our Prime Minister to accept any of the responsibility.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week the Prime Minister said in the House that the apparent success of the Postmaster General would hopefully relieve parliament of the responsibility of acting to end the Post Office shutdown. Since there is no prompt settlement in sight and the shutdown is now three weeks old, will the government now introduce legislation to restore the postal service to Canadians which will provide a further period for resumption of negotiations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clarke: On Tuesday the Prime Minister said:

> At some time the right of free collective bargaining has to give way to intervention by parliament when we judge that the public disservice caused by a strike outweighs the freedom of the right to strike itself.

How long will the country have to wait before the Prime Minister and the government decides that the public disservice outweighs the freedom of the right to strike?

Mr. Trudeau: That is a matter of judgment.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REASON FOR PAYMENT OF EMPLOYEES ON STRIKE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the House why, after threatening the union and the country with a long strike, the government has arranged to have workers paid for work they did not do, and will this practice continue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into the question put by the hon. member.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION IN VIEW OF FAILURE OF UNION TO CONSULT MEMBERS ON SETTLEMENT OFFER

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): I did address that question to the right hon. Prime Minister, and now I will address another question to him. Last night the union's executive decided against putting the government offer to the membership, thus effectively precluding any way of accurately knowing whether the membership wants the strike to continue. Under such circumstances, is it still government policy to let the strike continue indefinitely?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the word "indefinitely" was used by the hon. member as it was used by his colleague a moment ago, I told the House it would be a matter of judgment when parliament will be asked to bring in legislation to have the postmen return to work.

Mr. Fraser: Is the right hon. Prime Minister advising the House that the government has not precluded from its options the possibility of back to work legislation?

Mr. Trudeau: That is obvious from what I said a few days ago.

[Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra).]

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO STIMULATE HOUSING STARTS AND LOWER PRICES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that 60 per cent of the increase in the consumer price index for October was attributable to housing, and in view of the fact that Mr. John Boyd, the president of the Canadian Real Estate Association, stated yesterday that the government's new anti-inflation program will sharply reduce sales activity in the housing industry and that the present give-away program under the guise of stimulating housing demands is totally impracticable, and if you want people to buy a house, lower the price, what steps will the Minister of Finance take to meet these two important problems of increasing the housing starts and lowering the price of homes?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Actually, Mr. Speaker, I notice in the CPI statistics that the higher home ownership charges are largely attributable to an average rise of over 13 per cent in residential property taxes, one of the prime contributors to the increase in all items of CPI. I would remark to the hon. gentleman that these are some of the consequences of the very high settlements in the public sector which are coming home to roost with us in the higher taxes that the whole community has to pay. It really was for the purpose of restraining those kinds of settlements in the public sector, as well as others in the private sector, and increases in rents, prices and profits that we brought in the over-all control program.

POSSIBILITY OF MEASURES TO COMPEL FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS TO DIRECT FUNDS INTO MORTGAGES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): The Minister of State for Urban Affairs has said that he expects the financial institutions to co-operate with the government and to allocate an additional $750 million into the mortgage market in 1976. In view of the fact that this spring the same minister in committee gave assurances that he had persuaded the financial institutions to put an additional $1 billion into the mortgage market this year, and in view of the fact that according to the minister's officials only $300 million of this amount was achieved, does the Minister of Finance intend to introduce measures to compel the financial institutions to direct more funds into mortgages, or does the minister share the naive hopes of his colleague?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we think that effective persuasion can be brought to bear on the lending institutions, bearing in mind of course that we also seek from the same institutions support for provincial and municipal financing as well, and there has to be a balancing of financing activities in Canada.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE BUILDING OF RENTAL UNITS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the statement in this morning's Globe and Mail by A. E. Diamond, chairman of Cadillac Fairview Corporation, in which he predicted very little new rental apartment construction will be undertaken as a result of Ontario's rent control legislation, and that less fortunate people will be the sufferers as a result of this legislation, will the minister assure us that he will increase the new capital budget of CMHC for 1976-77 and that CMHC will build rental apartment units, if necessary, to ensure that there will be a sufficient number of rental units to take care of this serious problem?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not completely agree with Mr. Diamond's statement, or at least the Globe and Mail's interpretation of it. I met with builders and lenders last night, and have every assurance we are going to have the support we need in bringing on more rental accommodation. However, in addition to that, because much of the money will be coming from the private sector, we are allocating some half a billion dollars specially for increased rental accommodation, low income accommodation, non-profit and co-operative housing, senior citizens, native people and all Canadians who are socially deprived.

MIRABEL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DATA ON WHICH SKY SHOPS AWARDED FRANCHISE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the questions raised about the awarding of the concession at Mirabel to Sky Shops Export Limited, and in order that the people of Canada may be assured that they and their government have received the best possible return for this very valuable franchise, will the minister table in the House the calculations on which he says the interdepartmental committee awarded the franchise to Sky Shops?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will examine what material is available and determine whether that would be the best technique or whether at the committee on estimates we can thoroughly go into the matter. I will certainly look at what is available.

Mr. MacKay: I urge that the minister seriously consider this request, and if he does not table them, I think it will be taken that these calculations cannot stand up to scrutiny by any reasonable persons—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacKay: —for reasons which would transcend any departmental meditation.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTED MONITORING OF FOOD AND HOUSING PRICES BY BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the consumer price index today indicated that food as well as housing were the major factors in the upward increase of almost a full percentage point in the cost of living figures for October, and in view of the fact that the present legislation embodying the government's anti-inflation program contains no provisions for controlling either food prices or housing prices, I ask the minister what steps the government is taking in the interim, while the bill is before committee and subject to amendment, to have the Anti-Inflation Board monitor price movements in food and to establish whether these prices are in fact justified?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I could correct the hon. gentleman, I draw his attention to Bill C-73 and point out that the construction industry is in fact subject to the provisions of the anti-inflation program. With regard to food prices, my understanding is that the board, and particularly the vice-chairman of the board, retains an active interest in and attention to these particular increases.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF PRICE FREEZE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In order to gain the consensus of Canadian people on this program, which is so essential to its success, is the government considering imposing an immediate freeze, based on the experience of British Columbia, which would make the program at least appear to be just and equitable, not only to wage earners, but to everyone else?

● (1120)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course what is involved in food prices as in other things, and as has been indicated by the study of the Food Prices Review Board, which has been supported by the hon. member opposite, food prices increases have been the result of real costs coming through farm production in Canada and imports. In that sense, a freeze now would only postpone for several months for the consumers in Canada, additional costs they will have to meet. As I understand it, higher beef prices and pork prices contribute to this. The fact of the matter is that these commodities have in short supply, and while we have every hope this will be recovered in the months to come, there does exist the fact that prices are under pressure at the moment.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTED SUBSIDIES FOR ESSENTIAL FOOD ITEMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that some of the major increases in the area of food are within our power to control, for example, dairy products and bread, as well as beef, pork and milk, would the government consider restoring some of the consumer subsidies for some of these essential food items in view of the fact that the present program will not in any way control these prices?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. gentleman to the statements of many of his colleagues insisting that government expenditures be reduced. It seems to me there is a balance in this and that we could of course drastically reduce prices through a very substantial payment from the public treasury. The question is whether we should increase government expenditures for the purpose of doing so. We have decided they should not be increased beyond those at the present time.

MANPOWER

ISSUANCE OF WORK PERMITS TO UNITED STATES RESIDENTS FOR CONSTRUCTION WORK IN SARNIA AREA—CONSULTATION WITH UNIONS CONCERNED

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and results from the decision by the Department of Manpower and Immigration to issue nearly 1,000 work permits to United States residents to fill construction jobs in the Sarnia area. Can the minister assure this House that all Canadian manpower centres and construction unions in Sarnia, London, Windsor, Hamilton and Toronto were notified by manpower officials of those job opportunities before the work permits in question were issued so that unemployed construction workers in Canada qualified to fill these vacancies were not overlooked?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Sarnia project is a sizeable one. We do estimate a shortfall from Canadian sources between now and next spring of about 970 workers. The estimate is based on thorough consultation with the unions in Sarnia and with the industry. There is strong concurrence by all the parties to whom we have talked. There is a close and continuous liaison between manpower officials and union representatives at the national level regarding this and other such major construction projects to ensure that there is continuous dissemination of job vacancy information across the country. I am informed that the Sarnia locals of the principal unions concerned also send continuous and up-to-date information on job opportunities to their counterparts through their hiring hall system. All CMCs are continually seeking workers, through the national network with the skills concerned. In this particular case, we did concur after being advised by both union and management that temporarily there was no other solution. I want to check with a more direct contact with the Toronto and Hamilton unions as to just what more can be done.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—COMMITMENT OF PROVINCES TO PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Finance. It is now some three weeks since the Prime Minister outlined to the provincial premiers the government's so-called anti-inflation program and two weeks since the Minister of Finance met with provincial ministers of finance. Has the government yet received a specific response from each of the ten provinces on the very fundamental question which provinces are now committed to join the federal program or to adopt parallel guidelines to the federal program? I am referring specifically to those areas peculiarly within provincial jurisdiction.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have received definitive responses from Ontario and Quebec. I think it is fair to say that other provinces have indicated their willingness to participate in the program in general. Several of them have reserved for further consideration some of the problems to be met. We hope to have from them at an early date the sort of firm confirmation we have had from Ontario and Quebec so that we may go ahead with the plan on this basis. Officials propose to meet on the 19th and 20th of this month for the purpose of discussing the program. I shall suggest a ministers' meeting after that. We hope that the provinces then can indicate to us definitively their willingness to participate, either with a proposal such as Quebec's, that is, with their own programs for the public sector, or by opting in to our program, as Ontario proposes.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—COMMITMENT OF QUEBEC TO FEDERAL GUIDELINES—POSSIBILITY OF VARIATION BETWEEN PROVINCES IN GUIDELINES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister indicated that he received a firm response from the province of Quebec, can he tell the House if Quebec has given the commitment that it will follow the federal guidelines, or is the province reserving its position to establish its own guidelines within jurisdiction it is reserving unto itself?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would want to examine the exact terms of the Quebec bill, which was introduced, I think, the day before yesterday. Generally, I understand that the Quebec system would follow the federal guidelines in this respect. They recognize and indicated at the federal-provincial conference that, so far as possible, disparities between the Quebec system and that of any other province should be kept to a minimum.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I want to put a pointed question to the Minister of Finance, who said he received a commitment of some sort from Quebec. Is the minister asking this House and the country to support a system of controls which is to be uniform across the country, or is it to be one which may well vary from province to province, not only in Quebec but in other provinces as well?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asked me a precise question, and I would want to make certain of the wording of the bill before giving a precise answer. If, indeed, he wanted the answer this morning, he might have given me notice of his intention to ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What an excuse.

Mr. Baldwin: You should not have been so glib with your first answer, then.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—SUGGESTION PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD TAKE OVER NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As the Postmaster General stated that he has in the offer he made to the postal workers exhausted his mandate from Treasury Board, which the union has now rejected, will the President of the Treasury Board agree to take over the negotiations, as the Treasury Board is legally responsible for collective bargaining with all federal public servants?

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON OFFERING FULL COST OF LIVING CLAUSE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. [Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we feel that offering postal workers the Moisan report was most generous. I feel also it is an extremely adequate offer which would warrant their return to work and provide them with highly satisfactory living conditions.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As the Solicitor General indicated more than seven months ago in a committee of this House that the government was considering participating in a federal-provincial conference on crime and policing, can the minister tell the House if a date has been set for the conference?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. Preliminary discussions have been held with the provinces but, so far, there is no agreement to go ahead with such a conference. On the other hand, at a recent meeting with attorneys general and other provincial ministers we discussed other ways of combating organized crime.

● (1130)

Mr. Lawrence: Would the minister be good enough to tell us whether a formal meeting of that nature would be held before the introduction of the government's peace and security legislation package.

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I am sure the hon. member knows, repayment begins at the end of the five-year period, starting with the sixth year. PEACE AND SECURITY LEGISLATION—NUMBER OF BILLS AND POSSIBILITY OF SEPARATE BILL FOR CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General has publicly announced that the government's peace and security legislation will probably be introduced by the end of this month. Can the minister now state whether this legislation will be in the form of one, two or three bills? More importantly, has there been a decision on whether capital punishment legislation will be a separate bill or included with other amendments?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe we said that we would announce the measures, hopefully before the end of this month. With regard to the second question, while there has been no final decision, I must repeat what I said the other day. I said that it is likely the capital punishment measures will be in a bill separate from other matters relating to gun control and other Criminal Code amendments.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF LEASE EXTENSION TO SKY SHOPS AT DORVAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. As the minister knows, the hon. member for Central Nova sent him some documents on Wednesday with regard to the Giguère matter involving Sky Shops, which the Solicitor General kindly acknowledged. Has the minister had an opportunity to study those documents? What action does he intend to take? In particular, can he tell us today of the conclusions he has reached as a result of the study and investigation with regard to those documents?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, after receiving the documents and looking at them, I referred them to the RCMP to get their opinion as to whether there should be further investigation of this. They are examining the documents and will report to me in due course.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In view of the importance of those documents with regard to the whole matter, will the minister undertake to the House that he will speak to the RCMP specifically to have that report as soon as possible? I ask this in view of the circumstances of this particular matter.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, that is what I just said. The very day I received the documents from the hon. member, I referred them to the RCMP and asked for their opinion on them.

ARCTIC BAY AND GRISE FIORD—REQUEST FOR DELAY OF ORDER TO CLOSE—POSSIBILITY OF CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. As in approximately one week's time the air force bases at Arctic Bay and Grise Fiord in the Northwest Territories will be closed by an order of the Ministry of Transport in Winnipeg, the order being basically that they will not allow planes to fly in at night, and as there will be total darkness in about one week at these points, which will have a devastating effect on these communities, can the minister assure the House that he will personally intervene to stop the closing of these airports, at least until a better plan can be worked out?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the plan with regard to the airports at Grise Fiord and Arctic Bay was very carefully related to the safety requirements of the area. In the case of Grise Fiord, the landing at night is hazardous because of the hills in the vicinity of the airport. I think that the safety measures quite properly limit that form of landing. Provision is being made for a lighted airstrip on the ice as soon as that is available for landing. The report I received yesterday is that the ice is now 18 inches thick and, therefore, capable of handling planes. The gap, therefore, between the stopping of night flying into the airport and the commencement of night flying on the ice should in fact be very short. It would, of course, be ideal if no delay existed. However, I hope that hon. member will agree that the application of safety measures to the landing of craft, certainly commercial craft, is important and ought not to be lessened.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, we all agree that the application of safety measures is important. However, in talking with people of Resolute Bay, they advise that the safety of the airstrips has never been in question. There has never been any accident in that area. According to the people of Resolute Bay, there will not be any commencement of flying until some time in the first part of January. If this is true, does the minister have a contingency plan to bring in supplies to the more than 500 people in those areas which will be virtually cut off until the planes can land on the ice?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, contingency plans were being looked at in the event that the ice formation was a lot slower this year than is normally the case. However, the report I received yesterday indicates that is unlikely to be true. Our information is that landing on the ice should be indeed possible by about the middle of November. I really think that hon. members ought not to say that conditions are safe when the expert analysis shows there are significant hazards. Already standards are pushed as close to the limit as possible. It is rather strange that if, as a result of permitting flying, accidents occurred, members would be up on their feet with great vigour protesting that we allowed flying under those circumstances.

TRANSFER OF FOOD STOCKS FROM LOBLAWS TO ZIGGY'S—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF JUSTIFICATION FOR PRICE INCREASE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday I raised a question in the House in which I indicated that prices in supermarkets in the Sudbury basin were going up as much as 50 per cent. Now, we have a report that one of Canada's largest supermarket chains, Loblaws Limited, is engaging in the practice of changing the name of some of its stores in order to jack up prices. Will the minister consider having his department investigate whether, and under what circumstances, the food which was left in the Loblaw's Pickering Farms store at Yonge and Yorkville Streets, Toronto, which closed October 18, was transferred to Ziggy's, another subsidiary of Loblaws, and whether the 20 per cent mark up is justified?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can respond by saying I saw the same report as the hon. member. We reported this to the Anti-Inflation Board this morning with the request that they investigate it.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—APPLICATION OF PRICE AND PROFIT GUIDELINES TO ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A supplementary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. A Loblaws representative has been cited as saying that as other Loblaw stores became uneconomical they might be converted to Ziggy stores, with resultant higher prices. Under the government's anti-inflation legislation, for the purposes of wage guidelines associated companies are lumped together with respect to the 500 employees. Is this the case, also, with respect to the price part of the guidelines? In other words, do Loblaw's Pickering Farms, Ziggy and Loblaws all have different price-cost and profit structures and will they be considered as one company or as separate entities for the purpose of price guidelines?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): It would depend, as with all corporate entities, on the nature of the operation. With some we will be able to have a cost pass-through test and with others we will not. In the case of the distribution of business we shall be examining the gross profit margin and determining whether there have been unreasonable mark-ups and for that reason, therefore, whether orders should be made requiring them to roll back prices.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has now had a chance to look into the question I put to him last week in reference to the case to be heard before the federal court concerning some apprehension as to whether Marshall Crowe, the chairman of the National Energy Board, shows any sign of prejudice because of past involvement in other matters?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have now had a chance to review the matter with my officials and it is the intention of the Attorney General of Canada to participate in those hearings. My officials have been instructed to prepare submissions to be made on my behalf. But it would be premature to make a final decision as to the nature of the position to be taken until November 13, which is the date on which interested parties can move to put in further evidence on the matter.

Mr. Woolliams: It seems strange to me that the hearings are continuing to proceed. I am sure the Minister of Justice has had experience in court when there has been a challenge to a judge because of prejudice. Is the minister going to allow the hearings to continue while the position of the President of the National Energy Board is being challenged as to possible prejudice?

Mr. Basford: I do not think it is my role either to start or stop the hearings. My role is to try to assure that the Attorney General is represented in a federal court hearing in a proper way and that we intend to do.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

TAKEOVER OF WESTINGHOUSE BY GENERAL STEEL WARES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS AND EXTENSION OF TIME LIMIT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): A question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. Can the hon. gentleman advise the House as to the state of negotiations between the Foreign Investment Review Agency, Westinghouse Canada Limited and General Steel Wares Limited regarding the take-over bid of General

Steel Wares for the major appliance division of Westinghouse Canada and use of the Westinghouse name?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have met personally during the last five days with all the major participants in this particular transaction, namely, White Incorporated, Westinghouse Canada and Westinghouse U.S. as well as with GSW. All these meetings were designed to bring about some sort of satisfactory settlement which would be protective of the jobs and the industry in Hamilton. I would ask the hon. member to appreciate that there is a certain degree of confidentiality attached to these matters and I think it would be detrimental if I were to breach it now. But I can say to him that meetings between the parties will be continuing, I believe on Tuesday of next week, and that in the meantime we remain ready to offer our good offices in any way we can. The parties are now talking among themselves, which was not the case a week ago.

Mr. Kempling: I thank the minister for that reply. I appreciate that the negotiations are confidential and I would not wish to prejudice the outcome. Can the minister advise us whether a further extension of the November 8 closing date has been negotiated with General Steel Wares and Westinghouse Canada if it would assist in bringing the matter to an acceptable conclusion.

Mr. Jamieson: I discussed this matter first thing this morning and my answer to the hon. member is this: since the parties have agreed to hold discussions next Tuesday I would regard it as being a natural assumption that there is a continuity of the arrangement.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—PARTICIPATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): May I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Mr. Speaker? Can the hon. gentleman, with his stated willingness to negotiate and extinguish native land claims in British Columbia, advise the House whether the government of British Columbia has belatedly realized that any settlement of land claims would require their participation, and, second, can he tell the House whether any concrete progress has been made in negotiations with British Columbia regarding the land settlement problem?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The answer to the first part of the question is, no. The Province of British Columbia has not accepted the fact that it has a role to play. In answer to the second part of the question, I had a good meeting with provincial ministers last May but since then they have been indicating that there is just no movement on the thing and we are making no headway whatsoever.

[Mr. Kempling.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

REASON FOR DELAY IN APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY MINISTER OF DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. When will a deputy minister be appointed to the Department of the Secretary of State and what are the considerations which have led the government to leave this position vacant for up to seven months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer to the second part of the question is that the acting deputy minister, the assistant deputy ministers, are doing a good job and they know they will be assisted soon by a permanent deputy minister.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE SOCIAL PROGRAMS NOT CUT UNTIL OTHER BUDGETARY CUTS MADE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my question two days ago, the Minister of Finance said that prior to presenting a new budget there would be cuts in social programs to fight inflation. I now ask him whether he can assure the House that there will be no cuts in vital social programs until there have been budgetary cuts by eliminating waste, inefficiency and duplication in other programs—

Mr. Baldwin: And extravagance; don't forget extravagance.

Mr. Grafftey: —and cancelling such services as Information Canada, general information services of the government and consulting fees?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman will find if he looks back that I did not say social programs. I can assure him that the vital social programs which we have put forward, and which from time to time have been supported by hon. gentleman opposite, will be continued.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall certainly bear in mind the various programs the hon. gentleman would like to see cut out, though as to his suggestion we might cut out information services, I would remind him that hon. members on the other side have often told us that the government is not giving enough information. However, the hon. member seems to hold an opposite view.

Mr. Baldwin: We want the truth!

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question. I must say I read the minister's statement of two days ago and it was reported that social programs would be cut.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Grafftey: Since there is general agreement at this stage that low income people will be primarily hurt by the restraint program, will the hon. gentleman assure the House that these social programs will not be cut until there is elimination of waste along the lines I have suggested?

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly the question the hon. member has just asked and which was answered by the minister.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

APPLICATION FOR GRANT FOR CROCUS FOODS—DATE OF APPROVAL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF RELEVANT DOCUMENTS AND CONSULTATION WITH MEMBERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the application Manitoba has made for the funding of approximately $2 million for a whey plant at Selkirk to be known as Crocus Foods, may I ask whether the minister has approved the application, or, if he has not, whether he will make public all the documents related to this project since the milk producers of Manitoba are not in favour of it.

● (1150)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I must assure the hon. member that we did study this report lately. I think we will be in a position to announce our views on that particular subject in a few weeks.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer that the file is presently being studied, will he give an undertaking or an assurance that he will also be consulting with various elected members of this House in respect of the program and the representations they have received from their constituents?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member there has been consultation and that we did indeed receive representations from several hon. members. When we have reached a decision and the hon. member has been advised of it, if he then feels that the decision is unfair, he can then keep on asking questions.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSIONS—REASON FOR REDUCTION IN PENSION OF SPOUSE RECEIVING WELFARE

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister in view of the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As the people of 65 and over have just had their pensions increased because of the cost of living indexation, as a result of which their spouses who are on welfare see their old age security benefits decreased, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government is willing to discuss that situation with the authorities of the province of Quebec with a view to righting that injustice?

[English]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have always been prepared to discuss any such matters with counterparts in the province of Quebec.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FAILURE OF FRANCE TO INVITE CANADA TO ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING—ALLEGED RELIANCE ON OTHER COUNTRIES TO PRESENT CANADA'S CASE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have now had an opportunity to examine closely the replies given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday to questions raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, from which it is clear that our ambassador in Paris, the former Minister of Communications, has so far failed to communicate, not on bended knee, as he suggested, but with head erect, stating Canada's case, as our right to attend such a conference. Therefore, my questions are these. Is it now Canada's policy to rely on intermediaries such as the United States, Germany, Britain and Japan, as he mentions here, to state our case, or are we prepared to make our own? Does he not construe from this recent turn of events that this is evidence that the success being claimed by this government in its efforts to improve relations between France and Canada is really pretty much of a failure?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to clear up one point. It was not I who suggested the bended knee, it was the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert who introduced that colourful expression to the discussion. We are not relying on others to make the case for us, although we appreciate their assistance. In respect of the representations that have been made by other countries, there is obviously involved a question as to whether the host country has the right to decide the membership of the meeting, quite apart from the wishes of those others who may attend.

Mr. Baldwin: Like with the PLO.

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest there is quite an important issue involved for countries like the United States and the United Kingdom in that point, in addition to the desirability of Canadian representation at the summit conference. We have already made our wishes clear to the French government through our representative in Paris. We believe we are entitled to be present at that summit on our own particular merits and not because other countries want us there. We believe we have a contribution to make.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Now the second question.

Mr. MacEachen: We believe that Canada's economic position justifies our presence at that summit.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about the second question?

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ARRANGEMENT FOR DISTRIBUTION OF CHEQUES IN VIEW OF CONTINUING POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services.

Has the government provided for an emergency plan to distribute socio-economic cheques if the postal strike continues?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, for two weeks now my department has made the necessary arrangements to forward the inside mail of the government, and the essential mail all over the country. The plan works satisfactorily.

As for payments to our suppliers, more particularly those who operate a small business, cheques are also distributed satisfactorily.

To answer the question about socio-economic payments, I must say that a plan does exist, but it is not yet in operation.

Concerning more especially the old age security and family allowances, we expect to be able to do the distribution across the country, but as we may not locate all claimants and because the distribution of those cheques does have humane connotations, I intend to invite all hon. members to an information meeting, on a regional basis, in order to make our intentions known, improve our plan and ask for their co-operation.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH OF PANARCTIC AIRCRAFT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Justice prepared to announce today the decision on the long delayed and long awaited independent inquiry into the Panarctic air crash?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I said the other day, I have had an opportunity of considering the accident investigation report and the recommendation of the coroner's jury which heard this matter. After consultation with my colleagues, and bearing in mind the importance of aviation in the north, the strong recommendations of the coroner's jury and my responsibility for the administration of justice in the Northwest Territories, I have decided to order a public inquiry under the Inquiries Act into the circumstances surrounding the crash of the Panarctic Oils Limited aircraft at Rae Point, Northwest Territories on October 30. I am presently engaged in working on the terms of reference and the appointment of a commissioner, and this will be announced later.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON BRIDGE PROMISED FOR GLENWOOD-HILL SPRING AREA

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In light of the fact that the CPR informed me over four months ago that a bridge would be provided in the Glenwood-Hill Spring area in order to facilitate the movement of grain, and in light of the fact that this has not even been started, will the minister assure the House that every effort will be made to have this situation corrected immediately?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think there may be a requirement and a role for the Canadian Transport Commission in relation to the bridge on this particular line, but I will look into the matter.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR LIST OF HABITUAL CRIMINALS OR SEX OFFENDERS ON TEMPORARY ABSENCE PASSES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General but he seems to have disappeared.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Reynolds: In view of the fact that we have had a number of people out on parole who have committed crimes in the past year, would the minister be willing to table in this House a list of all the people who have been out on temporary absence passes in the past 12 months who have been classified as habitual criminals or dangerous sexual offenders?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am a bit confused by the question. At first the hon. member asked me about people on parole, and then he asked about dangerous sexual offenders. I can provide him with certain lists and certain information, but I should like to be clear as to what he wants.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, the list I want is a list of all those who have been on temporary absence or parole in the past 12 months who are classified as dangerous sexual offenders or habitual criminals.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Even if the question were—

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, dangerous sexual offenders are not allowed out on temporary absence passes, and they are only paroled after very serious consideration by the Parole Board.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I am sorry to interrupt his discussion with the hon. member. Following the high level meetings of the Public Service Commission held on Monday and Tuesday at Montebello would the hon. gentleman share with this House the interesting and important decisions taken at that conference and conveyed by correspondence to the Prime Minister by Mr. J. J. Carson of the Public Service Commission.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will discuss this with the minister through whom the Public Service Commission is responsible to the House. I have not followed this conference nor have I seen the correspondence to which the hon. member alludes. I thank him for apologizing when I was speaking to a lady.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, in sharing the right hon. gentleman's esteem for the hon. lady may I pose this question to the minister—

An hon. Member: Simmer down, Simma.

An hon. Member: Watch your heart. You will have a stroke.

Mr. O'Sullivan: I have always admired calm and control. Might I ask the minister responsible for the Public Service Commission if he has discussed with Mr. Carson the decisions taken at this conference and will he now advise the House just what happened at Montebello on Monday and Tuesday.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): The Public Service Commission reports to the House of Commons through the Secretary of State who is absent from the House at this moment.

[English]

Mrs. Holt: I hardly expected, Mr. Speaker, to be in this House and to see the young gentleman, the handsome man in the grey suit, join the ranks of the front row of Neanderthals. I regret that fact. I am here, gentlemen, as a member of parliament and not as a lady of any description.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the matter should proceed any further. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) in fact raises a very valid point of order, that is, it has been a long-standing policy of this House that all members be referred to by their constituency—all members equally—and this is a policy that should not be forgotten.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, next Tuesday, in cities, towns and villages across Canada, our citizens will stand in hushed silence while a senior veteran utters the words: "They shall not grow old". For more than half a century Canadians have paused at the eleventh hour on November 11 to pay tribute to the Canadian men and women who laid down their lives in the service of our country. This is a very special day dedicated to those who died, not just for us but for all those who will follow us.

I feel it is a hallowed day. It is a day when the guns boom in slow and solemn cadence. It is a day when the muffled drums beat their muted rhythm. In the background we hear the sorrowful strains of the piper's lament. The skies are usually cold and grey, befitting the melancholy spirit of the day. Old veterans and young people lay wreaths and are momentarily united in a mutual tribute of sorrow for all those young Canadians who lie in warriors' graves so far from home. Sometimes, in the silence, a small child cries or a dog barks. The sounds are sad, but somehow in keeping with the mood.

Next Tuesday is November 11. It is Remembrance Day in Ottawa and across Canada. It will be marked as the day that honours and mourns the valiant dead who paid for our freedom. The greying veteran will end his recitation of the act of remembrance with the words: "We will remember them".

Mr. Speaker, may I close my remarks to hon. members of this House with the words of Kipling: "Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet—lest we forget, lest we forget".

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say that we join in the very moving tribute the minister has paid to our fallen in two world wars. We agree with everything the minister has said, because while Remembrance Day is a time for remembering, it is also a time for veterans who survived those two world wars, the members of the Royal Canadian Legion, the Navy, Army and Air Force Association, and all veterans organizations, to promote the idea among our young people and all Canadians that today is the time to act. While we remember the past, we must act today so that we may have a peaceful and rewarding future, because so many forces within our society are gnawing at and tearing down the things we cherish most. While we are remembering is the time to act in other to save our future.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, may I say we agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). The minister himself is a reminder of the commitment made by those who served this country in time of war.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: We agree with him that we should ever remember the reason the commitment was made, and those who fell in the wars. This is a time when I believe Canadians want to remember the wars—there have been many, and there may be others—but they should also remember the reasons for that service and the contribution made by those who were so young, many of whom did not return. We in the House have an obligation to the families of fallen veterans and to those veterans who still remain. May we contribute by remembering them and their families at this time.

● (1210)

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in order to commemorate Remembrance Day like other parties in the House, I wish, on behalf of my party, to pay homage to those who have fallen in the last wars. Today we are commemorating the memory of those who were killed in action. I think that all of us here in the House have a very special reason to do so, as I do not believe that there is a single hon. member who has not lost a relative or a friend on the battlefield. As for me, one of my brothers was killed in Germany. Upon hearing the minister say: "Lest We Forget", I felt that we should pledge ourselves to keep their memory alive, to try to uphold the cause of those who have fallen, namely the cause of peace. In my view, this would be the finest token of gratitude towards our late friends, brothers and relatives who have died so that we may live. Thus, something vital would be done to ensure peace for our country. Fortunately, we have been protected and have not known war in our country, but I think we must be watchful if we wish to preserve the peace which we have experienced. I think that we must now increase our vigilance. It is therefore an honour for me to join the previous speakers in pointing out the importance of November 11 in memory of our servicemen killed in action.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS AND STANDING ORDERS

Concurrence in seventh and eighth reports of Standing Committee—Mr. Loiselle (Saint-Henri).

[English]

The Clerk Assistant (Legal) read the reports.

Mr. Speaker: The reports referred to in the motion of the hon. member were tabled a moment ago. Such a motion can only be made at this time with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member shall have leave to propose the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I am agreeable to the motion being accepted, but in the case of IAC I see absolutely no reason why there should be a return of the penalty which is being imposed. This has always been done in cases where individual hardship has been involved, but in my opinion IAC does not fit into that category. I am therefore opposed and would be prepared to debate the question of the return of the money.

Mr. Loiselle (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, let me make a clarification. We have imposed the penalty as usual. The hon. member said that we would prevent the company paying the penalty. The situation is otherwise; the penalty has been imposed in order that they be amalgamated.

Mr. Peters: May I ask the hon. member a question? I understood the Clerk of the House to read that section 91(3) had been applied and that the petition and the acceptance in the other documents, including the provision under section 91(3), had been returned.

Mr. Speaker: I would like the House to be on the right track so far as our procedures are concerned. We are now on motions and a motion has been presented. It can be adopted now only with the unanimous consent of the House. If there is to be a debate, it will have to be deferred. In any case, the question of the hon. member, which may be a valid one, may be answered after careful examination of the report, in which evidently it is stated that no return of the penalty has been made. Is this understood and agreed?

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

OLYMPIC GOLD COINS

Question No. 3,063—Mr. Jelinek:

1. How many Olympic gold coins will be minted with (a) ½ ounce of gold (b) ¼ ounce of gold?

2. What is the proposed date for the coins to be available to the public?

3. What is to be the duration of this programme?

4. What will be the surcharge on each coin?

5. Who will be the official gold coin distributors in (a) Canada (b) United States (c) Europe?

6. What will be the seignorage from both coins?

7. What portion of the seignorage will be available to COJO?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. The number of gold coins to be issued will not exceed 1 million in total. The ratio between ½ oz. and ¼ oz. has not yet been decided. It is understood that the face value of the silver and gold coins is not to exceed $450 million face value. It is also understood in accordance with the original Olympic Coin (1976) Act that the profit will not exceed $250 million.

2. The coins will probably be available to the public on an order basis by April or May 1976.

3. As per the Coin Act the duration of the program will not go beyond December 31, 1976. This however does not preclude orders being placed in 1976 and fulfillment possibly taking place in 1977. It is not our objective to become involved with this particular timing situation.

4. Pricing of the gold coin is probably $10 over face value of the uncirculating 14K coin and possibly $50 on the proof 22K coin.

5. With respect to naming official distributors it is not possible to do so at this particular time. We will probably use the existing network of distributors, but again this has not been finalized as yet.

6. Seignorage for the coins can only be determined on the basis of the price of gold on the days designated for the costing of the gold. This refers to the last five days in the month of February 1976. When the cost of gold and other factors are determined we would be in a better position to advise of the seignorage.

7. The portion of the seignorage to be made available to COJO would be the total sales value less marketing and manufacturing costs as is the case with the silver coin program.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—GROSS REVENUE DERIVED FROM SECOND-CLASS MAIL

Question No. 3,104—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

In each of the past three fiscal years, what was the gross revenue derived by the Post Office Department from second-class mail?

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): In thousands of dollars, 1972-73, $14,899; 1973-74, $15,007; 1974-75, $14,968.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—CONTRACT FOR TOBOGGANS

Question No. 3,164—Mr. Reynolds:

With reference to a contract awarded January 16, 1975 to Magline of Canada Limited, Renfrew, Ontario, for the supply of toboggans at a cost of $215.54 delivered to Lancaster Park, Alberta and $211.65 delivered to Montreal, Quebec, how many were shipped to each location and what was their size and specifications?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as DSS is concerned, a quantity of 1,204 toboggans was to be delivered to Lancaster Park, Alberta of which 356 have been shipped, and 1,500 to Montreal, Québec of which 304 have been shipped. Regular shipments are continuing. The toboggan is 80 inches long and 22 inches wide and is manufactured in accordance with Department of National Defence Specification CDA/DID/Unit 5-1-2.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—SECURITY DEPOSITS

Question No. 3,249—Mr. Reynolds:

1. In the past five years, how many companies have refused to tender with the Department of Supply and Services because they were required to deposit securities by way of certified cheque?

2. Would the Minister indicate the necessity of security deposits realizing that at times firms have been reluctant to tender because of lengthy holdbacks on the return of security capital?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. As was indicated in the reply to question 1,996, security deposits are seldom required. Therefore, the Department does not record the number of companies who have refused to tender because they were required to deposit securities by way of certified cheque.

2. Pursuant to Part VI, Section 39 of the Government Contracts Regulations, security deposits are required only when it is considered essential as a means of ensuring that a bidder will accept a contract if he is the successful tenderer.

RAIL COMMUTER SERVICE

Question No. 3,296—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What progress is being made towards establishing a rail commuter service between Windsor Junction and outlying areas and the metropolitan community of Dartmouth and Halifax?

2. On what date will a final decision be known?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. On July 30, 1975 the government announced a Capital Assistance Program to Commuter Services. Under this program the government of the province and the municipalities concerned after agreeing to an urban development strategy would apply for assistance to implement a commuter service in support of such a strategy. Since the initiative for proposing a commuter service between Windsor Junction and outlying areas and the metropolitan community of Dartmouth and Halifax rests with the province no decision will be made until an appropriate application is received and approved.

Hon. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

● (1220)

[English]

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND VARIOUS STATUTES TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN PENSION CONTRIBUTIONS, BENEFITS, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury (for Mr. Chrétien) that Bill C-52, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act, the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Judges Act, the Tax Review Board Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) reminded the House that I had said in the House, and I had also reached agreement with the House leaders, that if possible, and with the agreement of the House, Bill C-52 would not be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates but to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. I should like now to ask unanimous consent for that alteration to be made to the reference.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion put forward by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp). Is it agreed?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I raised a query as to whether the terms of reference setting up the initial special committee with regard to employer-employee relations would be sufficiently wide for that committee to receive Bill C-52. I was assured that the matter would be examined and if the House leaders were satisfied that all was in order, I was perfectly satisfied. However, I want to be satisfied that such reference is proper, because it seems to me that when a special committee is set up, it is for a particular purpose, unless that purpose can be broadened. I would like to see it broadened because I think it is the right committee. Let us make sure we have the proper motions in position and that procedural difficulties are cleared up.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), with his great care for seeing that things are done legally and properly—which is very essential in this House with this government—has raised a very valid point. However, so there can be no error, I suggest that the terms of the motion might be extended so that the committee will in any event be considered to be given by this House the authority to receive this particular bill and to consider it. Then there can be no doubt that there will be authority.

I think the hon. member has in mind that the committee might be functus officio. If that were the case, he would be right. We could rectify that if the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) provided in his motion that for the purpose of reference of this particular bill it would be assumed that the committee would receive such authority as might be required to consider the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has, in effect, just said what I had in mind. Is it not a fact that to refer a bill to a committee is in itself to give that committee a term of reference? For example, there is nothing in the set-up of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates which says that it will receive a bill on superannuation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is a standing committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a standing committee to deal with such things as are referred to it. When we refer a bill to a committee, that itself is a term of reference. If the committee did not exist, a problem would face us. But the committee does exist. It seems to me that if the House, particularly by unanimous consent, agrees to this we are in effect giving that committee this bill as a term of reference.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House is obviously of a mind to amend the motion directing this bill to the committee. I could take the concern about the term of reference under review, but my initial reaction is to conclude that the passage of the motion, as amended, with the direction that the bill be sent to an existing committee, does in fact constitute a term of reference by this House that the committee study the bill. However, if I were to conclude differently before a vote is taken on this motion, I would certainly return to the House to say so. In the absence of that, I propose now to ask whether it is the pleasure of the House to adopt the change in the motion of reference, so that the motion will read that the bill be read the second time and referred to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Ipso facto.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, during the first part of my speech on this bill, which I gave last evening between 9.30 and ten o'clock, I indulged in the nice things which could be said about it, and there are favourable things to say about this bill. I also spent some time speaking critically in the sense that I was pointing out things not in the bill which ought to be there. These related to improvements in the pensions of public servants and others who come under the aegis of the federal government. Even though in much of what I said last night I was speaking critically, the general feeling of the House was that the changes I was suggesting should be considered, if not immediately then certainly somewhere down the road. In other words, the 30 minutes of my speech last night was the pleasant part. I left for today a part which might not seem so pleasant, at least to some hon. members in this House.

I regret very much, especially at this time when restraint is being proclaimed, that there has been included in this bill a very generous increase in the provision of pensions of members of parliament, members of the Senate, cabinet ministers and others. Some might say to me that all this bill is doing is relating our pensions to the amount of our indemnity, and because our indemnity has been raised, therefore it is appropriate to raise the potential pensions which are payable to members of parliament. However, the fact is that in a potential way this bill is increasing the pensions of members of parliament by 33⅓ per cent. I use the word "potential" because one's pension has to be computed on the six-year average. But that is the general effect of the bill, to increase the pensions of members of parliament by 33⅓ per cent.

I said a moment ago that one has to have in mind the six-year average, but it is also a fact that the pay provisions of members of parliament passed earlier this year include escalation of 7 per cent in January, and so on down through the years, so that the total amount of pension which is available to a member of parliament is on the move. It keeps going up. At the present time, the maximum pension a member of parliament can draw is $13,500. That requires 25 years service, of course. That maximum will go up, according to today's pay scale, to $18,000.

I am glad my hon. friend, the member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), is here so that he can put in his objections, just as I did not agree and muttered my objections last evening when he pressed so hard for the right of members of parliament to draw their pensions and also to draw salaries in the public service at the same time. That is in this bill. I do not happen to agree with it, but one has to lose some battles as well as win some. I point out that a 33⅓ per cent pension increase is overly generous. I point out, also, that under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, for ten years' service one gets a pension of 35 per cent of the average of his six best years. In the public service, it takes 17½ years to get 35 per cent. I point out, likewise, that for 20 years' service in this House one earns a pension equal to 65 per cent of the average of his six best years. It would take 32½ years in the public service to reach that level of 65 per cent.

● (1230)

Finally, I note that in the House, with 25 years' service one reaches a pension equal to 75 per cent of the average of his six best years. Of course, that 75 per cent level is never reached in the public service; the maximum there is 70 per cent for 35 years.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thirty years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, 35 years. In 30 years he gets only 60 per cent. Madam Speaker, I do not think we should ask for it both ways. I do not think hon. members should ask for a generous formula that builds up our pensions faster than all the other pension plans in this bill, and also expect that we should get the full pension advantage of the higher rates of pay that this parliament passed a few months ago. There is no question about what I would do if this proposal stood by itself as a bill to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. That is the way it ought to have been done. As has happened before, it has been put into an omnibus bill which contains many things that we favour, as well as this point that some of us thoroughly oppose.

I would point also that as on a number of occasions after there has been debate on members' pensions, members will admit that there are some things in it that are too generous, particularly the right to draw pensions after six years of service, no matter what one's age. But nothing is ever done to correct such abuses. Let me carry it to the absurd. It would be possible, under the act we now have, for a person to be elected at age 18 and to be here six years, then at age 24 to draw a pension for life based on those six years of service. The likelihood of that happening is slight.

Mr. Baldwin: He would probably die a lot sooner.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But there are cases of former members who qualified for a pension going out in their late thirties and forties on pensions for life.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, and I can think of the shabby treatment some received, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, there has been shabby treatment, and before this plan came into effect a lot of members of parliament were treated shabbily. We never covered such former members in any bill to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. I remind hon. members that when the Curtis report was presented to us some years ago, it called for the pensions of members of parliament to be deferred to age 55. As a matter of fact, everything in the Curtis report was accepted but that one point. Many members said afterwards that we should not have rejected that recommendation and that the next time this legislation was under review, we could change it. But none of those examples of generosity are being cut back in this legislation. Instead, it accepts all the generosity that is there and provides for this general 33⅓ per cent pension increase as well.

I submit that in these days, when we are being called upon to accept and to proclaim restraint, when we are asked to give leadership in this area, we should not in the same year, 1975, do the things that we have done, namely, provide substantial increases in our pay and allowances and also improve greatly the pension plans available to us. I accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Edmonton West that members of parliament should not be treated shabbily. That used to happen. There is nothing in this plan, however, to which the word "shabby" could apply. It is far too generous, and I hope that in the committee to which this bill is being referred we can take the time to look at its provisions in light of the leadership that the country expects from us at this time.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I was very happy to hear the resolution that this bill is being sent to committee. It is very important that it goes to the committee which is so concerned about other aspects of the public service. In that committee we also considered the superannuation of public servants who have reached the age of retirement. I think it was a very good thing. I was a little concerned, when the debate began this afternoon, about the propriety of the suggestion that we might refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada to decide whether the committee was right. That has been resolved, and I am pleased that was the decision of the committee. I believe the committee is the appropriate place to discuss such matters.

I am prepared to admit the difficulties with respect to the omnibus bill that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has mentioned, but the committee is equipped to discuss the bill rationally. I am certain, since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a member of that committee, that the matters he has raised will be discussed in great detail. Since its inception, the committee has indicated its willingness to deal with these questions as a matter of balance.

In that committee a few days ago we were speaking about the role of legislators in describing certain matters and rights that have been given to public servants and others by statute. I think it was Senator Robert Stanbury who said that the legislator's role in that context is to balance the equities that exist and the differences that exist. I would suggest it is not fair to equate the position of a public servant, a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or a member of any other group who will benefit from this legislation with the position of a member of parliament. That would be unfair to members of parliament. The roles are different, the life is different, the problems are different, the obligations are different, and the circumstances in which they find themselves at varying periods of time in their professional lives as public servants or members of parliament are different.

As Senator Stanbury said, the job of the committee will be to balance those equities, to look rationally and honestly into the differences in the lives of the people involved. Whether for public servant or member of parliament, those pensions did not come about through avarice; they came about because the decision was made with respect to the different functions they perform. It is the same with the pensions for judges and lieutenant governors. I think consideration is being given to what men and women give up for a public life as opposed to other ways of life.

I say these things in response to the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I think that even he will recognize that there are differences. I share his concern about including these matters in an omnibus bill. Perhaps in some instances the practice of legislating omnibus bills is bad. But it has not been done for any improper or unreasonable purpose. This is an omnibus bill because it is convenient to consider these matters in such a bill. This is a busy House, as one can see by looking at the order paper.

In the circumstances, I am pleased to see that this matter is to be referred to the committee previously mentioned, where we can deal with the issues raised in this bill, issues concerning the pensions of public servants, members of parliament, judges, senators and others. There will be ample opportunity to debate these matters in committee. Frankly, I want the committee to consider the general question of pensions. What is a pension? We must look at some anomalies involving pensions. For instance, some people can leave one part of the public service and gain employment in another without loss of pension benefit. They carry their pension with them. I understand that if members of the armed services or of the public service, including the diplomatic service, are elected to parliament they receive the benefit of their pension. They have earned that benefit. But others in society are not granted similar benefits. I am thinking of men and women who serve in parliament and who, because of their experience in public life, are offered appointments to the bench. One could say that they can refuse. I suppose everyone has the opportunity to refuse almost anything—except the ability to eat and breathe. People have the opportunity to refuse, but I want to see some consistency in the treatment of pensions.

If the committee concludes that a pension is earned, it should not be lost in any circumstances except death. I know there are provisions governing death benefits. In no circumstances should the pension be taken away if we consider it as earned. If we are prepared to give this idea lip service and pass legislation governing some pension benefits, I suggest we should take a good look at other sorts of pension benefits.

Yesterday evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in a speech I enjoyed, mentioned the case of members of the armed services who because they do not take advantage of a certain provision within a specified time limit are penalized with respect to pension benefits. In other words, they are deemed by statute not to have a right to something they have earned. The committee will need to examine this kind of provision to see how it affects members of the armed services who take employment with the public service of Canada.

We must also consider whether superannuation should not be related to the best years of employment instead of the last years of service. I am thinking, for example, of the men and women employed in the aircraft operations groups of the professional institute. Their work is intense, physical and debilitating and there is the danger that they cannot maintain peak performance throughout their professional careers. I think that is an occupational hazard. I am sure that other groups in the public service are in the same position. I want the committee to consider whether superannuation should not be calculated on the basis of the best years of service instead of the last years.

I am glad to note that the government is attempting to remove differentiations as between salaries paid to men and to women for the same jobs in the public service of Canada. This attempt, being made in International Women's Year, is sound and I support the provisions of the bill which go in that direction. This is a large bill, with 106 clauses.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And 89 pages.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The bill is complicated and important. I am glad the government has seen fit to bring it forward now. I hope debate on it will be short; therefore I will say no more. I think much of the debate will take place in committee. I am sure that because we pride ourselves on being fair-minded we shall consider the equities of the matter which are important to hon. members and to certain people whom we represent. As I say, I think the debate should take place in committee and I commend the government for bringing the bill forward at this time.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I was pleased to learn from the exchange earlier this morning that the bill is to be referred to a committee on which I serve. As has been said, this is an omnibus bill. I have always been afraid that omnibus bills are not proper, that there is, shall we say, something the matter with them. I am under the impression that the government has introduced this omnibus bill in an attempt to tidy up certain matters which have been left hanging. In short, it is a housekeeping bill, although a complicated one. I am pleased to learn, therefore, that we shall be given the opportunity to examine it more fully in the Standing Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

I hope there will not be any need to refer this matter again to that committee if it should happen that because of the committee's present preoccupations it cannot deal with this matter before the end of the present session. I understand that committees, special and otherwise, die at the end of a session and must be revived in a new session. I see several members of the committee present in the House. I hope, therefore, that the reference of this matter to the committee will hold good in the next session and will be continued in the next session, if that should prove necessary, so that we can deal with this particular matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The bill itself is a reference.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): This morning I want to deal with two aspects of the bill. As the royal recommendation suggests, the purpose of this bill in part is to provide equality of status for males and females. That may be a tribute to the present year, International Women's Year, but it does not go far enough. I feel it is mere lip service—at a time when "LIP" is not the most pleasant expression to use. I mean that it is merely a verbal accommodation of a principle which we are not really incorporating into law. I maintain, Madam Speaker—and here I enlist your support—that there will be no equality of status in these matters until it is fully recognized that in a case in which a pension is involved, the surviving spouse who may not have been the breadwinner has exactly the same rights as those which would have been enjoyed by the breadwinner if he had survived. They are the same as enjoyed by the breadwinner when he survives.

● (1250)

As hon. members know—I have mentioned this in other debates—if the spouse should die, the breadwinner normally carries on with a 100 per cent pension, whereas the non-breadwinner in a situation of that sort suffers a 50 per cent reduction in the pension she may draw or the superannuation payments to which she is entitled. I do not think that is equality. One of two things should occur. It stands to reason that at the age when the pension or superannuation falls due normally, whichever spouse survives is in no position to carry on with a reduced pension. The breadwinner can easily carry on with the full pension.

In the traditional situation, the man has been the breadwinner and has made the contributions. If he should be the survivor, he will receive the 100 per cent pension. However, if the breadwinner husband should die, the wife is left with only 50 per cent. She is in a more difficult situation when she has her income reduced in this manner. I suggest that this is not a sincere effort to provide equality of status as between the two sexes.

I would like to see either 100 per cent continued for the surviving spouse or some other figure. I am not prepared to state the figure; I cannot work it out actuarially or in terms of domestic economics. Possibly 75 to 80 per cent should be the proportion of pension left to either surviving spouse whether it be the breadwinner or the non-breadwinner. I suggest this is the equality we should be working toward.

The element of transportability of pension earnings from one area of the public service to another, whether in uniform or not, is good and I welcome it. I am the beneficiary of superannuation payments as a result of my service in the public service to which I managed to add my war service. This totalled 30 years. It may amuse you, Madam Speaker, to learn that if by chance it had not been to the House of Commons that I was called, but to the other place, I should have had to lose the pension I had earned over those 30 years. The reasons are legalistic. It is wrong that that should be the case. As a result of the superannuation benefits to which I contributed during my 30 years of service, I was able to carry on during that period when the salaries and indemnities in this House were not as great as they are at present. Otherwise, I could not have done it. I recognize the advantage I had at that time.

There are other matters in the bill. As I say, transportability is a fundamental principle that we must incorporate. There must be more tidying up than is done in this bill. There are other matters which have not been dealt with at all. I agree it would have involved a longer bill, but I think that the mysterious 85 formula which is used in the armed services and the public service has to be re-examined. I look forward to re-examining it more closely in the committee on which I serve. Naval officers—and that is a proud term—are obliged to resign their commission after 25 years' service. They are deprived of the increments and the full benefits of pension they might have had if they could have continued on to 30 or 35 years to make up this mysterious 85 formula.

As my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) just mentioned, we must define what is a pension. This takes me back to equality. The contributions that the breadwinner makes to his pension are really contributions from the family budget. The whole family suffers to the extent that his contributions reduce the take-home pay in any given week, month of year. They do not object. However, I think they should be considered as family, rather than individual contributions. That would get us closer to the concept of equality.

I have never been able to get this straight in my mind: does the government make its contributions as the individual or family contributions are made, or are they only made from the consolidated revenue fund at the time withdrawals have to be made for the public servant? I look forward to the discussion we shall have on this particular measure when it reaches our committee.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND CERTAIN PROVISIONS TO DECEMBER 31, 1981

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion) moved that Bill C-74, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members of the House are well aware, the Regional Development Incentives Act first received assent in 1969. Since that time it has been an important element in the regional development policy of the federal government. The purpose of the bill now before parliament is to seek a five year extension of the act; no other changes are being proposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset that I hope this bill will be passed quickly, since it will help to settle some pratical matters that are relatively urgent. The existing act will expire on December 31, 1976, and although there is more than a year to go, the fact is that the applicants who have accepted offers must by then have reached the stage of business production in order to be entitled to payments. In the case of large projects, it often takes over a year before production can start. The expiry date of the existing act is already being felt and serious potential applicants have some misgivings.

Although most members of this House are quite familiar with the Regional Development Incentives Act and its administration, I should like to outline briefly a few highlights of this act.

The incentives provided by the legislation can take the form of grants, guaranteed loans or refundable grants aimed at promoting investments and creating employment in depressed areas. More specifically, they are designed to encourage companies to establish new plants and extend or modernize existing manufacturing or processing establishments. Their obvious purpose in the long run is evidently to succeed in reducing regional disparities and achieving stabler economic growth in the country.

● (1410)

[English]

I should report, Mr. Speaker, that as of last August, the latest period for which complete program statistics are available, the Regional Development Incentives Act had helped to stimulate some $2.4 billion in capital investment in slow growth regions—investment expected to create about 122,000 direct new jobs. To this end, some $507 million in grant offers have been accepted since the inception of the program.

As a result of a major policy review undertaken in 1973 by my predecessor, the Hon. Don Jamieson, certain changes were made in the regulations governing the administration of the act. On the whole, these changes were designed to improve the decision-making process on smaller cases and to establish an administrative framework consistent with the decentralized mode in which my department now operates. There is now good reason to believe that these changes have led to a more smoothly functioning program, one that works even more effectively in concert with other elements of DREE policy.

I want to say, in this regard, Mr. Speaker, that it is important to realize that the RDIA is an integral part of the government's total approach to regional development. As most members are aware, the key element of that approach is found in the general development agreements which have been signed with each of the provinces except Prince Edward Island, which is covered under a similar comprehensive development plan. These agreements carefully spell out a joint federal-provincial strategy for economic development in each region which is aimed at taking full advantage of the inherent economic potential of that particular region. In this context, RDIA serves to complement industrial development by encouraging general industrial development which supports that broad development strategy.

Mr. Speaker, using RDIA in conjunction with the general development agreements provides, I believe, an effective basis for improving economic and social conditions in Canada's slow growth regions. It is equally important that I stress there are no unique solutions to these problems, no conventional wisdom which serves as an all-purpose guide to economic development in every region. It is for this reason that I stress the paramount importance of the flexibility built into our policy approach, an approach which requires, above all, the creative development of the opportunities at hand in each region.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to state in this House that, through these amendments, this program is working more smoothly and is better integrated into the department's general policy. I have no doubt that members of the House will make every effort to adopt this legislation without delay so that the implementation of the regional development incentives program will not be interrupted.

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the minister, and we have no intention of prolonging the time this House will take to consider Bill C-74. We realize we will have the opportunity when it reaches the committee to consider this and other aspects of the DREE program. We understand, of course, that in the usual fashion the minister will be there taking part in the discussions.

I believe the minister is determined to maintain the high priority this government has put on DREE. Certainly, DREE's role is becoming a little more nebulous now and its priorities must be looked at in view of the fact that the whole economy is slipping and we are now in a period in which very shortly we shall be subject to a type of control and ground rules for business which have not previously existed and probably were never foreseen in 1969-70 when the DREE program was in its infancy. We have noted, and I believe it is fair to say that this is partly in response to suggestions we have made from this side of the House, that the minister has taken a more flexible approach. He has decentralized the department and changed the emphasis on growth centres. He has taken steps to avoid some of the worst abuses that DREE suffered in its earlier days, which were criticized severely by many academics and others.

I should like to think the minister will continue to search for new ways to make DREE a more effective and more beneficial program for the disadvantaged areas of the country. It is my hope that he will continue to explore all possibilities of co-ordinating DREE policy with transportation policy and needs, and I hope he will try ot use DREE funds as much as possible to promote long-term, worthwhile projects. One of the most beneficial aspects of the DREE program has been that part which is directed toward the construction of infrastructures because there, at least, we get something for our money and the economic benefits are there to accrue in years to come.

There are a few problems which perhaps are not touched on specifically in the connotation of this bill. What happens, for example, to companies which were granted aid under the old act? Will they have the deadline extended also, or will they still be required to be in commercial production by December 31, 1976? How many such companies are affected? I think we are justified in asking why there is a need to change this deadline from December 31, 1976 to, December 31, 1981. Is there some study or survey which indicates that this particular deadline is advisable, or has this been done more or less on a hit-and-miss basis?

Let me take this opportunity to suggest to the minister and to put on the record that he should seriously look at the possibility of extending the definition of "industry" to include service and tertiary industries and not merely manufacturing and processing industries. This concept bears looking into because it is particularly hard these days, as the minister well knows, for the people who desire to get into business to pay the very high interest rates which exist and to solve the other complications that have been constantly accumulating over the last few years.

There are many areas such as my constituency where we have a heavy industrial base and a lot of service type industries could be brought into existence, but they do not qualify for aid under DREE. Whether or not some of these industries ought to receive assistance is a question that can, of course, be put in the capable hands of the officials in the regions charged with evaluating the practicality of such assistance. On the other hand, if the definition were enlarged to give a slightly wider scope to this type of application, I think there are many industries in which additional jobs would be created and economic benefits would arise therefrom.

Let me say to the minister again that we on this side of the House wish him well as he gradually becomes more familiar with the many details that comprise his very important portfolio. In the Atlantic region of Canada, in particular—of course, not to the exclusion of other areas of the country—we are looking at DREE constantly to see how it can be of positive benefit to us.

● (1420)

We hope the minister, even with a change in economic climate and the new conditions I mentioned earlier, will be constantly urging his colleagues to give DREE a high priority and continue to try to have DREE extended in the most wise and beneficial way. I know that from time to time he will listen to the suggestions we put forward from this side of the House and evaluate them in a constructive and open-minded way.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I too extend my congratulations to the minister on undertaking his new responsibilities. I assure him of the co-operation of this member and of my colleagues in an attempt to attack the very difficult problem of regional disparity. I wish him well in his new ventures.

When this bill comes before the committee I will have some constructive suggestions to put forward in respect of how we can improve the attack on regional disparity. I would ask the minister to attempt to expedite the answers to some questions I have on the order paper, which would enable me to make a more meaningful contribution to the committee. I have about 12 questions dealing with the department, and while they are comprehensive I would appreciate any effort he could make to obtain the answers before we go to committee.

My feeling is that the federal government should not simply content itself with giving a department such as DREE a limited degree of authority. It should establish machinery which would produce co-ordinated results and which would, in terms of regional economic development, co-ordinate the policies of all departments and bring into focus all departmental policies on the problem of regional disparity. When I speak of departments I think particularly of the Department of Transport and the Department of Finance following the same policies as DREE.

It is really not enough for us to ask other parts of Canada to spend large amounts of money in our area through DREE and then have other departments work contrary to these policies, be they freight rate policies, fiscal or monetary policies. It is this total focus which I think could make a very valuable contribution as part of Canada's policy to solve the problems which exist in all parts of Canada, particularly in the maritimes and some parts of Quebec.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of co-ordinating efforts within departments of the federal government. It is also necessary to co-ordinate the efforts of the federal and provincial governments, especially in the Atlantic region. The three maritime provinces have improved their machinery for inter-provincial co-operation, but we are still a long way from a plan of development for the region in which each provincial government and the federal government would play a co-ordinated role.

Let us first go back to May, 1968, and review the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) words on regional inequality, spoken at Moncton when hopes were high and before disillusionment set in. He said:

> I am convinced that the need to strike at the roots of regional economic disparity in Canada is one of the absolutely top priorities of any Canadian government.

He was enthusiastic then, riding the waves of Trudeaumania. Perhaps he did see all Canadians on the way to becoming full participants in his "just society". But now, almost seven years later, if he still has that vision he possesses far better eyesight than we poor mortals in the Atlantic provinces.

DREE should get away from the idea that its only responsibility is to provide industrial incentives to entrepreneurs who wish to move into the Atlantic area, or to local businessmen who want to expand their present operations. DREE should be doing far more than that. It should be looking hard at the big jobs here crying to be tackled. For example, what has DREE done about the Fundy tidal power project which is linked with the building of the Chignecto Canal? I would wager nothing. It is very convenient for the government, whenever Fundy is seriously mentioned, to be able to pass it off to a study, or a commission, or a committee, which it knows full well can stall the project another year or another decade. Why is DREE not brought into these discussions? Why is not DREE handed the responsibility of correlating these studies? Why is not DREE given the job to do?

DREE was created to lead the attack on regional disparity. Like Uriah the Hittite, it was to be thrust into the forefront of battle, there to do or die. But DREE stayed in the background when the big conflicts raged. It handed out its grants and loans to justify its existence, and failed miserably to take hold of the big projects which the Atlantic provinces have needed for generations. In short, it avoided the massive development undertakings without which the Atlantic provinces will always remain what they are today, the most neglected part of Canada.

I am an infrastructure man. I will always be an infrastructure man. Infrastructures are the only hope of getting Atlantic Canada into a position of parity with the rest of the country, a position from which it can stay caught up. Millions of dollars in piecemeal grants over the years have done nothing but keep us from sliding farther behind. The dole has failed.

It is time to get back to the bold and imaginative policy of regionalism pioneered by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the principle of special aid to the Atlantic provinces on a massive scale. Where mere millions have been parceled out to keep the wolf from the door, billions are needed; billions not in spending but in investment, investment in permanent and lasting projects which will bring the Atlantic provinces to equal partner status with the other six, and which will dispose of the need, once and for all, of the subsidies and handouts which have always been associated with us as a backward area.

I thought at one time that the Prime Minister of Canada was an infrastructure man too. All signs pointed to his involvement in the projects which would form the foundations for a new Atlantic economy. I refer to an exclusive article by the Prime Minister in the Atlantic Advocate of March, 1969. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Advocate is a magazine published in Fredericton, my home, and is one of the great quality magazines of Canada. In it the Prime Minister had this to say about infrastructure:

> If there is one main reason why industry has been slow to develop in the Atlantic region, it is distance from the main markets of central Canada. Because there are few industries, the costs of other industries are higher than they would be in central Canada. Those to which transport costs in themselves do not matter much are nevertheless handicapped by the absence of companies producing components or providing technical services; by the lack of industrial experience and the lower educational standards of much of the labour force; by the poorer infrastructure of roads and water supplies and power and so on.
> In short, slow economic growth creates a kind of vicious circle that keeps growth slow. The attractiveness of a location to industry depends closely on the quality of many public services: on power, water, roads, railways, port facilities, sewers, schools, universities, research establishments and so on. These are the infrastructure of the economy. Some of them are under federal jurisdiction, but most are provincial and municipal responsibilities.

That is a quotation with which I find myself agreeing very easily. From this it could be gathered that the provision of infrastructure was to be an important part of the operations of DREE which, at that time, was just getting started. One could see in that article a determination of the Prime Minister to separate federal and provincial municipal jurisdictions and to launch a mighty drive to get the federal share of the job done. One could envisage a breakthrough on the part of DREE which was to have the powers to provide assistance by direct action, and by action through the provincial governments to create the necessary infrastructures.

● (1430)

But promises and performances by the Liberals, as always, were entirely different things. DREE was launched with great fanfare as the answer to all of our economic problems. It did not take very long, however, for the Atlantic provinces to realize exactly what DREE was—just another federal agency handing out grants and loans and doles, and shirking the responsibility of getting to the fundamental problems of the area, of spearheading the mighty projects which common sense tell us must be the cornerstones of Atlantic prosperity—the Fundy tidal power project, the development of the ports of Saint John and Halifax, and an Atlantic transportation policy which would include the corridor road, with United States cooperation, and a modern high speed highway between Fredericton and Saint John to transport agricultural products, parts for manufacturing industries and other goods to world markets via the port of Saint John. Not one of these projects came under the aegis of DREE. After five years of DREE the positions of all of these projects are exactly as they were when DREE was created—in limbo.

Well, we are still awaiting the new minister's performance. I believe that new policies should show a willingness to get to the basics of Atlantic economics and to put first things first. There has to be a new set of priorities, and the projects I have mentioned have to be in the top echelons of those priorities.

I am getting more and more support in my campaign for Atlantic infrastructures. Some of my colleagues have joined me. I would hope for the support of more of them. Yes, and for the support of all Atlantic members, as well as that of the minister responsible for DREE. I am not asking for the moon. I am asking for fair treatment of an area whose problems no amount of subsidies and grants can solve if the solid base is not laid down.

Give us the Fundy tidal project and the Maritimes will become the power house of the continent with both Canadian and American—yes, and British and French and Japanese—interests clamoring to invest in us.

Give us the corridor road and, by means of a straight super highway linking Vanceboro in Maine with Sherbrooke in Quebec, the shippers and travellers and tourists of this area will be five hours and 150 miles closer to the markets and attractions of central Canada, and vice versa.

Give us the port developments, and the great tankers and container ships of the world will come to us in armadas of profit.

In short, give us the infrastructures and let them form the foundation. Then, Mr. Speaker, the rest of Canada can forget the subsidies and grants and handouts which they have been forced to provide us, often against their will, for the simple reason that no one has ever had the common sense, foresight, and resolution to face facts squarely and give us the tools with which we can put our own house in order.

I would say that my immediate suggestion is for the minister to focus his attention on the infrastructures I have mentioned, and to focus the attention of all departments of government on the problems of regional disparity. In closing, again I wish the minister much success in his new ministry.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate the new Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) on his appointment. This is the first opportunity I have to do so. I am all the happier as I am one of the promoters who launched him in politics the first year. In his first political campaign, we fought side by side when he ran on behalf of the Social Credit. Today, he was honoured by his party with the responsibility of heading a department, and as a representative of my area and as one of my best friends, I am quite happy.

I realize that the act was first introduced in 1969 to fight regional and economic disparities, not political disparities, as I had the opportunity to point out on occasion before the Committee on Regional Economic Expansion on which I sat, and I hope past mistakes will not be repeated. I would suggest to the new minister so as to help him in his work perhaps—because it is a big job—that it might be a good thing to set up in each region an advisory regional committee to guide the minister, the whole department and the bureaucrats, because I do not feel that the bureaucrats alone are qualified to say whether an industry deserves or will deserve help from the government or will be turned down. We had proof over the years that many industries, in my area in particular should have been helped and were not. Other industries got much more than their share, probably because of underhand favours.

I am convinced that with the new minister, things will be straightened out. And if our area was neglected in the past, the minister this time will not forget it since he lives there. I feel that every precaution has been taken since the minister is from our area. With the unemployment rate between 15 per cent and 18 per cent in our area, I think the minister will certainly have work to do and will have to consider all protects because in the years to come, we will have great projects. Several large and very important projects will be submitted for our area. A uranium mine has just been discovered about 35 miles from my place. We also have major forest projects. I think the minister will have plenty of work in our area. I hope that if he helps big businesses, a fact that I do not decry because they deserve it, he will not forget small ones, the new enterprises that need government assistance to get started. I think this was not provided in our area in the past.

Too much attention was paid some inspectors, and I would even add some political watchdogs, to the detriment of the small businessman who has a hard time getting his business off the ground and who has yet to have attention of the government. I say that because I have proof of it, because it is bad politics. I am sure that is going to stop with the new minister and that our area, and especially the small businessmen—who are waiting for government assistance to support their efforts, who had savings and risked their all hoping that the government would help them through its Department of Regional Economic Expansion, which gives reasonable grants to guarantee reimbursable grants—I am sure, as I say, that on those three scores, they will now get the help they have been waiting for and did not receive for years.

I therefore ask the present minister to kindly look at our area, his area, without overlooking the rights of the other provinces. I am merely asking for plain justice, fair distribution, social justice. I therefore wish the minister the greatest success and ask him once again, on behalf of my whole area, to help all the industries which need that help to get their production under way.

● (1440)

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I join my fellow Conservatives who have indicated that it is not their wish to impede the progress of this bill.

An hon. Member: Good speech.

Mr. Brisco: Don't rush me. At the same time we do have some suggestions and recommendations to make to the new minister, together with congratulations to offer from all members on all sides of the House on his appointment to this new position. In British Columbia we are particularly pleased to see that the minister has decided to recognize the long service provided by Mr. Mair, and has recognized the continuing needs of the province in the appointment of a new member. I believe it is Mr. Marshall from New Brunswick. We are certainly encouraged at this new appointment and pleased that Mr. Mair will be accorded regard for his service in the province of British Columbia.

There are some very serious concerns which must be voiced whenever we discuss DREE. There is no question in my mind that we have to allow this bill quick passage in order not to impede the progress of any development currently under way which otherwise might be affected by the existing time contraints of the act. However, I am concerned about the disparity which exists between the provinces in the usage and implementation of the DREE program. When I read news releases from the minister's department I am concerned when I read about Ontario—Ontario—Quebec—Quebec—Quebec—Nova Scotia—British Columbia—Ontario—Ontario—Quebec, and so on ad infinitum and ad nauseam. There is a need for an appropriate balance and an end to the disparity which exists, and I have every confidence that the new minister is going to pay attention to this regional disparity.

I should also like to comment on the need for a much closer examination of the true intent, purpose, and goal of the DREE program. It is all well and good to say that the purpose of DREE is to encourage employment and to establish new industry in areas of economic depression, but there also must be some consideration, as has already been said, about the infrastructure. There has to be consideration about the social impact of a new industry, the environmental impact, secondary or primary, in any community.

Is it the responsibility of the community and the province, or is it the joint responsibility of the community, the province, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to address themselves to the problems they themselves generate by the very establishment of new industry without any reference to, or concern for the needs of the community with regard to schools, hospitals, police, sewage disposal, and all other infrastructure problems generated by the establishment of a new industry? These are areas which have not had, in my view, proper attention.

There seems to be some effort on the part of the province of British Columbia to resolve these problems. The effort thus far has proven to be a fiasco, and I refer the minister and this House to what is referred to as the Kootenay task force study. I understand that there is a similar study into the needs of Kootenay West, and this study is based on a study of the Queen Charlotte Islands and Prince Rupert. It is hoped to tailor the needs of those areas to the needs of Kootenay West. That shows that there is not a true grasp of the needs of either area.

I have other concerns with reference to the establishment of new industry which I think the minister would be well advised to consider. Under-capitalization is one of the biggest causes of the failure of any business or new industry established under the DREE program. Too often in its genuine desire to satisfy the need to establish a new business or a new industry in an area of economic depression, DREE does not look closely enough at the final stages and the final impact of the establishment of that business or that industry. The end result is that after a few months in production they are suddenly faced with additional capital expenditures for which there has been no provision made. As a result the taxpayers' investment has frequently either ground to a halt for a period of time until new capital could be raised, or—and in fact on more than one occasion—has simply gone down the tube. What a waste of manpower, tax dollars, and talent! Under-capitalization is too frequently a cause of this failure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: There is need to educate the community and the provincial government to the entire DREE program. Frequently we will see a new industry strive to establish. Perhaps initial purchases of equipment are made. Then all of a sudden the new industry finds that it is in trouble and wonders where it can go. Someone suggests DREE, and when the industry goes to DREE it is told that DREE might have been able to help if it had not spent that first dollar. The industry is told that it has gone too far down the line, that it is committed and that DREE is sorry but that there is nothing it can do—end of new industry. That is wrong.

The manner in which this problem can be solved, and quite simply so, is through a proper selling program by DREE officials directed to the people who know what the score is in the community and who know what industries are required and what can best be done to establish them. But let us not mislead the public, the business community, and the taxpayer by allowing some fellow to start up a new industry, and then when the industry is going down the tube being told by DREE that he cannot be helped. It is simply a matter of inadequate education. DREE does not have a proper educational program with which to sell its product.

There are one or two other concerns which I must voice. The other day in a B.C. caucus meeting in Castlegar we received a brief from the British Columbia Wildlife Organization. In that brief they asked the following question: is industry created to resolve unemployment? That caused us to laugh and to look at it in a rather cynical light. However, there is some measure of truth in that particular statement. Perhaps we could cite as an example the electric knife. How badly do we need the electric knife? Did some inventor or manufacturer decide to resolve the unemployment problem by constructing a factory to produce electric knives? Is it really that important to us? I am sure there are other examples that could be quoted but I think we must first look at the need to establish a secondary industry that is geared to the primary industry of the riding.

● (1450)

It has frequently happened that a factory for canning fruit has been established in the heart of a mining area. What purpose is there in establishing a secondary metal fabricating plant in the heart of an agricultural area? In other words DREE is not looking to the problem of creating secondary industry that is tailored to the primary industrial thrust of a specific area or community. If the primary industry is forestry, then let us establish secondary industries geared to that; we should not put in a factory for canning peaches. If the primary industry is smelting, as in my constituency, then put in a metal fabrication plant or something of that nature.

It is a false premise to assume that you can establish an industry that is not related to the basic economy of your riding that is to assure that you are eventually going to lose that industry through the pressures of taxation, competition, or maybe transportation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that when DREE is providing a grant for the establishment of a secondary industry it should address itself to meeting the basic criteria which are set by the federal and provincial departments of the environment before a grant is provided.

In Kootenay West we are faced with a problem regarding an industry that received a DREE grant. It appears that there is a possibility of a creek being polluted, and of the noise level affecting a neighbour whose home is adjacent to the factory. These questions have been directed to environmental groups and organizations interested in the problems affecting the industry, the neighbour, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and departmental officials. I am sure none of them need these additional headaches.

I would urge the minister to realize that environmental concerns must be recognized and perhaps completely resolved even before an industry is established, but I do not say at the expense of industry—I am not one who proposes that industry be put down because of environmental concerns. What I do say is that we have to pay attention and not establish industry that pollutes and is not in harmony with our environment. Those are some of my concerns, Mr. Speaker, and I must express them to the minister on behalf of the people of Kootenay West. I congratulate the minister on his appointment and look forward to working with him at committee level.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would be less than human if I did not join with the other members who have spoken today in congratulating the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) on his new appointment. I also thank my friends to the right for their humanity in not taking an opportunity that they thought they saw. The fact is that we do commend the minister on the responsibility that has been assigned to him. Some of us have watched his progress—at least his movement—from the Social Credit back benches to the Liberal back benches, to the Liberal middle benches, and now to the Liberal front bench. I suppose the question to ask is: where does he go from here?

An hon. Member: Across.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes we have room over here. The minister said in his opening remarks with respect to this bill that he was confident members would be happy to give speedy passage to it. I can tell him that he is one of those fortunate ministers who has been assigned a Friday afternoon for his bill. Usually a minister who gets his bill in on Friday afternoon gets it through.

That does not mean it is an open and shut case that grants under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be continued for five years beyond the present expiry date without some pretty searching questions being asked. I feel that the glamour and fanfare with which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was launched have not really been matched in the kind of program that has made a significant attack on disparity amongst the regions of Canada. I would hope the new minister will realize that if he is going to get congratulations from members on the opposite side of the House a year from now he has to make some real improvement in the administration of the DREE program.

As the minister knows there have been assessments of this program, some of them academic as one of the previous speakers noted. One was the Springate assessment of a few years ago in which statistics were adduced to show that very few industries receiving DREE grants chose the place to locate their industry simply on the basis of such a grant. As I say, the evidence is there that in many cases these industries had already decided where they were going to locate, and the grant was just a little assistance. It is still true, as the last speaker pointed out, that when one reads down the list of DREE grants the names of the central provinces keep occurring again and again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is just occasionally that the other provinces come into the picture. There are those who have suggested that tax incentives and other such methods would be just as effective, if not more so, in achieving decentralization. Of course it is still true that one of the best ways for the government to achieve decentralization is to see to it that some of its operations get put out into other areas. The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), who is also the Minister of National Defence, had some success in getting the Royal Canadian Mint moved to Winnipeg, but there are some other things to be decentralized to Winnipeg.

An hon. Member: Air Command.

An hon. Member: That has left.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would not mention the air industry.

An hon. Member: I did not mention the industry. I said Air Command.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend admits he did not mention the air industry. That is not exactly one of the accomplishments of the Minister of National Defence.

● (1500)

The Manitoba government said some time ago that if the government, instead of giving grants, were to move the government's computer centre to a place like Winnipeg, that would be a real move toward decentralizing industry.

I remember many years ago being part of a group which was having a friendly, informal discussion with Mr. St. Laurent after he had made one of his trips across Canada. Those were days when things were not quite as confused and discouraging as they are now. He found life in Canada pretty good, but the one thing which bothered him greatly was regional disparity. He wanted to do something to correct regional disparities. It bothered him greatly that there were regions of the country, particularly in the Maritimes, where conditions were so much below what they were in the central provinces and other parts of Canada.

I suggest that the minister should not merely regard his job as an appointment, as a job he must fill, as a position which will entitle him to be called "Honourable", and so on. He heads a department which began with a great deal of fanfare. It was to do wonderful things. Now it has become bogged down as an administrative operation and is falling far short of its original goals. Even my friends who wanted to pay the minister all the compliments they could today had to include in their remarks expressions of concern having to do particularly with the maritime provinces; they were concerned about the failure of DREE to do very much for their areas.

There is another criticism which a person whose name is well known across the way, Hon. Eric Kierans, has made. He says that the way DREE grants are handed out means that they will do much more to create capital intensive industry than labour intensive industries. Even today, when the minister said that according to latest reports the things DREE has done are expected to create about 122,000 direct jobs, I notice that the minister had to use the words, "expected to create." No doubt that figure was arrived at by adding up the sum of jobs it was thought would be created by each and every application. The firms concerned have said how many jobs each grant will create, the total adds up to 122,000, and the minister said with a straight face that those DREE grants are expected to create 122,000 direct jobs. I want to know, is it to be 122,000, 100,000, or 50,000 jobs? This is why I believe Eric Kierans' criticism needs to be considered. He suggested that in all probability we are helping to establish capital intensive activities rather than labour intensive industries.

Although we wish the minister well, we say that the aim is to create jobs. I notice that if you compare the current government telephone directory with one of a few years ago, you will see that some jobs have been created. A couple of years ago we had the minister, deputy minister, and two assistant deputy ministers. Now we have six assistant deputy ministers. Some new jobs have been created. But what about jobs by the thousands in parts of Canada where they are really needed?

I believe the kinds of speeches which have been made today are significant. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) made an important point about infrastructure and investment. If my hon. friend from Timiskaming had not had to leave he would have spoken on this topic. He feels that when grants are given some attention to equity should be paid, and that they should not just be handouts.

So, Mr. Speaker, I make my appeal to the minister. No doubt he felt it was a great day when he was called to the cabinet and given all the privileges and perquisites which go with his position. But I suggest to him that his job is not merely one of carrying on a bogged down administration, not one merely to keep the bureaucracy going. His job is to bring about a return to the high ideals and enthusiasm which were so apparent when we decided to establish the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Lessening economic disparities in this country is a tremendous goal. I hope the minister sees that as a challenge he must meet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank my colleagues who have taken part in the debate, more especially for their kind words, their congratulations and their wishes of success in my new work.

I can assure them that I will not delay the debate further. I have taken note of all questions raised by hon. members. For example, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) wonders if the new bill will have some effect on the applications which have already reached the department. Surely not, I can reassure him in that respect. We have taken some commitments and we will comply with them. It is precisely because we think that we will be making some new ones in the next few weeks that we hope the bill will soon be passed.

He mentioned, of course, the present economic issues that have implications on departmental activities. Everyone is aware of this, but our department is not the only one involved since all government activities are affected. The economic conditions are responsible for these difficulties. On the other hand, I am convinced that our department will emerge all the greater from this new experience and will continue as in the past to be most active in the areas where the need for our programs is the greatest.

For instance, the hon. member puts the following question: Why ask for a five-year extension? Because we believe it is necessary. The extension for a five-year period will give the government time to review its program, if need be, but especially will enable the businesses already in touch with the department to continue their research work, their market studies and projects. Then, they can be sure that if they submit a proposal in six, fifteen or eighteen months, the act will be in effect and they may obtain the assistance provided under the act.

The hon. member for York Sunbury (Mr. Howie) is highly interested in infrastructures. He warns me against a tendency I could have of favouring the development of industries over that of infrastructures. I could simply point out to him that infrastructures and their development represent a very important area and it goes without saying that the department committed itself in general agreements on present development to further expansion and it established infrastructures. I want to make very clear, however, that infrastructures, as important as they may be in slow growth areas where we would like to see expansion, will be justified only to the extent there is hope for ensuing industrial development to create new jobs, generally improve the standard of living and stabilize if not increase the population in those areas.

There are certainly a score of projects the department could take into consideration. That of the Bay of Fundy is an obvious one. We know that this is a very extensive project which has been on the planning board for several years. He suggests that the department which I head ought to be the foreman for this great project. He suggests also that we should forget about all other projects to concentrate our operation and financial resources on the development of large scale projects, such as building a tidal power plant at the Bay of Fundy.

If we were to accept his suggestion, if we were to concentrate our efforts on these great projects as a priority and turn down all opportunities for action which are being offered to us during our bargaining sessions with provincial governments—especially those of the Atlantic coast—I think that we should miss a great many fine occasions to improve the social and economic conditions of these regions, to help establish new plants and create new jobs.

Of course, such a project is important and will have to go through further developments. However, he has mentioned that the good years of the Diefenbaker government's regime had given rise to great expectations for the Atlantic region with the setting up of the Atlantic Development Council.

Without wanting to pass judgment on nor criticize the proposal of the time, I must say that I was a member of the House when the Diefenbaker government brought in this proposal in 1962 and that when that agency was set up it sounded all right in principle, but it had in fact no power at all and particularly no budget to work with; it is only with the advent of the Liberal government in 1963 and on the instigation of the then member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the hon. Mr. Pickersgill, that that agency has been modified in order to be provided with very substantial funds allowing it to work in the areas which had been assigned to it by the previous government. Thus, I think that the Liberal government has been more generous than the Progressive Conservative government of the time in this area.

As regards the other criticism on that question of cooperation between the two departments, I must say here that when policies were revised, it was agreed that we would try to better coordinate our activities with those of other federal and provincial departments. And that is something we achieved to a high degree in the last years. The auxiliary agreements we reached with the provinces clearly indicate that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is involved with two, three—four in one case recently in Saskatchewan—or five different federal departments in development programs. I can name the project of Qu'Appelle River, which is very important for the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker, I could raise many other points. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) brought up some very interesting points of which I am very much aware; the department is very conscious of some of the difficulties we have in British Columbia, of some positive experiences, and some less positive we have had. We recognize it but hope those problems are only temporary, that we will solve them.

I thank the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), my colleague, for the support he graciously gives me as a neighbour in the province of Quebec and more specifically in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area. I can assure him that my concern for that area goes without saying, but he must not forget, as he said himself, that I am a federal minister and that I can in no way favour my area to the detriment of other regions. Anyway, as he said, he does not want my area to benefit from undue privileges; but it does need federal assistance. I can assure him that I shall discharge all my responsibilities to ensure that the projects put forward by my area are given prompt attention by the officials of my department, with the hope that we will be able to contribute to alleviate unemployment; the unemployment rate we both have in our constituencies is 30 per cent, which is very high. I think nobody in this House will resent me if we succeed in supporting some projects in our areas to alleviate the great difficulties we are in.

As to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) he is an experienced man in this House. Indeed, I have known him ever since I came here in 1962 and I can assure him that the decentralisation of the department that took place 18 months ago, barely two years after a revision of our policy, was certainly not done with a view to creating jobs. If we wanted to have those regional offices headed by assistant deputy ministers it is precisely to indicate the seriousness we were attaching to that decentralisation and the power given to those officers—a decision making power.

Decisions can be made on the spot on a very large number of applications submitted. That is why we have assistant deputy ministers in our four regions to be sure that the greatest number of projects possible can be rapidly dealt with and a decision made in the shortest period of time possible. We gave those people a high level of responsibility and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that level of responsibility produced a lot of effect up to now, and I could only quote the number of related agreements that were signed in the last 12 months. Indeed, it was just 18 months ago when we signed the general agreement with the provinces. We signed a very large number of related agreements, particularly in the maritime provinces, of course, but also in the prairie provinces, Saskatchewan being the one with the greatest number now in effect. We hope soon to sign several others with the province of Manitoba. Indeed, I am supposed to go out to that province in the weeks to come to meet with provincial authorities.

Of course, it is always relatively easy to criticize the activities of a department. A department like the one I head, of course, has no precedents on which it can base its action. It must innovate. It must acquire experience. It must work with provincial governments, local institutions. And that is what we did, that is what we tried to do more with provincial governments by identifying priorities both at the industrial and infrastructural levels, ascertaining with the provincial governments the best use possible for the amounts that are made available to us.

In answer to a criticism which has been directed at the department, namely that we give multinational corporations, companies and industries in general too much help while not giving enough for provincial and municipal infrastructures, I would like to point out to hon. members that out of a budget of roughly $500 million, $70 only are allotted to help industry in general and the balance to infrastructure development and the implementation of programs which are proposed to us by provincial governments. This shows a large part—I should say a very large part of the departmental monies are earmarked for infrastructure development in the hope and trust that this is consistent with the priorities not only of the provinces but also of the townships and their people, as our action is geared, of course, to improving the standards of living of people who live in the areas said to be of slow expansion rate or underprivileged.

We would like their living standards to be such that people will appreciate living there, and above all that those who have deserted those areas to go and make a living in big cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg, for example, will be enticed to go back home.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the department's activities, because of its objectives, necessarily give rise to conflicts with the large centres of the country which probably see our department as a group trying to impede the development of the large centres like Montreal. Toronto, Vancouver or Winnipeg. I would like to conclude my remarks on this particular point: I think it is in the interest of the large centres, in both the short and especially the long run, that we preserve in the bordering areas of Canada, the peripheral areas, those described as disadvantaged, a very strong percentage of people to prevent this phenomenon of Canadians concentrating in large centres, with all the attendant effects and problems, namely overpopulation, pollution and, particularly, the very high cost of housing, for instance.

If we manage somehow to slow down that exodus of people towards large cities through department activities, we shall be and we are serving the interest of great Canadian cities. I insist on that: If we want natural resources supplies to remain adequate for great cities, if we in this country want to have people in distant areas where those resources are to be found, if we want them to stay there, the quality of life in those parts must be adequate enough to prompt them to stay, and young people must be provided the prospect of employment and a rewarding future.

Only if we are prepared to transfer funds from the federal treasury to those regions to upgrade, develop and maintain them, will we accomplish something, because it is not enough to say that those regions will supply great cities with raw natural resources, it is not good enough, it is far from being good enough. We should do more than that and make sure the processing of those raw materials will take place in those areas to a degree which will ensure their development, in order to give young people the assurance that they will find jobs and that Canada as a whole will benefit from that situation, so that the strength of the provinces which constitute our nation will make each and everyone of us stronger.

The House will refer this bill to the committee for other considerations. I took note of all representations made up to now by hon. members who took part in the debate, and I am confident that when we all sit in the regional economic expansion committee we will be in a position to dig deeper in the various suggestions, and I will of course take that opportunity to provide members with further information and to answer some of the questions which were put. May I conclude by thanking my hon. colleagues for their cooperation in that respect.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that all the orders preceding notice of motion No. 3 be allowed to stand, and that the House proceed with that order?

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE DEDUCTIONS FOR VOLUNTEER SERVICES PROVIDED FOR CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS AND GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

On the order:

November 18, 1974—Resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Reynolds, seconded by Mr. McKinley:

Income Tax Act

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to provide for deductions for volunteer services provided by a taxpayer on behalf of either a charitable organization or a federal, provincial or municipal agency.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rose on a point of order a moment ago and may I repeat it. May I suggest that all the orders preceding notice of motion No. 3 be allowed to stand and that the House proceed with that order?

Mr. Baldwin: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual discussions between certain people here. We have been considering whether or not, in light of certain special circumstances, the hon. member, who is a very conscientious member and has brought forward this very important motion—he might want to supplement what I say—would be prepared to allow the matter to be discussed two weeks from now at an appropriate time. This is on the understanding that the government look very seriously at the content of the motion to see whether it can be referred to a committee, so there can be a very careful study made of the matter in committee. If that is the case I think we would be prepared to agree that this be done at the present time, and perhaps the House might want to consider adjourning at an earlier time.

I understand there are a lot of ministers with some very important questions to answer and who need time to prepare themselves to answer these questions at a later time. Furthermore, I am told there is one Liberal here from Alberta, and I want to take several hours to see if I can find him to verify his presence.

Order stands.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Is it agreed that we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): This House stands adjourned until Wednesday, November 12, 1975, at 2 p.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, November 5, 1975.

At 3.28 p.m. the House adjourned until 2 p.m. on Wednesday, November 12, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED REIMBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC TREASURY BY LIBERAL PARTY OF COST OF KEEPING PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT OPEN DURING PARTY CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a case of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the parliamentary restaurant was opened this past weekend coinciding with the Liberal party's convention in Ottawa, and in view of the fact that this was most unusual as the restaurant is not opened on weekends, and in view of the fact that the taxpayers of Canada were asked to subsidize Liberal party hangers-on and government hacks, who judging from the convention registration fee of $100 were quite capable of paying their own way at commercial establishments in the city, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That this House condemns the Liberal government's blatant rip-off of the Canadian taxpayer at a time when this same government is calling for voluntary restraint in spending and calls on the Liberal party to reimburse the public Treasury for the amount of the subsidy incurred as a result of the weekend splurge in the parliamentary restaurant.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONDEMNATION OF UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION NAMING ISRAEL AS RACIST NATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Having been present at the opening day of the United Nations in San Francisco and throughout a portion of the proceedings in 1945, I ask leave to make a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That the ganging up of the UN member countries, from Africa in particular and in other parts of the world, to bring about the adoption of resolutions in the United Nations which are contrary to the principles inherent in the charter and which are unjust to the nations against whom they are directed is dangerous to the continued existence, even survival of the United Nations.

And further, that in the opinion of this House the iniquitous resolution passed by the United Nations Assembly last week, and against which Canada cast its vote, which denounced the state of Israel as a racist nation is in the opinion of this House unmerited, untrue and deserving of the unqualified condemnation by this House and by all peoples who believe in freedom and world peace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF A COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO BEEF PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since cattle breeders are in a difficult situation because of the ridiculously low prices paid to them on the market, while city consumers are still paying very high prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House ask the Minister of Agriculture to authorize the review board on beef marketing to advise without delay about the means it recommends to do justice to those producers.

OLYMPIC GAMES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON FEDERAL FUNDING OF GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of repeated examples of the incompetence of the co-ordinating committee for the 1976 Olympics with respect to the handling of financial arrangements for the games, and in view of COJO's most recent blunder, this time relating to discriminatory hiring practices for hostesses for the Olympic games, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct the government to table immediately a report on all funding presently being provided by the federal government to the 1976 Olympic Games, whether under existing government programs or by special arrangement, and that in addition the government table a copy of all correspondence between itself and the Quebec government, COJO or the city of Montreal concerning any additional funding or guarantees which may be made available at some future date.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION—EFFECT OF ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. He has had a further weekend to reflect on the Post Office situation, and I would like to ask him whether he and his government are now prepared to put before the House a measure to assure the resumption of postal service and also to provide a further period of negotiations.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No. Mr. Speaker. When the Postmaster General was warning the postal unions that this strike might last a long while, he was speaking on behalf of the government.

Mr. Stanfield: Recognizing the emphasis the government has placed upon the importance of free collective bargaining, would the Prime Minister not agree that in adopting his incomes policy, the government has already placed a very substantial reduction on the scope of collective bargaining? Particularly in view of this, is the government not now prepared to consider the great public inconvenience and hardship which is being suffered by the people of Canada through the apparent desire of the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General to let things run their course, come hell or high water and regardless of what may happen to the people of this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The premise of the question is based on the prices and incomes control measures, and on previous occasions I told the House that these measures by themselves were not meant to remove the right of collective bargaining.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the Prime Minister agreeing that this does remove the right of collective bargaining? Does the Prime Minister not agree that these compulsory guidelines, where they apply, of necessity limit the scope of collective bargaining and therefore make a mockery of continuing a long standing and long continuing interruption of an important service to the Canadian public in the name of free collective bargaining, which does not exist under these controls?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot agree with that. The House has heard the Postmaster General and government spokesmen indicate that unions and management should bargain as best they can and adhere to the guidelines, and if there is some doubt in their application, it would be up to the Anti-Inflation Board to intervene after the fact. We still think that collective bargaining should go on in this country, and that unions and employers should take the responsibility of reaching the best possible agreement under the new guidelines.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—SUGGESTION LEGISLATION BE PASSED REQUIRING SUPERVISED VOTE ON GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the refusal of the union leaders to put the government's offer to the membership, is the government prepared to pass special legislation under which a government supervised vote will be conducted to determine whether the rank and file union members really are against accepting the government offer? Does not the public interest and the principle of democracy within unions demand such action?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has put forward a proposition which might be worth considering at a later date, but for the time being I think it would be premature for the government to intervene and tell the unions how they should run their business.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REASON FOR REFUSAL TO LEGISLATE AN END TO THE STRIKE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): I wonder if the Prime Minister is thinking of Easter as the proper date.

A few minutes ago at a press conference the Postmaster General stated that there was, and I quote: "nothing more to negotiate." In view of the fact that further negotiations will therefore be useless, why does the government still refuse to legislate an end to the strike?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question seems somewhat rhetorical. Strikes have happened before, and government has not always legislated an end to those strikes. Strikes are an economic weapon used by one side in the bargaining process, and the natural course for that weapon is to run its course against the members. When we find that it hits the public even more strongly than the right to free collective bargaining, that is the point at which the government intervenes.

POSSIBLE REOPENING OF MAIL BOXES—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF AMOUNT OF MAIL THAT WILL BE MOVED

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): The government has in the past said that the time to intervene is when no further useful negotiations would take place.

May I put a supplementary to the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. At a press conference a few minutes ago the minister said that mail boxes will be reopened. Can he tell the House how much mail will be moved in relation to the normal volume or is this just window dressing?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that will depend to what extent the public uses the mail boxes!

An hon. Member: Are you talking about the canine public?

Mr. Mackasey: I might remind the hon. gentleman the position he is now taking is diametrically opposed to the one he took when the firefighters at Vancouver airport were off work illegally.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

LEVEL OF SULPHUR DIOXIDE EMISSION RESULTING FROM SYNCRUDE PRODUCTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The government acknowledged last week that while some $100 million has been spent on the Syncrude project it does not yet have representation on the heretofore non-existent board of directors that is ultimately going to manage that project. In the absence of the Minister of the Environment and in view of the fact that recent reports indicate that sulphur dioxide emissions from the Syncrude plant when it goes on stream in late 1978, will be roughly seven times greater than that which the use of present technology would produce, and in light of the fact that this sulphur dioxide is dangerous to human health and its effects will be spread over a number of provinces, can the minister assure the House that the government, by whatever means, direct or indirect, will not permit Syncrude to proceed with production as long as this level of emission will result therefrom?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to correct the misconception in the preamble of the hon. member's question. I did not indicate that the federal government was not part of the ongoing planning and project management of the Syncrude project. I did say they did not now hold a position on the board of directors but there is a Canadian federal presence on the management committee which is in fact the project management operation.

As to the second part of the question, I am sure the hon. member would want to address that to the Minister of the Environment. Quite clearly, he has indicated a major problem and one about which the government is very concerned.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I assume the minister must know the answer, although he is not the Minister of the Environment. Was the issue of the level of pollution by sulphur dioxide and related to that the control procedures to be implemented by Syncrude, brought before the management committee to which the minister referred, and on which the federal government does have representation? Was there discussion and if so, what was the position taken by the federal government representatives on that committee?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be referred to the Minister of the Environment.

● (1420)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, does the minister say—I do not ask this argumentatively—that the cabinet has not decided on this matter, that, therefore, he does not know the government's position, and that is why he refers the question to the minister who is not in the House?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I referred this matter to the Minister of the Environment because that minister is responsible for the environmental area in question.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General.

Considering that collective bargaining between department officials and union leaders ended nearly one week ago, could the minister advise the House as to the current situation after the negotiations broke off and indicate how many post offices are now providing services to the public? Could the minister bring us up to date on the situation which has developed since last Friday?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think that at least 87 post offices are now open throughout Canada. This compares favourably with last Friday, when only 40 were open. We intend to serve the Canadian public, even in small communities where people have as many rights to be served as those living in larger centres like Montreal and Toronto.

OLYMPIC GAMES

SUGGESTION THOSE WHO WEAR EYEGLASSES NOT HIRED AS GUIDES—REQUEST FOR ACTION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Perhaps the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary can answer. Can parliament be assured that it is not the policy of COJO, or anybody else for that matter connected with the Olympic Games, to discriminate against guides to be selected for the Olympic Games only because they happen to wear eyeglasses? Will the minister repudiate that obviously insensitive, sexist and outrageous statement?

Mr. Bob Kaplan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the minister, I think, will want to answer this question, I shall bring it to his attention.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the parliamentary secretary cannot make up his mind. May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour? Will the minister undertake as head of his department to make sure that such an outrageous statement or idea, no matter by whom perpetrated, is repudiated by the government of Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yes, I will be happy to consult with the Minister of National Health and Welfare and have both departments look into the matter.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—REASON FOR PRICE INCREASE

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, may I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary? Considering CEMA's assertion on November 4, 1975, "that the pricing for eggs in this country is at the present time based primarily on a cost of production factor formula", and considering that today's Globe and Mail informs us that the cost of production seems to be coming down, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House why the price of eggs went up one cent a dozen this week in Toronto?

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency sets the average cost of eggs over four weeks. In addition to feeding, other factors must be considered such as salaries, interest and all other indirect expenses.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL FROM UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMS IN VIEW OF RESOLUTION NAMING ISRAEL RACIST NATION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Further to the excellent motion introduced in this House by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, can the minister assure the House that the government is, indeed, prepared to withdraw from the Ghana conference, and perhaps the decade against racism program, should the United Nations general assembly not alter its position on the vicious resolution passed earlier this week?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, replying to the question raised by the hon. gentleman, if Zionism is to be an object of UN activities relating to racism, it will clearly and manifestly not be possible for Canada to play its proper role in such activities. I say this with regret, because racism is one of the scourges of our time, one which, in its genuine application, we are prepared to join other countries in resisting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: However, we are not prepared to associate Canada with a judgment in which the presumption of innocence is denied and for which we do not believe evidence would be found which would justify the decision reached by the General Assembly of the United Nations has reached. As our permanent representative said at the United Nations, the resolution on zionism is not only objectionable in itself, but also taints two other resolutions which we would otherwise have whole-heartedly supported both in voting and in action. I refer, of course, to the resolution on the decade on racial discrimination and the conference against racism to be held in Ghana two years hence. We have, with great regret, voted aginst both resolutions because of the overall poisonous effect the adoption of the resolution on Zionism would have on the operation of these resolutions. We have to consider very carefully the participation of Canada in any activities that would flow from the adoption of these resolutions. That, of course, applies to the conference at Ghana and the decade on discrimination.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DELIVERY OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE AND OLD AGE PENSION CHEQUES IN VIEW OF POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Supply and Services.

In view of his reply last Friday on the postal strike, that all welfare cheques could be delivered through an urgency program, that he would invite hon. members to become acquainted with it, may I ask him what bearing this urgency program will have on family allowances and old age security cheques with a view to their being delivered to all concerned?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the urgency program for the delivery of socioeconomic cheques, the old age pensions more particularly, and the family allowances cheques, is operating now and provides for the gradual taking over of normal postal services as soon as they become available. As for the details of the program, an invitation was sent to all hon. members to attend a briefing tomorrow, on a regional basis, with a view to asking their participation in improving the program and helping with its implementation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATION ONE TENDERER FOR CONCESSION AT MIRABEL ATTEMPTED TO GET POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Is the minister aware of details of attempts to extract money for political contributions and even control of the enterprises involved in the case of at lease one of those parties which tendered for concessions at Mirabel? If so, has he been checking on this matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, he has referred certain documents to the Solicitor General, the Minister of Transport and to me. These have been referred to the appropriate law enforcement officers of the Crown who are taking action on them. We have not had a report from those law officers.

Mr. MacKay: I take it from the minister's answer that he will be inquiring further. I might tell him that I have access to photocopies of cheques which may be significant in this regard, particularly since they were dated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised in his question a rather important point. If he has any material, I would ask him to submit it to the RCMP.

TAX POSITION OF SKY SHOPS' SHAREHOLDERS WHO CONTRIBUTED SHARES TO SENATOR GIGUÈRE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. gentleman inform the House whether or not he has bothered to concern himself with the tax position of those stockholders and directors of Sky Shops Export Limited who contributed to the package of 5,000 shares for the honourable Senator Louis Giguère. If so, has he come to any conclusion in this matter?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the interests of protecting the confidentiality of information received by the department, even if we had looked into the matter we would not make a statement until it became public information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: It seems appropriate that if we are conducting an investigation we should keep it quiet.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—ALLEGED PROVINCIAL MONITORING OF FEES OF LIMITED NUMBER OF DOCTORS AND LAWYERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the light of statements made by the Prime Minister that it would be useless for unions to negotiate pay increases larger than those permitted by the guidelines because they would all be taxed away, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether he could confirm that in the discussions federal government representatives are having with the provinces in connection with guidelines for professional fees the federal government representatives have indicated that it is their intention only to monitor the 5 per cent of the doctors who have opted out of medicare and those lawyers who are members of firms where there are ten or more lawyers in the firm?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of such a development in negotiations with the provinces. When I met the premiers they indicated they would do their best to live by the spirit of the guidelines. They have had time, now, to examine them in more detail and I am not aware of any development along the lines mentioned by the hon. member.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—SUGGESTED IMPOSITION OF SURTAX ON INCOME IN EXCESS OF GUIDELINES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Since, if this program is to have any success, it must appear to the people mostly concerned, those who earn wages and salaries, that it is equitable, that they are not being asked to make sacrifices which people with much higher incomes, self-employed professionals, are able to make, would the Prime Minister look into this question, check what his representatives are proposing, and consider the imposition of a 100 per cent surtax which he seemed to be suggesting when he was talking about taxing away incomes for workers which are more than the guidelines would permit?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Perhaps I should correct an impression which the hon. member has probably gathered through incomplete reporting of what I said on one particular occasion. I indicated there were three ways in which recipients of incomes in excess of the guidelines might be separated from that income. One way, in the case of salaries, would be to take it back by means of deductions from the monthly payments. Another way would be to take it away directly from the salaried persons themselves. It is in that sense I might have used the word taxation in a loose, though, I believe, clearly understandable way. The third method would be to take the excess directly from the employer if the employer were responsible for the settlement over the guidelines. So it is really only a partial view of things to suggest I was embarking on the surtax route.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the fact that self-employed people are themselves the employers, should not the kind of restriction which the Prime Minister has suggested as applying to people earning wages and salaries be applied to self-employed people, and would not the simple way of doing this be by imposing a 100 per cent surtax so that those who are restricted to a 10 per cent increase would know that professionals, doctors, lawyers, engineers, would not get more than the 10 per cent increase which the Prime Minister thinks is fair?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member is suggesting a technique which various provincial governments will, no doubt, want to examine. If he refers to the white paper—I am returning to his first question today—he will recall that we put it to the provincial governments that they should act in the area of rents and professional fees. They have chosen to do so—

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, you know that in practice professional fees can only be regulated nationally.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member might ask a supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, sir!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is not the Liberal convention. It is the House of Commons.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind taking a supplementary now if you would allow it. If you would ask the leader of the NDP to supersede his backbencher, I will deal with it and then return to the backbencher who has been humbled by the intervention.

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—REQUEST FOR PROGRAM TO ASSIST BUSINESSMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Postmaster General. It arises from the present state of negotiations between the government and the postal union, the union negotiators being prepared to bargain and the government saying that its offer is a final offer. Is the government now prepared to consider a program designed to assist innocent third parties whose businesses and livelihood are affected by the failure of mail deliveries?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): I am not unaware of the hardship caused to small businessmen who use the mail. I am pleasantly surprised at the support they have given to me. I suppose they prefer strikes in the Post Office in future to be confined to the legal periods of time rather than illegal strikes every few months. This was the impression given me by one of the recognized leaders in the direct mail business this morning.

It is wrong to presume there is no ground for further negotiation. We can always negotiate certain monetary features of the collective agreement downward or spread it among certain members of the postal union who are not benefitting as much as people in the higher classifications. If that is what they prefer, I would be more than happy to do it.

Mr. Horner: The hon. gentleman has given a good account of the exact state of the negotiations but it seems he failed to understand the purport of my question. Is the government considering making assistance available to innocent third parties who are affected by the inability of the mail to get through?

Mr. Mackasey: That is not a question which I can answer categorically, though I would like to do so, because I am aware that we are dealing, here, with a real problem. I can only say I have had several discussions with people in that particular area to ascertain what type of benefit they would consider the most tangible. If policy is needed in this general area, then I can only make general recommendations to my colleagues.

CONFERENCE ON HUMAN SETTLEMENTS AT VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF ADEQUATE FUNDING

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I believe he has been given notice. Since the minister has been unable to assure Vancouverites that adequate federal funds will be available for Habitat Forum and since the latest issue of Habitat Bulletin, which is produced by the Canadian Participation Secretariat in conjunction with the Canadian host secretariat of the Department of External Affairs, carries the statement that costs of the Habitat Forum program at Jericho Park in Vancouver "will be paid under a specially created joint federal-provincial scheme", can the minister now assure the House that this statement reflects government policy? Will the hon. gentleman consult with his colleagues so that the residents of Vancouver can be assured of the proper funding for this international housing conference?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that it is not a housing conference but a conference on human settlements. In answer to the question I can give assurances that there is adequate funding for the completion of the physical arrangements and the programming for Habitat Forum at Jericho Beach.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF CHILEAN REFUGEES IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that Chilean refugees were obliged to sign a special conditional document disallowing them from engaging in international subversive political activities in Canada before receiving a special ministerial permit, could the minister advise the House whether he is aware that precisely such international political activities are in fact taking place in Canada organized by Chilean leftists and that as recently as September 12 the former Vice-President of Chile, Clodomiro Almeyda, was a speaker at such a rally, illegal in terms of the special permits, which incidentally was chaired by the hon. member for Greenwood.

In view of these illegal meetings that are taking place, could the minister advise the House whether or not he is aware that at least one foreign communist aligned diplomat, Rafael Reyes, an officer in the consulate of Cuba in Toronto, is involved in directly supporting and assisting the revolutionary left-wing Chilean refugee movement in Toronto that is working to overthrow the present Chilean government and, if so, what steps is the minister prepared to take to rectify what could be another internationally embarrassing situation for Canada?

MANPOWER

LAY-OFFS BY FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASCERTAIN REASON

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and it is possible that the Minister of Labour can also enlighten the House. In view of Falconbridge Nickel Company's announcement last Friday of a two phase lay-off of over 1,000 workers in the Sudbury basin, have either the Minister of Manpower or the Minister of Labour been informed of these lay-offs prior to last Friday's announcement and, if so, has this trans-national corporation given the government any reason or reasons for such insensitive actions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, any notice of lay-off would be a matter for my colleague the minister of manpower. I am not aware of any contractual obligation coming under the purview of my department but I will certainly look into the matter.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister of manpower. In light of the fact that Falconbridge's major stated reason for the lay-offs was an alleged softening of world nickel markets, and in view of the fact that the International Nickel Company is not laying off people but, on the contrary, is authorizing excessive amounts of overtime in its Sudbury basin nickel operations, has the minister already asked or does he intend to ask Falconbridge to justify its action in light of this apparent contradiction, especially considering the fact that Falconbridge is maintaining full production in its plants in the Dominican Republic and Norway?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there was no direct conveyance of this information to me in the last few days. I will check with the department to see whether any contact has been made.

Could the minister confirm to the House the reports in last week's newspapers in northeast Quebec that $1 million had been allocated for reinstalling the instrument landing facilities at Val-D'or airport?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not directly concerned by this project. As a rule, the announcements are made in the House by the appropriate minister. The President of the Treasury Board has seldom the opportunity to announce the projects himself.

Mr. Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Could the minister tell the House whether he wants to look into the announcement published in newspapers that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs himself has revealed that this amount of $1 million would be earmarked for Val-d'Or airport?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will not object to spending such an important amount of money for thousands of fellow citizens in northeast Quebec.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY WHETHER TOLLS WILL BE INCREASED

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the great concern expressed by a good many western shippers as well as central Canadian shippers, is the government going to make a ruling or decision on whether or not the St. Lawrence seaway tolls will be increased or will remain the same for the coming year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there has been no government examination of the question of any change in St. Lawrence seaway rates. There has, however, in connection with the anti-inflation exercise, been a determination that at least for the immediate future no rates ought to be changed except as reflecting changes in cost. Therefore any major review of the rates in the next several months will in any case be precluded.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. One of the reasons that the St. Lawrence seaway authority asked that the rates be increased was that costs were going up. Is the minister now saying that there will be an increase up to the 8 or 10 per cent ceiling, or, as a good many shippers have been asking, will the rates be frozen at the existing level?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that no consideration had been given to any change, so for the time being no change whatever is being proposed. I added in addition to that a limitation which would arise out of our current program which would not allow us to go back and catch up past cost problems but only current cost problems, at least in the immediate future.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED PREFERENTIAL TREATMENT OF CLAIMS BY LETTER CARRIERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible for unemployment insurance. Can the minister advise why instructions went out this week to UIC regional offices telling them to make special arrangements to handle claims by letter carriers, and can he tell the House why this particular group is being given preferential treatment ahead of other eligible claimants?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, they are not being given preferential treatment in the sense the hon. member is suggesting. They are fully entitled under the law to unemployment insurance benefits. Wherever we run into a mass situation requiring processing claims and we are aware of it, we try to make special administrative efforts to deal with them. The same thing applied to the General Motors lay-off or any automotive lay-off. I think it only fair to these people that we do this.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, that is a very strange answer in light of the postal strike at this time. Can the minister explain why the normal waiting period has been waived for letter carriers, and why at least some regional UIC offices have been told to make sure that these claimants receive their first cheques by Saturday—that is, within 48 hours of establishing eligibility—and in fact to downgrade the claims of other Canadians in order to meet these requirements?

Mr. Andras: That is not the case, Mr. Speaker. There has been no waiving of the required legal waiting period for the letter carriers. That is applicable to them as it is to anyone else. We are simply attempting to expedite claims in what is a mass situation in terms of responding to the need, and we certainly try to do that with any claim.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL FROM UNITED NATIONS IN VIEW OF PASSAGE OF RESOLUTION NAMING ISRAEL RACIST NATION

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the resolution that opened proceedings in this House today, which was passed unanimously by the House, regarding the vicious acts on Monday in the United Nations, will the government consider withdrawing from the United Nations and working with other nations of goodwill in establishing an organization of nations that will restore the UN covenants of peace and justice in the international community?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that it is my view that, in approving this resolution, the members of the United Nations who voted for it have made a mockery of the principles and purposes for which the United Nations was created. However, in this imperfect world we see no substitute for the United Nations at the present time, even though we may vigorously disagree and denounce the action or decision which it has taken, and this is what we do in this particular case.

However, as I have stated in reply to the question addressed to me by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, we will not be in a position to play a proper role in United Nations' activities if Zionism becomes an object of these activities, particularly in any relationship to racism. For that reason we are and will be reviewing that action we ought to take with respect to the resolution that was adopted in connection with the decade against discrimination and the conference on racism to be held in Ghana two years from now.

In view of the fact that the minister has been holding continuing bilateral discussions with an increasing number of nations could he indicate if it is his intention to have bilateral discussions with France in respect of fishery matters particularly as they might relate to the geographical location of St. Pierre-Miquelon with regard to fishing rights and the extension of limits.

Would the minister advise the House and the country what progress is being made in the discussions with France as they apply to unilateral or equidistant boundaries between the province of Newfoundland and St. Pierre-Miquelon in the determination of offshore resource rights or the giving of grants in respect of offshore rights, particularly with regard to Canada's position with France as it relates to St. Pierre-Miquelon.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In respect of the opening of the post offices, would the minister give consideration to re-establishing the movement of mail trucks? I ask that in light of the fact that in the province of Alberta probably only six cities have their post offices fully closed down and all other communities have their post offices open.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is further to a question put to him last week regarding Microsystems, and the possibility of a public inquiry. I am wondering whether the minister has now had an opportunity to find out about the situation and could he tell us in respect of the $36 million which the government had pledged whether the federal government has now come to an agreement with Bell Northern by which a portion of that has been paid back as full settlement.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, insofar as the loan of $6,729 million for capital assistance was given, this has been recovered in full.

HOUSING

INTEREST FREE LOANS FOR RENTAL HOUSING—BODY CONTROLLING RENTS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. It concerns the statement he made last week regarding the interest-free loans available to builders who will create rental housing at rents controlled by CMHC. Can the minister tell the House if these controls are to be exercised by CMHC independent of the Anti-Inflationary Board guidelines and of the rent controls of the governments of the provinces? In other words, are the controls in this sector of rental housing to be set unilaterally by CMHC and if so, at what level?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this has been the practice under the assisted rental program for the past many years it has been in existence. This raises a further question of whether it will come under—it will certainly come under the federal guidelines—the provincial programs. This is unlikely. In discussions with the provincial ministers they have said they prefer to exclude this because they realize it has been a compassionately administered program and they are quite happy to see it remain in the hands of CMHC. However, that will be finally confirmed when we meet with the housing ministers later this month.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could say at what level these are to be set?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, no specific level is set. The only increases allowed are those increases which are allowed because of actual costs. They are more tightly controlled than other rentals in return for the rental agreement which we have with the entrepreneur when the original arrangement is made which is renewed from time to time in order to make certain that it is checked up and current. The landlord can only raise his rent with the agreement of CMHC.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister now able to make a report to the House on the work of the interdepartmental committee which he set up to deal with the serious situation created by lay-offs by the CPR at its shops in Winnipeg?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I believe further meetings took place today, the details of which I hope to have for the hon. member before the end of the question period. Perhaps I could fill him in on the details later on in the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister, either himself or through that committee, look at reports to the effect that the CNR is laying off some of its security personnel.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT RATES—REQUEST FOR DISALLOWANCE OF INCREASE IN RATES ON CATTLE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It is further to some questions asked of him last Thursday I believe regarding a proposed increase in the cost of moving stocker calves from western Canada to Ontario. Has the minister had an opportunity to speak with the Canadian Transport Commission and can he say whether this proposed increased rate of 25 per cent which is to come into effect I believe later this week will be disallowed because it will represent in the year 1975 an over-all increase of about 71 per cent for single-deck cars and 87 per cent for double-deck cars which I am sure is beyond the government's guidelines.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to deal here very specifically with specific rates. Hon. members will be aware there was a freeze on certain rates and that therefore some more rapid than usual increases have taken place. We have already indicated to the CTC that we will expect them to play a role in making sure that the 95 per cent of margin rule is adhered to in the over-all rate setting, and we have been having further specific discussions about the question of how the guidelines are to apply, if at all, to specific rates as distinct from the 95 per cent margin rule.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, further to the specific question of rates there is another problem which involves a lot of sick cattle reaching Ontario from the west caused by so many delays in respect of cattle left in cars on sidings. A specific example—and the minister asked for this in answer to one of the questions asked last week—would the CPR car No. 277642 which arrived in Toronto on Friday—at 4 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McKinley: —and was not sent out to London until Sunday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vegreville.

MIRABEL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MATERIAL WHICH RESULTED IN LEASE TO SKY SHOPS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. It is supplementary to the question of the hon. member for Central Nova. Last Friday the Minister of Transport indicated he would examine the material he had affecting the contracts for the Sky Shops at Mirabel, and would determine what might be the best possible technique to deal with the request of the hon. member that the bids be tabled in the House. I wonder whether the minister has had an opportunity to review this information, and whether he can advise the House what action he intends to take in that regard.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there should be no problem at all in the House having information with regard to the bids. The question was rather broader than that and I am not prepared to deal with it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the specific question, the minister has had five days in which to review the contracts and calculations. Can he now advise the House how long we will have to wait until he will be in a position to present the information asked for by the hon. member for Central Nova.

● (1500)

Mr. Lang: The hon. member is really referring to a rather different issue. The question of the analysis of bids is something I have engaged in prior to the last series of questions in the House on Friday. The question referred to material upon which the analysis was made, and I do not have a report on that.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has come to my attention that on Remembrance Day the customary memorial wreath was not placed in the Memorial Chamber of the Peace Tower of this House. I understand that it has been a custom over the years, and I feel this is a question of privilege relating to all veterans who are members of the House and, indeed, veterans right across this land. If Your Honour feels that this is indeed a question of privilege, I would appreciate it if you would look into the matter to see whether there was any reason this was not done and, if so, report to the House on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises a subject of considerable importance and, I am sure, sensitivity among members of the House. My immediate information is that the usual wreath was placed there on behalf of the House of Commons, but whether or not such action by the government independent of the House of Commons is customary is a matter about which I am not immediately aware. In respect of the House of Commons, the usual action was taken; therefore, I would conclude that no question of privilege exists. But the hon. member has raised a point which I shall certainly look into and try to get some information on.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): I have one more comment to make, Mr. Speaker. I believe it is customary for His Excellency the Governor General to lay the wreath.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) 1975-76

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (A) for the financial year ending March 31, 1976 was presented by Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet):

That the Supplementary Estimates (A), 1975-76, tabled this day, be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows:

To the Standing Committee on Agriculture:

Agriculture votes 15a, 20a, 25a, 40a, 45a, and 50a.

Supplementary Estimates

Mr. Speaker, I have a long list which I believe is before you. I do not think there is any difference in view on the desirability of the references that I am proposing, and perhaps this list could be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 59 makes provision for the presentation of such motions. The House has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) about including the list in Hansard as if it had been read. Shall I dispense with the reading of the list?

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know it is no fault of the House leader or of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien), but we have just now received the estimates and we have gone into deep shock after noticing the amount of $1,750,000,000. However, since no statement was made by the President of the Treasury Board I will have to reserve my comments until later. I am probably in agreement with the general proposal made by the President of the Privy Council. I cannot say that what he suggested will fit the pattern, but certainly the estimates should be allocated to different committees. We just have to hope that the judgment has been sounder than the amount of the estimates.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that there was some consultation about the committes to which these estimates would be referred, and the motion does seem to be in accordance with those consultations.

[Editor's Note: The remainder of motion is as follows:]

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POST OFFICE

REQUESTED DEBATE ON POSTAL STRIKE

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26, I ask leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. This specific and important matter is the postal work stoppage which has continued for the past three weeks and is still unresolved in spite of the best efforts of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) and in spite of assurances of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that—

At some time the right of free collective bargaining has to give way to intervention by parliament when we judge that the public disservice caused by a strike outweighs the freedom of the right to strike itself.

The absence of this essential service is creating accumulating hardship for all Canadians, but particularly for those who receive their incomes and revenues by mail, those whose jobs have been terminated because of disruptions in trade and commerce, and those who have lost their livelihood as a direct result of this stoppage; for example, the letter carriers. It has also ended the exchange of mail with other countries, a serious consequence of which is the present and potentially permanent loss of foreign trade.

If acceptable, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House do now adjourn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 26, the hon. member has given the Chair notice of his intention to seek consent of the House to set aside a special time to debate the motion that the House do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing a specific and urgent matter, namely, that of the effect of the postal strike.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Motions of this sort respecting work stoppages in the country, particularly work stoppages in the public service—especially work stoppages in the public service that have gone on as this one has, for some three weeks—always cause great difficulty for the Chair. There are one or two contradictions which I am sure all hon. members will understand, the first being that since it has been the expressed will of parliament to give to workers in the public service rights that are akin to collective bargaining rights in the private sector, and therefore to include the right to strike, an immediate contradiction is posed if as soon as that right is pursued parliament is asked to consider it as an emergency.

The fact that the right to strike exists presupposes that when a strike in the public service is going to take place it will cause inconvenience of major proportions. Since that is anticipated, it is very difficult to say immediately that the exercise of the right to strike constitutes an emergency within the terms of Standing Order 26.

On the other hand, there is the contradiction that if Standing Order 26 exists for any purpose at all in order to move the House into a special session, surely a three weeks' strike in the postal service must be something which ideally comes within the four corners of that Standing Order, otherwise the Standing Order would not make sense.

The Chair, of course, must wrestle with these two contradictions every time a motion such as this is put in this kind of situation. There can be no question that the effect on the public that is described with respect to the proposed motion is very clear. It is, in fact, always a matter of critical importance when disruption of a national service of the nature of the postal service takes place. On the other hand, the language of Standing Order 26 makes it clear that if there is another reasonable opportunity afforded to hon. members of the House to discuss the matter, then Standing Order 26 ought not to be resorted to.

● (1510)

The fact is that, in the first place, not only today, which is obvious, but almost every day since the postal strike began or since the conflict between the postal negotiations and the wage and price legislation which is before the House began, this subject has formed a substantial part of the question period every day. I recognize that that tends to argue for both sides of the question. On the one hand, it argues that since there is the opportunity to use the question period, which has been taken advantage of, an emergency debate is not necessary; while at the same time it says that since the subject occupies half the question period every day, it is obviously a matter of importance which tends to come within the four corners of Standing Order 26. The fact of the matter is that the longer I go on with this reasoning, the further I get from a conclusion: I realize that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In the resolution of the matter I also have to take into account that pursuant to Standing Order 26 only one of the opposition days or allotted days has yet been used in the trimester which ends shortly, and therefore must be considered to pose fairly soon a reasonable opportunity for discussion of this matter. For that reason, and also for another reason which I think is consistent in respect of work stoppages of this sort, it seems to the Chair that in the area of the strike, work stoppage or negotiation itself—however that whole arena is described—as long as there is some activity which might produce a resolution within itself, then there would be resistance—not necessarily refusal, but certainly resistance—by the Chair to have parliament conduct a debate when it is open to speculation whether it would have a beneficial or an adverse effect on the outcome of the proceedings.

The specific activity, to be clear about what I refer to now, is not that talks or negotiations are carrying on, but that there is an obvious activity within the union which I think the Chair cannot ignore. As long as that activity may produce some kind of resolution, at least for the first application which is made pursuant to Standing Order 26, it would be my inclination to allow us to await a few more days' development to see what happens. I am sure that this in no way precludes the hon. member who raised this question today from raising it again two days from now, which is Friday, or at the beginning of next week if the developments in the area of negotiations and discussions themselves take a turn for the worse, or I have an indication that they are not about to bear fruit or to resolve the conflict.

POST OFFICE—LYNDHURST ONTARIO

Question No. 62—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 48 of the Second Session of the 29th Parliament to the effect that the annual rent paid by the government is $5,500 for a post office in Lyndhurst, Ontario, owned by Mrs. Deborah Lawlor, daughter of Area Postmaster, J. S. Hackett, and leased by the government as of May 1, 1973, is the Post Office Department or the Department of Public Works aware that the rental previously paid for a post office in Lyndhurst was $120 per year from 1960 to 1966 and $300 per year from 1966 to May 1, 1973 and, if so, what are the specific justifications for the large difference in rents between the former and present locations, which are both situated on the same street other than the somewhat increased amount in space?

2. Is the Department of Public Works aware that the present rental figure of $5,500 far exceeds the usual rentals in the area in question and, if so, what was the reason this excess was permitted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works as follows: 1. A group postmaster is responsible to provide adequate accommodation for the Post Office he operates and included in his remuneration is a certain amount to help him provide for such accommodation. These amounts are established by collective agreement with the Canadian Postmasters' Association. The Post Office Department does not get involved in the rental arrangements that may be made between a group postmaster and another party other than making certain the premises are satisfactory and centrally located within the village boundaries. In most instances the postmaster owns the premises where the Post Office is located. However, the conditions change substantially when a post office is elevated to Grade status. The Department of Public Works then becomes responsible to provide the required postal accommodation and this is usually provided in a Crown-owned or leased building, in accordance with post office specifications. Our file shows the postmaster at Lyndhurst, who has been in office since January 15, 1966, was renting space (136 square feet of work space plus 55 feet of public lobby) in a building owned by a Mr. Wing. The rental excluded heat and light which the postmaster had to provide. It is possible that his Predecessor, Mr. Fred Barry, postmaster from 1960, who retired on the December 17, 1965, also rented from Mr. Wing. The office remained a Group Office until the October 16, 1970 when it became a Grade 1, following a Unit of Work Survey. Subsequent to this, the Department of Public Works was requested to provide us with a new S.P. 1 building or acceptable rented premises. In accordance with the terms of the collective agreement, the postmaster continued to receive a rental allowance and provided premises under his own arrangement pending the provision of suitable Grade 1 office accommodation by D.P.W. The present postal premises were provided May 1, 1973. Hereunder is a comparison between the former and present accommodation.

Former accommodation	Present accommodation
Work Space 136′	Work Space 665′
Public Lobby 55′	Public Lobby 92′
Bathroom—none	Bathroom 42′
Mail Lobby—none	Mail Lobby 81′
Lock Boxes—none	Lock Boxes 168′
Night Lobby—none	Night Lobby 92′
	Storage Space 30′

2. The rental rate being paid is in line with recent lease arrangements in the area.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT CONTRACTS

Question No. 3,081—Mr. Beatty:

1. With reference to the contracts described in the twenty-eight Research and Development bulletins published up to and including the July 1975 issue let by the Department of Supply and Services, by department (a) what is the total value of the contracts (b) how many were publicly advertised prior to being awarded (c) what were their numbers and descriptions (d) what was their total value?

2. Of the contracts that were advertised before being awarded (a) how many had more than one bid submitted (b) what were their numbers and descriptions (c) what was their total value?

3. Of the contracts for which more than one bid was submitted (a) which contracts were awarded to anyone other than the lowest bidder (b) in each case (i) what were the bids submitted (ii) by whom (iii) for what reason was the contract not awarded to the lowest bidder?

4. Of the persons or organizations awarded contracts (a) what are the names of any who were previous employees of the government (b) on what dates and for whom did they work (c) what previous work have they done on contract for the government (d) at what cost to the taxpayer were the contracts let?

5. What are the names of contractors or principal investigators who have been awarded more than one contract and, in each case, what were the (a) numbers (b) descriptions (c) values (d) client departments?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The question requires considerable research and the information will be communicated to the hon. member at a later date.

NUMBER OF QUEBEC FIRMS GIVEN INCENTIVE GRANTS

Question No. 3,203—Mr. Howie:

How many firms in Quebec were given incentive grants by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 and how many are not currently operating?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 716 firms in Quebec were given incentive grants from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975, eight of which are not currently operating.

DREE—QUEBEC FIRMS IN RECEIPT OF GUARANTEED LOANS

Question No. 3,208—Mr. Howie:

How many firms in Quebec had loans guaranteed by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 (a) what was the total amount of the guarantees (b) how many of the firms are not currently operating (c) what was the total amount of guarantees to the firms not currently operating?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: seven firms; (a) $3,450,000; (b) one firm; (c) $140,000.

PAYMENT OF RETAINER TO HANGMAN

Question No. 3,306—Mr. Nystrom:

Does the government pay a retainer to Canada's hangman and, if so, how much has been paid for each fiscal year 1962-63 to date?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): No.

RENOVATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 3,341—Mr. Coates:

On how many occasions since 1968 has the Prime Minister had any of the offices and suites provided to him at public expense (a) renovated (b) refurnished and, in each case, what was the cost?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In 1971. See reply to the hon. Member's questions 126 (House of Commons Debates of March 29, 1972) and 2,584 (House of Commons Debates of December 19, 1973).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, June 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, when this House adjourned the debate on Bill C-58 last June 4, I was in the process of putting to hon. members excerpts from the overwhelming response received from my constituents in favour of Reader's Digest. Perhaps I should remind the government that on this bill there have been 38 speakers, including the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) who introduced the motion. Of these, only ten speakers have been in favour of the provisions of this measure where magazines are concerned. Moreover, of the eleven speakers from the government side of the House, only seven could be found to support it. Of these seven, one, the former minister of communications, Mr. Pelletier, has resigned from the government and his nominated successor, Mr. Juneau, was roundly defeated in a by-election.

These facts, coupled with the overwhelming protests which hon. members have received from their constituents about the provisions as they concern Reader's Digest and its French language counterpart in Canada, are a clear and straightforward indication of the immense unpopularity of what the government is trying to do with the magazine portion of this bill. What is the government trying to do? Its stated purpose is to help the Canadian magazine industry. It has used as its guiding principle the special Senate report on the mass media. This inquiry drew attention to two major problems. The first was the overflow circulation of U.S. magazines which have never been published in this country but which sends copies across the border to be sold on Canadian newsstands. Reader's Digest does not fall into this category. The second major problem as identified by the special Senate committee is the intense competition for advertising revenues among radio, television, newspaper and magazines.

Let me give this House some figures on this subject. Magazines coming from abroad circulated approximately 182,000,000 copies in Canada in 1974, according to the audit bureau of circulation reports. This compares with approximately 418,000,000 copies of Canadian magazines, not counting the circulation of Reader's Digest and Time. The 418,000,000 figure includes the circulation of mass circulation magazines like Maclean's and Chatelaine, the Weekend Magazine supplements and the controlled circulation consumer magazines. It does not include the wide variety of business and trade magazines put out by Canadian publishers. From these figures it can be seen that Canadian magazines outnumber magazine imports by better than two to one. Thus, the Senate special committee was able to report that most magazine publishers in Canada do not think of overflow circulation as a primary problem; it is simply part of the environment.

Where advertising revenues are concerned, the picture is a little different. In this competition, newspapers are the big winners. Of the approximately $1.5 billion spent on advertising in Canada, newspapers took $458 million in 1974—the last year for which there are figures—television took $225 million, radio took $176 million and those magazines with which Bill C-58 is concerned took a mere $37 million. The share of magazines amounts to a mere 2.3 per cent of the total spent in Canada on advertising. On this point, the Senate special committee said the following:

> Magazine publishers are painfully aware of the competition for advertising revenues from other media. It is a scramble between radio, television, newspapers and magazines for available advertising dollars and for the attention of audiences. Between 1954 and 1968, magazines' share of total advertising revenues dropped from 4.2 per cent to 2.4 per cent.

Bill C-58 does nothing to tackle either of these major problems, as pointed out by the Senate special committee. On the contrary, it proposes to weaken the industry by denying advertisers an important magazine medium. It will force them further into television, radio and newspapers to get the audiences they need. This will weaken the magazine reading habit amoung Canadians, create a monopoly for the Maclean-Hunter group of consumer magazines, and force a magazine that has honourably published in Canada for the better part of 30 years into a critical loss position.

The Association of Canadian Advertisers has stated that Bill C-58 would—> —tend to weaken the whole magazine field as a medium in Canada compared to the strength of television, radio and daily newspapers. Past experience has shown that taxes or other financial restriction . . . did not help Canadian magazines but, on the contrary, caused a total loss of advertising lineage in the 12 magazines that were members of the then magazine advertising bureau.

The federal government's own advertising program has not been redesigned to lend strong support to consumer magazines. Data from Elliott Research Ltd. shows that in 1974, of federal government expenditures of $8,873,000 on advertising in six media, daily newspapers received 49.1 per cent, television received 24 per cent, radio received 12.6 per cent, and magazines received 6.1 per cent or a little better than $540,000. So much for the government's desire to help magazines.

What is the target of the government's magazine policy? As we know from our mail and the comments of the Secretary of State, Reader's Digest is one of the targets. This House hardly needs reminding that Reader's Digest has established itself in Canada as a good corporate citizen. It has conformed to every guideline for good corporate citizenship ever produced by a Canadian government. I draw the attention of the House to the new principles of international business conduct issued by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as recently as July 18 of this year. Reader's Digest meets or exceeds all of those guidelines and has done so for many years. More than 30 per cent of its share capital is traded on the Montreal and Toronto stock exchanges. Five out of six of its directors are Canadian citizens of distinction who made public contributions to this country of extraordinary merit.

I think of Dr. Davidson Dunton, the director of the Institute of Canadian Studies at Carleton University, one-time chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and Mr. Jean Martineau, formerly chairman of the Canada Council. Such men are not going to lend their names to a corporation which does not serve the interests of this country.

Reader's Digest conducts all its publishing operation in Canada. It directly employs, as I said earlier, 500 people in its Canadian publishing operation. Another 1,000 people are indirectly employed in papermaking, inkmaking, printing and distribution. Its magazines are entirely edited in Canada by Canadian editors for Canadian readers. More than 90 per cent of its annual revenues stay in Canada. The Canadian content of its magazines, the equivalent in major articles to that of major consumer magazines in Canada, is circulated around the world to other Digest editions and can receive an exposure of up to 100,000,000 readers in 13 languages.

The corporation is a Canadian taxpayer, as are all its employees. The company's operations resulted in a payment to the Canadian Post Office in fiscal year 1975 for first, second and third-class mail of $2,774,548. Madam Speaker, that is a great deal of money. I would point out that in the year before they cut back, it reached the amount of $3,900,000. If that is not considered good corporate business and a good deal for the Canadian Post Office and the Canadian government, I do not know what is. Is the objective of this legislation to drive such an operation out of the country? If it is, there can be no doubt in anyone's mind that Canada will be the loser.

The unpopularity of moving against this company is well documented. A Gallup poll released in January of this year, conducted among Canadians at large, showed that less than 1 per cent of the Canadian public wanted the Digest to lose its present position in Canada. Research among Digest readers showed that 94.5 per cent say that they believe the Digest is "serving the Canadian purpose" as defined by the Secretary of State. The same survey showed that 82.5 per cent of Canadian Digest readers would disapprove of legislation that disallowed the expenses of advertisers in the Digest for tax purposes.

I might point out, Madam Speaker, that a poll of a great many readers in my area showed that a lot of them wanted the magazine. They said they did not think Reader's Digest should get an unfair advantage over Canadian magazines, however, by being allowed additional expenses. In other words, they were given the erroneous idea—whether by the press or other means—that there was actually additional revenue available to Reader's Digest that was not available to Canadian magazines.

The Secretary of State says that he wants to put Reader's Digest on the same footing with foreign magazines coming into the country. What is his reason today? When section 19 of the Income Tax Act was passed in 1965—in those days it was section 12(a)—the Liberal government of the day recognized that the Digest had had a prior history of corporate citizenship in Canada unmatched by any other foreign publication. It recognized that this magazine was serving the Canadian purpose and acted accordingly by not deeming the Digest to be a non-Canadian periodical. This was unquestionably behind the Digest's decision to sell part of its equity in Canada to Canadians in 1968. Its contribution to citizenship has increased progressively from the beginning. Its contribution to our nation's culture has increased also. Some 200 Canadian writers have appeared in its pages in the last ten years. It has developed some distinguished Canadian books.

Bill C-58 will not remove special tax privileges accruing to Reader's Digest, because there are not any. The bill will create special penalties that will put the Digest on the same footing as magazines like Playboy, Penthouse and such magazines which appeal to the more prurient interests of their readers. These magazines have never been published in Canada. They have no editorial staff here. They make no attempt to select their material for Canadian readers. They make no investment or commitment to this country. Reader's Digest does, and has done in the past. But this bill says to Reader's Digest, "sell out." It also says, according to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen), "Sell out", and the new owners cannot publish Reader's Digest in the form that has made it so popular.

Reader's Digest has specialized from its inception in the republication and condensation of articles that have already appeared in print. It is a digest. That is what its immense popularity is based on. The ability of its editors to select material of enduring interest, in convenient form, is its stock-in-trade. The interpretation of the act by the Minister of National Revenue would make that impossible. It would also deny the Digest the right to become a Canadian magazine and operate under its licence even if it did meet the ownership criteria.

How does this happen? The act stipulates that Canadian magazines must not publish under licensing agreements to foreign publications. The Digest has such a licensing agreement. It constitutes the company's sole legal right to use the Reader's Digest name on the magazines and other products, and to publish material from other Digest editions. The licence protects from unscrupulous use the rights and materials of the many authors who write for the Digest worldwide. No such licencing clause applies to newspapers, and thus the act applies a double standard in its provisions for newspapers and magazines.

The second key clause contains a similar discrimination. It requires that to be considered Canadian, issues of a Canadian magazine must not be substantially the same as one or more issues of one or more foreign periodicals. Again, no such restriction applies to newspapers. Yet the basis of the Digest's worldwide editorial operation is an exchange of articles of international origin and universal interest. Therefore, if the conditions of the act are to be met, a drastic change in the magazine's content and character would be necessary to make Reader's Digest selections different from what they are now. If such a change were made, editors of the Digest in Canada could no longer include in their editions material drawn from traditional Digest sources. No publisher and no reader can properly support such a grave restriction on a magazine's editorial freedoms. Nor should this House. While the licensing and substantially the same clauses remain in the act, there is no practical opportunity for the Digest as it now exists to be accepted as a Canadian magazine for tax purposes.

It is said that because of its licence the Digest has unfair advantages over Canadian magazines because the company has access at nominal cost to editorial material which is dumped in Canada. By definition, dumping is the importation and sale of a product, virtually unchanged, at a price lower than that charged in the originating country, so enabling a firm to undercut local competition. But Canadian Digest editions sell for the same basic price in Canada as in the United States and for a higher price than either of their major competitors, Maclean's and Chatelaine. Canadian Digest advertising rates, for a smaller page, are proportionately higher than in the U.S. and competitive with those of Canadian magazines. Moreover, the content of the Digest in Canada is selected by Canadian editors and fully edited for Canada. Dumping is not a factor where the Digest is concerned.

The Canadian Digest's method of paying for its foreign material is similar in principle to that of Canadian newspapers which subscribe to foreign and domestic news services and purchase rights to that material at less than the cost required to produce it. Readers and publishers thus benefit from the international news relayed by Associated Press, Reuters, and the comics, crosswords and columns provided by U.S. newspaper syndicates.

I should also be emphasized that articles on science, medical health and physical fitness and international news are of great interest to Canadian readers as they are of a global nature and would, of course, be classed as foreign material. None of these could be economically provided without the sharing of cost made possible by multiple use. The same principle applies to Digest material that originates in the British, German, Australian, U.S. or any Digest edition. The Canadian editions, I am informed, pay a pro rata share of development costs for publishing rights to the material they print. The same principle, quite obviously, applies to the new Maclean's magazine to which this bill will give a monopoly if it is passed. The publisher of this magazine, Mr. Lloyd Hodgkinson, said recently in a public statement:

Over the years Maclean-Hunter has built a formidable international communications empire. (Its size and scope may well astonish you. Its size and scope often astonish us). In Canada, we're involved in 101 various businesses, technical, consumer and special interest magazines and newspapers including Le Maclean, Chatelaine, Financial Post, the Medial Post; five radio stations; a TV station, cable TV and programming services. In England we produce 12 business and technical magazines. In the U.S. we have eight business journals and three cable TV systems. In South Africa, four magazines and six marketing services. In Europe, we co-produce six media publications in the key cities of Paris, Frankfurt, Milan, Vienna, and as of 1975 we're in the publishing business in Brazil.

These are the resources, Madam Speaker, that are to be put at the disposal of the new Maclean's. Is this the tender flower we are being asked to protect with Bill C-58? While looking through the Globe and Mail on November 5 I saw further evidence of how tenderly the competitors of Reader's Digest need to be nurtured. Homemaker's magazine and Madame au Foyer expect to become the largest consumer magazine in Canada, at 1.5 million circulation in 1976. The Globe and Mail reported that Mr. Edward Gittings, the publisher, said as follows:

—advertising revenue for the three publications—

He included Quest

—for the year will exceed $7 million, up 27 per cent over 1974—November issues of the three were the best yet with combined revenues of $1.3 million.

This statement, Madam Speaker, comes from the publisher of magazines started in 1966, 1967 and 1971 respectively. That is not bad, when you consider that the Secretary of State said on May 8 in this House that Canadian magazine publishers have been forced to exist for too long in an economic and psychological climate that has not been conducive to growth or new ventures. I submit that competition with other media not within the magazine industry is the important factor in the uncertain climate to which the Secretary of State referred. I demonstrated this with relevant and indisputable figures. I suggest that the Secretary of State should withdraw that portion of Bill C-58 dealing with magazines and bring forward legislation to tackel the real problems of the magazine industry. It should not be a bill that clearly favours one particular publisher who can boast of an international communications empire that astonishes us.

Now I would read an editorial printed in the Toronto Sun of October 30, 1975, entitled "Canadian Content":

The federal government is determined, at any cost to pride and integrity, to be rid of the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest. In the name of Canadian nationalism—and encouraged by those publications anxious to eliminate Goliath rivals that eat up half the available magazine advertising revenue—a dangerous, hypocritical, shabby act is being perpetrated.

Revenue minister Cullen now says a magazine must have 80 per cent Canadian content to qualify as "Canadian", thus entitling advertisers to tax deductions.

The Toronto Star with its knee-jerk nationalism and to hell with competition is all for the regulations. The Globe and Mail frets over the principles involves, and doesn't want government ruling on contents of publications. On this issue we are solidly with the Globe and Mail. (Why, on some days the Globe could barely qualify as "Canadian," so filled is it with material from the New York Times, London Observer, and Economist, not to mention AP and UPI! And it is a better paper because of its international scope.)

Content of publications is none of the government's business-unless they preach sedition or violence against the state. Government—any government—would love to manage, control, censor and dictate news.

That is true of this government. I continue:

To give any content decisions to government is a step all Canadian should oppose.

Maclean's and Saturday Night would like to see competitors removed from the arena. Understandable. Theirs is a vested interest and a conflict of interest. And their views should be ignored. If they can't hack it and appeal to Canadians on merit alone, then they don't deserve to survive. Time outselling Maclean's in Canada is like the Washington Post having more appeal in Toronto than the Star. An indictment of the home product.

● (1540)

If Canadian publications improved quality, they'll sell more, advertisers would use them more, and they wouldn't need government protection. What the new rules will do, is guarantee mediocrity in our magazines. Surely we've enough of that already.

I quote from the Vancouver Sun:

If there are tears to be shed they are not for two magazines that will, without doubt, continue to provide many of their two million Canadian purchasers—and at least twice as many readers—with a different, American version.

Rather, they are for a country that would allow its laws to be twisted by bureaucratic redefinition to apply to two specific publications, whatever the publications.

I hope that the government will reconsider, and in so far as Reader's Digest is concerned will listen to the great majority of the people in Canada who have said loud and clear that they want Reader's Digest to continue the same as in the past. They are saying to the Secretary of State, "Mr. Minister, keep your cotton-picking fingers off our magazine."

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Madam Speaker, the previous speaker made me think—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I can understand the cheering; it is not often that a Conservative spokesman makes me think, but this is one of those instances. He made me think that I do not know of any country in the world which at this point in its history would have this kind of debate taking place.

The essence of this bill, whatever the technical details, is that the government, at long last, is saying it is going to remove the special consideration from foreign-owned and controlled publishing companies. Can we think of any other nation where a majority of the speakers in the democratically-elected assembly of the country would be speaking in favour of maintaining foreign control over a major part of its publishing industry? They are speaking against a legislative measure which does not discriminate against them but puts them on precisely the same basis as any other foreign publication. I find it totally indicative of a colonial mentality that we should have managed to twist and turn this piece of legislation into something that it is not. I do not question the honesty and judgment of the previous speaker, but merely his conclusion. He and others have raised the matter of censorship as being at stake here. That is one of the most erroneous elements brought into the debate.

The government, in this instance, has made an appropriate decision. It is a problem of judgment. The decision is not only that tax benefits are not going to go to the two magazines, Time and Reader's Digest; the decision has been made to define a Canadian publication as, among other things, meeting the requirement of 80 per cent Canadian content. The purpose is not to stop those publications from being sold in Canada. If that were the case, I would be with the hon. member 100 per cent, because in my judgment that is where the issue of censorship would come in. All it does is remove a publication that does not meet those requirements from getting the same tax benefits as Canadian publications.

In this case, Time, and Reader's Digest will be in the same position as Newsweek, Playboy and all the other publications that come from south of the border. That is all. It is not that they cannot come into Canada or that we will put up tariffs to inhibit the free flow of thought. All this bill is saying is that the Canadian taxpayer will not give them a special concession. I agree that it is an element of judgment. How do you make a precise judgment of what is 80 per cent? I agree with the hon. member that there is no fixed and firm rule that will guide the people in National Revenue. However, there are other tax laws in which the element of judgment also plays a role. Frankly, I think the 80 per cent Canadian content rule makes sense if they are to benefit from Canadian tax law.

Where there is a mistake in judgment with regard to a taxation matter, that can of course be serious. There must be the right of appeal and persuasion if there is a wrong decision. However, I want to state categorically that it is misleading to suggest that censorship is involved. That is not the case at all. Publications will be able, and ought to be able, to flow freely into this country no matter what their source.

I am speaking on this, the sixth day of this debate, in the earnest hope that we will be able to vote on this issue today. As I said earlier, I can think of no other country in the world that would conceive of giving special tax concessions to publications owned and controlled outside its borders. The least we can do is to remove the special tax benefit from such publications and put them on the same basis as other foreign publications. Canadians can then read them. Canadians will continue to do so. However, it is time we put them on the same basis as other publications in Canada so that we will get some of the revenue flow from advertising going into genuine Canadian magazines. I understand that about 48 per cent of all magazine advertising revenue in Canada goes to Time and Reader's Digest. Hopefully, it will find its way into publications that are written, controlled, edited and owned by Canadians. Hopefully, we will then get a better periodical press in Canada which reflects a distinctively Canadian point of view.

Much has been made that legislation will benefit Maclean's. I am certainly no great advocate of Maclean's magazine or the interests that control it. I will say, however, that as a Canadian-owned and controlled publication, in terms of our tax law it should be different from a publication which is owned and controlled by a foreign operation and is a publication with substantially foreign content. Surely, that is what the legislation is all about: it is nothing more substantial, positive or negative, than that. I cannot understand the mistaken view that this is censorship. That is what a lot of Canadians think. They believe that in the future they will not be able to buy Time or Reader's Digest. But that is not the case.

I, like other members, have received a lot of mail from both inside and outside my constituency expressing the view that Time and Reader's Digest should be permitted to continue in Canada. I have written back saying that I agree they should be permitted to continue but that is not the issue. The issue is whether they should continue with special tax considerations that are not available to other foreign publications, and because of this we encourage revenue to go into publications which in my view would be more appropriately funnelled into those presently being generated within our borders.

It is interesting to note that the majority of Conservative spokesman have attacked this measure. I understood from their initial speakers that they would support the bill. It is now evident that they are not going to support it. That is unfortunate. The royal commission set up many years ago by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) recommended that the government remove these special considerations for Time and Reader's Digest. It was not done then by a Conservative government. It ought to have been done.

I regret the fact that the Conservative party, of all parties, a party which should have a special interest in the traditions of the nation, an interest in Canada forming a serious sense of its own role in the world and of its own past and the creation of its own future, should take the position of defending Time and Reader's Digest it terms of the tax situation. I would not be very surprised if it were the Liberals. After all, for years they have specialized in selling Canada out to foreign corporations. Nevertheless, in this one area, I am glad to say, the government has decided to remove the special considerations given to these foreign-owned corporations.

I will conclude by saying that I hope this is the last day of the debate, that we can come to vote and that the special privileges accorded to Time and Reader's Digest will be ended. These magazines will continue to be sold in this country, like Playboy, after the legislation has been passed.

People will still buy them and, hopefully, some of the money which is now going into the advertising coffers of those two publications will find its way into Canadian periodicals, not simply Maclean's but a number of others located outside Toronto, contributing to the birth of a healthy and vital, Canadian-owned, Canadian-controlled and Canadian-written magazine industry.

Mr. MacLean: Would the hon. member permit a question? It stems from his reasoning, which I followed with a great deal of interest. He argued that Time, Reader's Digest and other foreign magazines designed primarily for a foreign market should not be granted any tax benefit in Canada simply because they set up plant for the physical productions of their magazines in this country. Would he apply that same reasoning to automobile manufacturers—General Motors, for example—who design a car primarily with the United States in mind and then set up manufacturing plant in Canada? Should these corporations be deprived of Canadian tax benefits?

Mr. Broadbent: The question is an entirely reasonable one and I hope my answer is a reasonable one also. The hon. member has put his finger on two aspects of publishing; first, the location o f plant and, second, the origin of content. I am supporting the legislation because it says that conditions covering each of these aspects have to be met. In the case of the automotive industry, I accept it would be desirable to embody a requirement in the Canada-United States agreement specifying that a certain percentage of the research and development work would have to be done in Canada. In other words, we would not become merely an assembly plant operation. I have stated this publicly on a number of occasions. I, for one, would favour the adoption of requirements to ensure that a substantial portion of the creative part of the industry would be undertaken in Canada. Thus, I believe my position is a consistent one.

Mr. MacLean: And that automobiles should be designed for the Canadian climate?

Mr. Broadbent: Certainly.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Madam Speaker, I should like to take part in this debate for the purpose of opposing the legislation which has been presented by the government. What we have here, to my mind, amounts to non-tariff protection for two or three magazines, primarily Maclean's and Saturday Night, neither of which I consider makes much contribution to the periodical press of Canada or to the advancement of Canada generally. We have problems in the periodical press industry, but I do not think this legislation is going to solve them. I suppose the basic one is that our population is fairly small and that it is divided into two major language groups. Of our 22 million people, approximately 6 million read in French and the other 16 million do their reading in English. To compound the problem, the English part of the industry is centred in the city of Toronto.

As a result, the product of that industry is not as appealing as it should be to Canadians of the English tongue across the country. It can also be said that the product of this Toronto media centre is probably not too appealing to those who live 50 or 60 miles outside the city. There are many in Ontario who do not feel that Toronto is representative of their aims, desires or feelings about this country. Most Canadians are not concerned about the problems which are discussed on Bloor and Yonge streets.

As far as I am concerned, Maclean's claim to be Canada's national magazine is entirely fraudulent. I know they make an apparent attempt to show they have input from all parts of the country. Take, for example, Heather Robertson who has participated in articles for that magazine. She claims to come from the province of Saskatchewan, and I suppose the magazine hopes to impress Canadians by having a Saskatchewan point of view through looking at her output. But I would suggest that when you employ that type of person, she is really ashamed of the area from which she sprang. Some of her output, particularly the book "Grassroots of the Prairies," I would say was written by a person who is ashamed of the area from which she sprang. She brings that attitude toward her writings in Maclean's magazine and I think this is one reason it is not as popular as it should be.

Therefore, what we find in Maclean's and Saturday Night, as the two main English publications in the popular English press, is a rather parochial product appealing to a very limited number of people. It is important for the country as a whole to have access to events abroad, which these magazines have not been very successful in providing us with, and it is important to have the very best type of writing done with regard to our own Canadian affairs. I have always found these things in the Canadian section of Time which, I am happy to see, has recently been expanded. I suppose the government can be congratulated in that regard, because if it had not brought forward legislation to encourage improvement, perhaps we would not have seen that expansion. There should be government action to improve and expand avenues to good news reporting about this country and the world at large for Canadians. I think Time magazine does an excellent job. Reader's Digest also provides this window on the world which is important to Canadians.

● (1600)

Let us look at the product of our own publications. I have with me today the November 17 issue of Maclean's, the most recent issue of this newly-structured magazine that now appears twice a month in anticipation of the passage of this bill. It is of interest to note that in this magazine there are in excess of 25 full pages devoted to liquor advertising. I do not often agree with the premier of Manitoba, but I do agree with his recent call for taking away the privilege of allowing as an expense the cost of liquor advertising.

However, I do not know what Maclean's would do without all its advertising revenue. Certainly, liquor advertising is the largest single category of advertising in the magazine. Of the 92 pages in the issue, including the four cover pages, over 25 pages are devoted exclusively to the advertising of liquor. This indicates the dominant role which that industry will play in the future of Maclean's magazine. I do not think it is a healthy one, one that should be encouraged, yet apparently the government wishes to encourage it by reducing competition from other magazines.

Apart from liquor advertising, the second most common advertisements are those of the travel industry and automobile companies. These are all foreign-controlled, as are the bulk of the liquor advertisers. So who are we promoting? I suppose it could be said that we are promoting the product of foreign companies, and I do not think this is very essential to this country.

In addition to the government being unhappy about effective Canadian ownership of Time and of Reader's Digest, the government seems to wish to control the editorial comment of those magazines. I think this is a very dangerous step. We have already seen that the government does not mind using its authority to punish those who disagree with it. We have the recent example of the federal government withholding the advertising of its current campaign to reduce the use of energy in the Montreal paper Le Jour because it did not agree with the editorial policy of Le Jour. Thus, it is not averse to using its authority to back up its own political views.

For the government to demand that the content of a magazine, even though it is owned primarily by Canadians, must be 80 per cent different from that of the parent magazine is a very dangerous step. It seems to me a rather artificial or arbitrary way to act. The decision is a subjective one, as well, because one person's idea of difference may vary from that of another. I do not see how you can say that news or news-based stories should be 80 per cent different from those of the parent publication if one is at all interested in accuracy or fairness in the reporting of news. Also, as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) clearly pointed out, there will be loss of revenue to Canadians as a result of jobs lost if this measure is successful in driving Time and Reader's Digest out of Canada.

It is also of interest to note that when Reader's Digest came to Canada a certain percentage of our population subscribed to it. This percentage has not changed in all the years it has been printed in this country. I suggest that if Reader's Digest were forced to cease publication in Canada, there would still be as many people buying the magazine as before, with the difference that our Post Office would lose several million dollars revenue but would still be required to carry the magazine to Canadian readers. Those who print the magazine in Canada would be out of a job, and if they did not find another job they would become the recipients of unemployment insurance or welfare and would not pay income tax. Neither would the companies. Thus, we would have suffered the loss of what is, in effect, the Canadianization or Canadian view of foreign happenings as presented by very talented people in a way that has not been copied by any other existing journal in Canada.

I should like to close by quoting an article that appeared in the Calgary Herald on Monday, October 27, 1975—a paper that is also concerned about this question:

> Government control of magazine content, backed up by changes in the tax laws, is being used as part of an effort to destroy Time and Reader's Digest in Canada.
> That is a very dangerous precedent, even if the aim—to make fully Canadian magazines more viable—is praiseworthy. The regulations are not, strictly speaking, censorship. However, they tend to legitimize a mechanism for government interference in the decisions of a publisher. They also tend to create a climate which discourages vigorous criticism of the federal government—a disturbingly authoritarian government, at times. Donald Macdonald's decision to withhold federal advertising from a Montreal separatist newspaper is significant in retrospect. When a government begins to take measures against publications whose editorial position it dislikes, the habit can quickly become ingrained.
>
> The government's action against Time and Reader's Digest, admittedly, is not intended to silence voices of dissent. The hope is that stifling these two magazines will enable Maclean's, Saturday Night and the like to breathe more freely, commercially speaking. But no matter how noble its purpose, a government that sets out to destroy or financially cripple a magazine bears watching. It might develop a taste for blood.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

That is my great fear. Already we have had an example of what this government likes to do concerning people who do not agree with it. I think that if we allow a situation to develop in which editorial content will have to be 80 per cent different in relation to a certain publication, we will have the government imposing itself in an area in which it definitely should not be.

I should also like to point out that I do not see how these things can be considered as concessions. It is said that Time and Reader's Digest have received great concessions, as if we have been giving them something. I suppose they have concessions so far as U.S. News Report is concerned, but they do not have any concessions in relation to Maclean's, Saturday Night or any other periodical in this country. I do not like the use of that term. They are not on the same footing. I submit that if there were great merit to the product of Maclean's and Saturday Night, they would be able to compete and they would be in a position to grow in this climate. It has been perfectly obvious over the last number of years that they have been unable to do so. I do not see why the level of journalism should be dragged down to a lesser level just because these are wholly-owned Canadian publications.

There is also the question of what this bill will do in respect of professional journals. This measure could inhibit those publications which are necessary for the development of the country, economically speaking if not culturally speaking. I suggest it is not proper for the government to propose measures the only effect of which will be to drag down the level of journalism in this country and give the government the tools with which to impose control over its people.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on Bill C-58 one should point out that basically it affects four things.

An hon. Member: Are you for the people?

Mr. Horner: Yes, I am for the people. The great difficulty the present government has is in determining whether it understands the people and whether it is prepared to listen to the people. There is a very significant difference. That party just went through some kind of a conference in which a selected few had the right to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and their other leaders one question.

An hon. Member: That is wrong. You are talking through your hat.

An hon. Member: You hit a sensitive spot. Keep going.

Mr. Horner: Madam Speaker, I was prepared to make my comments in respect of the bill, but a member has interrupted me. I only point out that there is a question concerning who is listening to the people. That really is the question before the House of Commons today. I suggest the convention of the government party, namely, the Liberal party, at its recent semi-annual meeting demonstrated that it is not prepared to listen to the people. In the time allotted to me I want to demonstrate that the government does not listen to the people in respect of this particular bill.

This bill deals, effectively, with four means of communication. It deals with television stations operating from outside our border into Canada. It deals with daily newspapers operating in Canada. It also deals with Time magazine and Reader's Digest. First of all, it is regrettable that there is an attempt by means of this bill to deal with four different types of communication all with the same holusbolus attitude. Television stations should be dealt with in the sense of a broadcast means of communication, and should not be compared, with regard to content and ownership, to a newsmagazine. The bill refers to daily newspapers and their ownership. It does not refer to the content but, rather, strictly to the ownership.

I see the minister shaking his head in a negative manner. He suggests that I show him where. I suggest he read the Red Deer Advocate, which is one that comes to mind. Yesterday, when flying to Ottawa, I picked up the Calgary Herald and found that page after page dealt strictly with foreign news. I could real all about Squeaky Fromme in California, I could read all about Patty Hearst in California, and all about a family in Pennsylvania and their problems concerning one of their children who is ill. I do not complain about having that privilege. However, we are prepared to put through some kind of rule whereby a magazine must be 80 per cent different from another publication, yet we allow the daily newspapers to use UPI and other international news services and publish their news items in identical form in Canada: they are published here in the same form in which they are published in other countries.

To me, the bill is poor at best. It fails to differentiate between the media, and secretly is being used as a guise to censor what Canadians read. Why should it be used as a guise to impose censorship? I do not know. I have always been proud that in this country, because we have a highly educated population, we feel that our people should be in a position to read almost anything that is published. I say «almost anything» because I know there are some literary works which perhaps immature people would be better off not reading. However, I refer to news magazines and family magazines in particular.

One must remember that 20 years ago there was a great fear about communism, and we in this country said the people should read all about Karl Marx and other communist literature because we believed, with our educational process, that the people would sort it out and reach the right conclusions. What is the government afraid of? Why does it feel that censorship is necessary? What is wrong with Reader's Digest as a family magazine? I was particularly pleased that Reader's Digest was given to my family as a gift when we were first married, over 20 years ago. It has been in the household ever since. I think it gives my children, my wife and myself a look at the world. Some of us are not as fortunate as ministers in the government who travel around and see the world: we have to read about it. We have to read about the various countries and what is going on in them. Reader's Digest does an admirable job of printing stories about other countries and it does an admirable job of printing articles which cannot be considered nationalistic in any way, such as articles about the human body and about health. These articles cannot be classified as being Russian, American or Canadian. These are informative articles to which all Canadians should have access.

● (1620)

To lump Reader's Digest and Time magazine together in one bill is a mistake. Time magazine purports to be a news magazine, while Reader's Digest is a family magazine. Are we afraid of the competition these two magazines will present to Canadian periodicals? I do not think we should be. Maclean's magazine has had tremendous success in the last five years. Its circulation has grown and it now comes out bimonthly. Its circulation in Canada is greater than that of Time magazine. In my opinion, however, even in its new edition Maclean's does not take the place of Time magazine. In this legislation we should not lump the two magazines together.

Reader's Digest has done an admirable job of complying with the ownership requirements of the Canadian government in the past number of years. I am told that in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent of Reader's Digest is owned by Canadians, that they print in Canada all the copies of their magazine sold in Canada, and that they print some 200,000 in French for those people who desire to read the magazine in French, whether they be in Quebec or in other parts of Canada.

It seems to me that they make a concerted effort to comply with the real wish of the government that the magazine be owned by Canadians and that the requirement of service to Canadians be complied with in their effort to sell their stock to Canadians and to print their magazine in both French and English. I believe they should be commended, not condemned. To suggest to them that 80 per cent of their content must be substantially different from the content of their magazine published elsewhere would almost prohibit Reader's Digest from publishing in Canada and receiving the same kind of break that all other magazines distributed in Canada have, whether it be Chatelaine, which might be considered a family magazine in close competition with Reader's Digest, or any other magazine.

I do not consider Chatelaine to be in competition with Reader's Digest. It has a greater distribution in Canada than Reader's Digest and does not, or should not, fear the competition. We must believe that competition is good for the industry, not bad, and that competition is good for the reader. In my opinion, in this legislation the government is moving deliberately to curtail distribution of Reader's Digest and its participation in the Canadian economy, which the latter has demonstrated a desire to do. I reprimand the government severely for not listening to the thousands and thousands of readers of Reader's Digest in Canada.

A moment ago I was interrupted by someone who asked who was listening to the people. I wish the readers of Reader's Digest would be listened to by the government. Perhaps one in 300,000 or one in 400,000 agree with Bill C-58, but the rest do not; the rest wish the government would allow Reader's Digest to continue its work of serving the Canadian people.

Time is a peculiar magazine. It has been in plenty of hot water in the past. Sometimes it is not too flattering to us, the politicians in Canada, and sometimes we do not particularly like it for that reason. But I think it should be judged on its ability to provide a necessary service to Canadian readers. Time magazine has been in my home for so long that I cannot remember when we first began to subscribe to it. It was in my parents' home for so long that I cannot remember the time when it was not around.

Why did I feel I should subscribe to it? It gives a summary of current events in Canada, the U.S. and the rest of the world. I am not ashamed of wanting to read what is happening in the United States. Whether Canadians like it or not, we are tied to that country by something like 4,500 miles of border that separates us. Our trade is closely linked with the U.S. Some 65 per cent of the goods we import are from the U.S. and some 65 per cent of the goods we export go to the U.S. It behooves every Canadian to know what is going on in the United States. We can better prepare ourselves for conditions which may occur here in Canada.

It is sometimes said that our economy lags behind that of the U.S. by around six months; that what is happening in the U.S. will happen here in six months' time. I do not know if it is a rule of thumb at all times, but certainly it behooves any Canadian who wants to keep abreast of world affairs to read not only the Canadian section of Time magazine but some of the American content and some of the world content. One might wonder why one should read the Canadian content in Time magazine. As a member of parliament, I am supposed to be well informed on Canadian politics. I can honestly say that, apart from reading Canadian daily newspapers, I like to read Time magazine where the news is summed up—whether correctly or incorrectly does not matter. On some occasions I agree with them, and on others I do not; nevertheless, they put out the best weekly capsule on current Canadian news that I have been able to read.

I might say that I have subscribed to Maclean's magazine for a number of years. It has been the wish of Maclean's management to send me, personally, a copy, so that we get two copies of Maclean's in my household. Maclean's does not contain, yet, a weekly or bi-weekly summary of the news. I could complain at length about the format of the new Maclean's magazine, but I do not want to complain about it. The argument here is whether or not it needs protection from Time magazine, which receives similar advantages under the Income Tax Act.

It is not amusing for me, as a longtime student of politics, to see the recent trend in the Liberal party. We see the present young minister attempting to bring in protection for Canadian publications, we see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) attempting to bring in protection in the field of agriculture, and we see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) trying to bring in protection for Canadians under their jurisdictions.

Mr. Symes: It is almost as if they were Conservatives.

Mr. Horner: Yes, Conservatives of the 1911 era. Some protection was warranted in 1911, 1912 and 1920, but surely it is not warranted today, either in agriculture or in the news magazine field. In my opinion, this whole question has not been adequately aired. I know that one should not use colour, but it is interesting to see that this bill has been piloted by three rather green and naive ministers. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) at one time was involved with this bill. There was the former minister of communications and the new Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen). They are all ministers doing what they are told. Where does this lead us? The Montreal Star—

● (1630)

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Someone said, «Oh», as if he were in pain. The Montreal Star is a well established paper in Canada, noted for its Liberal leanings in the past. However, in an editorial it stated the following:

> Whatever the good intentions may be of the framers of this legislation and no matter how far-fetched the idea of such control may appear to be, it is the beginning of a road which has an inevitable end.

The inevitable end is censorship. As I say, the Montreal Star is a Liberal paper and it has been for years, but it foresees the dangers of this type of legislation. One can read editorials in all kinds of newspapers, including the Sudbury Star. The Sudbury area has not been favoured hunting ground for Conservatives, in any case.

Mr. Nystrom: It is a good NDP area.

Mr. Horner: With regard to this legislation, the Sudbury Star carried the headline, «Censorship creeps in 'patriot' guise». I only point that out, Madam Speaker, because Sudbury is the constituency of Mr. Speaker. One could read editorials at length. The Toronto Sun stated clearly that it views this bill as a step toward censorship. It went on to say that on this occasion it even agrees with the Globe and Mail, and suggests why on some days the Globe and Mail could barely qualify as Canadian. That is what I was stating, in no derogatory terms, about a Calgary paper in the earlier part of my speech. However, certainly all the daily newspapers could be taken to task with regard to the question of 80 per cent Canadian content if one really analysed all the daily papers in major cities across Canada. The Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Journal probably have greater Canadian content than any of the other daily papers, but only because of their proximity to the House of Commons.

Let us look at Canadian content in its proper context. What about the national television news? We complain about content in news. By what means is the mind of a young child more motivated or more shaped than television itself? If one watches the 6.30 news, in my opinion it will be found that with regard to Canadian content it is substantially better than the eleven o'clock news. However, from the eleven o'clock news it is interesting to note that Canadians learn so much about Patty Hearst that she must be some kind of Canadian heroine.

Some time ago one of the proponents of the Company of Independent Canada did a study of Canadian school children. He posed a series of questions to school children and was appalled by the answers he received and by how often Canadian children were incorrect. Some of those children were as high as grade 12 but they knew little about Canada and Canadiana. Is it the fault of Time magazine, or Reader's Digest, that young people are so ill-informed about Canada? No. I suggest that young Canadians are not avid readers of Time and Reader's Digest, although they should be. Young people are ill-informed about Canada because it is not dealt with on the national news on television or by the daily headlines in newspapers. If one were to consider the percentage of Canadian news broadcast every evening on CBC and CTV, one would become alarmed. Little wonder Canadian students are so well informed about whether Patty Hearst is mentally sound or able to stand trial. Why should Canadians know about that? I do not think she is a heroine of any particular cause in which Canadians should become involved. Canadians were well indoctrinated with respect to the Viet Nam war by the national news media.

Mr. Symes: And Time.

Mr. Horner: That may be so, but Time never covered that story so comprehensively as the national news media. If we are so concerned about Canadian content, let us go where the most persuasive forces are really at work, the national news media, and not to independent television stations sitting along the border trying to be good corporate citizens. I am thinking particularly about a situation in the Vancouver area.

Miss Campbell: Pirate.

Mr. Horner: A pirate is anyone who steals the property of someone else.

Mrs. Campagnolo: And money.

Mr. Horner: Many ideas have been stolen from one political party or another and I am not going to get into the question of pirates, but I believe that many of these television stations are attempting to become good Canadian corporate citizens. It is wise for the Canadian government to lay down guidelines for them to become good Canadian corporate citizens, but those guidelines should not make it impossible for them to be good Canadian corporate citizens—that and is what this bill is doing to Reader's Digest particularly, and to some of the television stations operating close to the Canadian border. Certainly, exceptions will have to be made for daily newspapers such as the Red Deer Advocate and a couple of others operating in Canada.

The minister should fully explain why the government wants this legislation. If the government does not explain it any better than it has to date, it will have failed. According to the people I have been listening to, the government has failed to convince them. It has failed to convince the news magazine business.

I am not arguing the fact that the government has failed to convince Maclean's magazine. That magazine would like to get Time out of the road; then it would have a monopoly. Who would be better served by a monopoly? Just recently the Minister of Transport said he believed in competition in the transportation field, and when he is not throwing Air Canada to the wolves he leads us to believe that he is going to give CP Air some advantages it has not had until now because of the theory of competition. Yet here we have another minister acting in a directly opposite manner by attempting to force Time magazine out of business and making it more costly for Time to produce its Canadian version, because he wants to be rid of competition. He wants to help Maclean's magazine, and I do not doubt that Peter Newman and company will favour him in the next election—and his leader, whoever that might be. I suppose that Maclean's will go down in history as a Liberal rag. I hope its future is brighter than that. I hope it will continue to publish in spite of good competition from Time magazine.

I think Time magazine does publish a Canadian version. They pay specific attention to Canada on six or eight of the front pages, and that is worth something. Canadians should be entitled to read those six or eight pages as well as some news from the United States and other parts of the world, just as we are entitled to view happenings from all over the world on our late night television news. We know more about the dispute in Northern Ireland than our proximity to Ireland warrants. The nightly news programs became tired of that issue and aired another. They follow trends. I suppose we will now get a large dose of Australian parliamentary problems, and maybe we should; I am not complaining about it.

My complaint is that in this legislation the government is attempting to prohibit me, my constituents and people across Canada who think as I do reading about these events in Reader's Digest, Time magazine or the Red Deer Advocate, or seeing it on the TV stations. They are all attempting to become good corporate citizens and for one reason or other have found it an advantage to become established at or near the border.

When the legislation goes before the standing committee and witnesses are called, I hope the minister in charge of it will listen to them. As a result, perhaps he will bring in different legislation which will not lay him open to the charge of censorship. I like the minister, Madam Speaker, and I do not think he wants censorship. I think he owes it to himself and his constituents, however, to attempt to remove that stigma. In a free country, censorship is perhaps the most damning accusation that could be levelled against anyone.

Mr. Faulkner: If it were true.

Mr. Horner: The minister says, «If it is true.» He agrees with me that it is the most damning accusation that can be levelled against anybody, if it is true. That is the strange thing about politics, though; it is not what is true but what is believed to be true. I read that the Sudbury Star believes it is censorship, the Toronto Sun believes it is censorship. The Montreal Star, the Toronto Sun, the Vancouver Sun, the Moncton Transcript—all those newspapers perceive this minister as the minister of censorship. Why go across the country holding his hand aloft and saying, «It is not true; believe me, please.» Why does he not listen to the people, study the bill in committee and then agree that changes should be made, that Time and Reader's Digest should be separated and that television stations should be viewed in a different light. The minister would do himself a tremendous favour. He is a young man and new to politics. Many of us had high hopes for him until he became the minister of censorship. In a free country, one cannot go far with that kind of label. He is perceived as one who is directing Canada down some strange path in wanting to censor what we and our children can read and see.

I suggest that if this bill passes and this minister remains in office, we will see the national television news regulated to a greater extent than it is today. The Global television station already complains about the stringent rules they have to meet because of financial difficulties. I suggest the daily newspapers will be next, then the national television stations, and soon reading material will be smuggled in—other than obscene reading material which I have never agreed should be distributed in any case. That is what I see ahead under this young minister. I believe this is dangerous legislation and should be widely debated in this House and in committee, where witnesses should be called. I hope the minister and his colleagues will listen to the people and adjust their stand in accordance with the criticism that has been levelled at this piece of legislation.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate shall be very brief. I hope that the debate in future will be as brief as my statement. I point out that Bill C-58 originated in a notice of ways and means tabled on April 17, 1975. That notice of ways and means was concurred in on April 18, 1975, and the bill was given first reading on that day. The bill was debated at second reading on May 8, 16, 20 and 26 as well as on June 4 and, of course, today.

It is the government's opinion that the issues raised by this bill would be best resolved after full committee hearings. I was very happy to hear this view expressed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). Consequently, I have discussed with my counterparts the question of completing the debate on the motion for second reading and reference to committee of Bill C-58 and I am obliged to report that agreement could not be reached, under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or Standing Order 75B, in respect of proceedings at the second reading stage of Bill C-58, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. Therefore, in accordance with Standing Order 75C I hereby give notice that at the next sitting of the House I shall move that not more than five additional hours shall be allotted to the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage of the said bill.

Mr. Horner: Closure on censorship.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, the honourable member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) labelled the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) as the minister of censorship. Now the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) has risen and placed closure on the House of Commons on a censorship bill.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Faulkner: It is not a censorship bill.

Mr. Epp: That is exactly what he has done; he has said that this House will no longer have an opportunity to debate and to present the views of Canadians in this House. The young member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) asks if two weeks' debate is not enough. I say that if the people's representatives here want to speak on the bill and they have representations from their constituents, they have the right to express them in this House of Commons, no matter what the hon. member for Assiniboia says. I say to him, "No, two weeks is not too long."

● (1650)

By saying it will bring in closure, the government is telling this country, «We will introduce censorship. We want to control the press, say who shall and shall not publish news, and what you may or may not read.» You must admit that the government is honest: it is doing what it said it would ever since it introduced Bill C-58 earlier this spring. It intends to control news coverage in this country. Already, by allowing the CRTC to control the content of our television programs under the mistaken guise of nationalism, it is controlling what every Canadian is entitled to see. Now the government wants to close debate, to ram this bill through the House. Would it have done this between 1972 and 1974 when it was a minority government? Would Bill C-58 then have been forced through the House?

Mr. Nystrom: The NDP held the balance of power.

Mr. Epp: But you blew that, son! Now the government is to use its majority to force the bill through on second reading. This is a sad day for the people of Canada. Hon. members may say that our fears are groundless, that we are hoisting false danger signals. We are not. We say it is dangerous for the government to be involved in censorship and to say what we can and cannot read or see. Now, when the country is enduring for the fourth week a national postal strike and hearing the government explaining its restraint program, we are debating this particular issue the outcome of which will determine if certain magazines are to have the right to exist. On top of this, the government seeks to invoke closure. Where are the government's priorities? This is a sad day for Canadians.

Mr. Paproski: A shameful day.

Mr. Epp: The government unabashedly admits it is willing to close the debate. It will not listen to our representations; it will do as it jolly well pleases. Has not almost every member of this House received letters from average Canadians who support the continued existence of Reader's Digest and Time? Do these letters not ask us not to impose closure? I submit that almost every hon. member has received such letters which are overwhelmingly in favour of the retention of Reader's Digest and Time, and oppose Bill C-58. But the government will not listen. I challenge government backbenchers not to remain silent but to speak and tell us they are concerned about the implications of Bill C-58. Let them speak their true feelings.

Mr. Paproski: They are afraid.

Mr. Epp: Why are they afraid? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. They fear that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his annual bestowal of parliamentary secretaryships and other goodies, will pass them by.

Mr. Paproski: He does not even do that any more.

Mr. Epp: Consequently, they remain silent. How will the 80 per cent content rule affect Canadians? How will it affect our daily newspapers?

Mr. Paproski: They will be next.

Mr. Epp: I am concerned, as I am convinced that the government's action could involve the censorship of our daily newspapers. They receive news stories from United Press International, which is not a Canadian news dispensing service, from Reuters, from independent writers and from Canadian Press. How is the content of some daily newspapers to be 80 per cent different from, say, that of their counterparts in the United States? For example, must the content of a Windsor newspaper be 80 per cent different from the material printed in some newspaper across the river, in Detroit? At present, the 80 per cent rule affects only Reader's Digest and Time. But when will it affect others? After all, why should not the government, which will close this debate, not take the next step?

What about television? Let me tell hon. members something that happened in my riding. For several years, near one extremity of my riding, people were able to receive the television signals of station KCND, situated near Pembina, North Dakota. That was the only television signal available in the area. What happened? Suddenly, that television station was called a pirate. Why? It was situated in the United States and was beaming signals into Canada. Manitoba advertisers were advertising on that television station and people in the southeastern part of the province picked up the television signal. What happened? The hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo) called the station a pirate, said it took our money and was against it. I point out that the CBC did not provide service in the area.

Mrs. Campagnolo: The CBC could provide service if it had more money.

Mr. Epp: Let me tell you what happened. Certain influential people said that television KCND was siphoning away Canadian advertising dollars and that advertisers on that station should not be able to deduct their expenses for tax purposes. In the end, the television station was sold. Another station, CKND, beamed programs from Winnipeg; only the call letters were changed. In the end, southeastern Manitoba was without television coverage. Station KCND had been called a pirate. After all, it was American and we were not to watch it. It was sold. So far the CBC does not provide television coverage, either in English or French, and the CTV network does not cover the area. In the end, we presented two petitions, one to the Secretary of State, who answers in this House for the CBC, and one to the CRTC. What were we told?

Mr. Paproski: Tell us.

Mr. Epp: We were told, yes, we could get coverage. But before hon. members leap for joy, let me tell them when it is to be. In 1978 there is to be an application and—just perhaps—we shall be given television coverage by 1980. I raise this issue to show what government interference can do. The same can happen under this bill. I will not mention what is happening to cable; that is another topic.

The question is, if Reader's Digest and Time in their present forms are discontinued, will Canadians buy more Canadian publications? Is that the way to build the Canadian publishing industry? Clearly, a magazine's major competitor for advertising revenue is not another magazine; it is the other forms of the media. I suggest that radio and television siphon off a much larger proportion of advertising dollars than some hon. members are willing to admit.

When making a comparison with other countries we find that magazines in Canada receive a smaller percentage of the total advertising dollar than those of other industrial nations. In Canada, this is approximately 2.3 per cent of the revenue generated by advertising, in the United States it is 6.5 per cent, in the United Kingdom 8.5 per cent, in France 16.8 per cent, and in West Germany 27.9 per cent. I sincerely question whether the Canadian publishing industry has in the past been publishing the type of material Canadians want to read. In a free enterprise system such as we have, whether or not you are going to sell a product depends primarily on whether people are willing to buy it. They will only buy your product if they feel it is useful or will enhance their quality of life.

I believe Canadian magazines today are not struggling because of Time or Reader's Digest but because Canadians, individually, think those magazines are not worthy of their support to anywhere near the degree the magazines expect. Legislating Time and Reader's Digest out of existence does not guarantee that the revenue will go to other Canadian magazines. Quite likely, a lot of it will just dry up. A larger amount will go to other of the media, such as television, if the CRTC does not have a hand in that. If the CRTC is the watchdog of Canadian television, why does it not say to these terrible multinational corporations that the NDP spout about so often, that this is non-Canadian content and therefore should not be used for tax purposes? This can be carried to ridiculous extremes.

What is needed is a Canadian publishing industry that will develop its own magazines in the way that other businesses develop. It should promote the sale of its product and build a reputation over the years. That is how to sell a product; it is not done by asking the government to legislate you into existence by legislating someone else out of existence. In particular, closure should not be used to bring them into existence.

What about the contribution made by Reader's Digest? I believe it has made a very significant contribution to Canadian writers. Stories by Canadian writers have appeared on a frequent, regular basis. For example, Farley Mowat, a writer from Newfoundland, is known right across this country. I believe this is partly because of the coverage he has received in Reader's Digest. In addition, Canadian writers receive recognition through the international connections of Reader's Digest: it publishes in many countries.

Canadians view Reader's Digest as an asset. I believe it is part and parcel of Canadian life. I want to bring out a point that I think is important. When I was teaching high school, Reader's Digest was one magazine that could be used for extra reading material. It was particularly good for those students not receiving any other magazines or daily newspapers. I believe Reader's Digest has made a real contribution. It is something that Canadians want. They subscribe to it. Why, then, do we have to have such a narrow point of view and say that it is wrong and anti-Canadian because it does not fly the Canadian flag? I cannot understand the government, and this minister in particular, having to resort to closure to say that this is the way it has to be.

The government should listen to the Canadian people. It should listen to those of us in the House of Commons who have been listening to our constituents. Is the government listening? I believe not. Surveys have shown that 75 per cent of Reader's Digest readers would be disappointed if the Canadian edition were no longer published. It has very high credibility among its readers and subscribers. Of those polled, two-thirds said they would disapprove of legislation that would make it economically impossible for Reader's Digest to publish a Canadian edition.

Reader's Digest is a family magazine. There are very few such magazines on our newsstands today. There is a profusion of «skin» magazines on our stands. Smut is imported and spread across the length and breadth of this country. People with young, impressionable minds are able to buy those magazines, most of which are foreign. However, the minister has not taken any action against them. He has not decried the fact that they exist. He argues that a person should have the right to read and see anything he chooses. However, when it comes to this family-oriented magazine, he says no. Surely the minister has a clearer view of life than that.

As a family magazine, the standards of Reader's Digest have always been high. I seriously question what the minister is trying to prove by legislating it out of existence. The minister has asked the executive officers of Reader's Digest to prove that they are serving the Canadian purpose. I presume the minister means they are to show that they are part and parcel of Canada's economic fabric, that they are making a significant contribution and are good corporate citizens.

Statistics have been cited. Possibly they bear repeating, especially now that the government has said the debate will end after five hours because the opposition has forced them to stand still on this question. At the present time, Reader's Digest directly or indirectly employs 1,500 Canadians. Most of those employees live in Quebec. I ask, «Where are the Quebec members on this issue?»

● (1710)

Mr. Roy (Laval): Not in the Conservative party.

Mr. Epp: You are saying you do not mind that your constituents will be unemployed, unable to find employment.

An hon. Member: But where is Wagner?

[Mr. Epp.]

Mr. Epp: You are saying that it is of no consequence. My hon. friend from Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) has probably spoken on this issue, while you do not have either the ability or the intestinal fortitude to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The hon. member should address the Chair.

Mr. Epp: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the reminder. I needed it, and members opposite needed to be bailed out. It has been pointed out that Reader's Digest, as far as direction and management are concerned, is overwhelmingly Canadian. Five out of its six directors are Canadians. Its president and all its officers are Canadian. It has some 600 Canadian shareholders. What about investment? Substantial investments have been made in Canada. I have already pointed out that this publication has helped many Canadian writers. All these things considered, we say the government is taking an entirely negative attitude when it seeks to legislate Reader's Digest out of existence here. One can only wonder at the mentality of members opposite when they bring forward this type of legislation at a time in our history when so many things are going on which make us fear for our future.

We hear it said that Reader's Digest and Time benefit from tax privileges which Canadian publications do not enjoy. But take the case of any businessman operating in Canada today. If he buys equipment or goods from another country, none of us has ever suggested that the money he spends in so doing should not be deductible for tax purposes. I refer hon. members again to the case of the television station in Pembina, North Dakota, to which I drew their attention. It by no means follows that advertising will go to Maclean's or Saturday Night if this legislation is passed. Of course, Maclean's is in favour of this bill. It has a vested interest in its passage. Is the government trying to tell us that Maclean's is more sensitive to Canadian needs than Reader's Digest or Time?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Epp: Is that what they are trying to tell those who live somewhat east of Toronto the good, that Maclean's is the only expression of Canadian nationalism?

An hon. Member: The best.

Mr. Epp: Is that what you are trying to impose on us?

Mr. Gilbert: Is that a rhetorical question, or do you want an answer?

Mr. Epp: I have the answer; it is to be found in the intent of Bill C-58. It is quite clear. Yes, Maclean's is to be the voice of Canada's magazine industry. One gathers this from the bill as well as from the lobby that Maclean's has mounted, one which is as well organized, one might say, as the lobby organized by Time and Reader's Digest; it has been well organized in both cases. Granted the corporate offices of Time and Reader's Digest are not in Canada, but since when has it become illegal in this country for a company other than a Canadian company to do business here as long as it obeys the laws of Canada? Is this the way to build Canadian nationalism, by legislating it, or a form of it?

My last question concerns the subject of censorship. Members opposite will say that this is not a bill which imposes or implies censorship.

An hon. Member: What about closure?

Mr. Epp: We already have closure. This is censorship. Let us take a look at what Canadians, particularly Canadian editors, are saying. It is they, I submit, who are most informed about the power of the press, the power of the mass media, to influence the opinions of Canadians. It is they who are, possibly, more aware of the dangers inherent in this type of legislation than the average Canadian or the ordinary member of parliament. I will begin with the Ottawa Citizen and an editorial dated October 25, written by Christopher Young who I believe has certain connections which I do not intend to go into. He wrote this:

It is accepted now in our society that governments should make rules about how much lean meat is in the bacon package, what kind of information is provided on the clothing labels, what safety devices are built into the chassis of a car. It is not accepted, and should not be accepted, that governments will make rules about what kind of material can go into a newspaper or magazine written, edited and produced for the consideration of the public.

The point is not whether you or I like these magazines or admire their methods. The point is that it is wrong in principle and dangerous in practice for any government to assume power to control the contents of the commercial press.

Reference has already been made to the Sudbury Star. The article on its editorial page on October 28 of this year was entitled «Content? Silly, risky censorship.» The Toronto Sun of October 30 had this to say:

Maclean's and Saturday Night would like to see competitors removed from the arena. Understandable. Theirs is a vested interest and a conflict of interest. And their views should be ignored. If they can't hack it and appeal to Canadians on merit alone, they don't deserve to survive.

What about the Moncton Transcript? In a editorial on October 28 the paper had this to say:

The dangerous aspect is that this policy opens the way to control of editorial content in all publications, including newspapers. No doubt there are those in government and in the public service who would be only too glad to muzzle the free press. They know that if the people are to be manipulated, to be made subject to the dictates of those who would be their masters rather than their servants, an essential prerequisite is state control of the media.

The Hamilton Spectator has this to say in the first paragraph of an article dated October 25 and entitled «Basic freedom eroded»:

● (1720)

We have said it before and we intend to keep saying it. The federal government's decision to control the content of Time magazine and Reader's Digest is a dangerous precedent in a democratic society.

The Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper with which I am a little more familiar, in a recent editorial reiterated its position as being small «l» liberal in philosophy. If that paper has been watching this administration for many years I should like to report that it is becoming more and more small «c» conservative.

An hon. Member: You mean big «C».

Non-Canadian Publications

Mr. Epp: That would be even better news to me. In an editorial dated October 28 entitled «Nationalist madness», it had this to say, and I am sure the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) will be interested in this piece of information.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I have read it.

Mr. Epp: You agree with it?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I said I have read it.

Mr. Epp: It reads, in part:

This kind of restrictive legislation serves no good purpose and profits no one; it works only to the disadvantage of the public, which has never been consulted and whose protests are overwhelmed by the self-serving propaganda of publishers, politicians and nationalists.

As for smaller newspapers, the Belleville Intelligencer, in an editorial dated November 1, 1975, commented on the services both Time and Reader's Digest had given, and more specifically commented on the vested interest that Maclean's has in Bill C-58. The Calgary Herald, in an editorial dated October 27, commented on controlling the press.

It might be said that this is a danger that does not exist, but I suggest that is not the case. I believe hon. members opposite should seriously ask themselves what this bill will do. The bill is now going to be rammed through the House of Commons; debate is to be ended by closure. Is this in the best interests of Canadians? More importantly, I suggest that the result of this kind of action can come back to haunt all Canadians in the future.

It is a sad day, I suggest, for Canadians when legislation of this kind is presented to the House. The Vancouver Sun is of the opinion that tears should be shed, not for Reader's Digest and Time but for some other more fundamental issues that are inherent in Bill C-58. In an editorial dated October 30, it said that tears should be shed for a country that allows its laws to be twisted by bureaucratic redefinition to apply to specific publications. The editorial continues:

They are for a government that believes it is serving people by determining they should read something «different» and allowing a committee of anonymous taxmen to sit down with a ruler and decide, inch by inch, whether it is different enough.

They are for the great many Canadians, albeit a minority, who have been told by their government that they are not mature enough, not discerning enough, not patriotic enough to know their own minds.

And they are for all those who believe that the only way this country can be independent is by being 80 per cent different from everybody else, without realizing that, in doing so, they are accepting that foreign—and primarily American—standards are the only worth while ones against which Canadian achievement can be measured.

The editorial concludes:

The key question, it seems to us, is control over editorial decisions. Whatever criteria are used for establishing that Canadians have editorial control, if that is the goal, it is abhorrent to then suggest that their Canadianism should be perpetually judged against what they do.

Despite the apparent outward levity concerning everything we are saying, I am sure that within their heart of hearts many backbenchers opposite are deeply concerned at what they are being party to today. I hope they will take it upon themselves to go to the minister, to the House leader, the President of the Privy Council, and to the Prime Minister, if they can approach him at all, and place before those gentlemen their concern, not only at what Bill C-58 will do but at the legislative technique the government is now about to use to bring to an end debate on the second reading stage of this bill.

I sincerely hope they would have the presence of mind to go to those ministers and say, «We were wrong. Withdraw the bill. Let it die a natural death, let it get the decent burial that it does not really deserve, and let us end debate on this question». No good purpose is being served by this debate, so let us get on with other issues of greater importance to this country at the present time, such as the economy and the postal strike, to name just two.

I hope the backbenchers of the party opposite still have some clout in the councils of government and that they tell the ministers on the front benches, who are so out of touch with Canadian life and reality, that this is not an issue with which Canadians are concerned. Canadians do not want to see the passage of Bill C-58. They do not want to see the time of parliament taken up by this debate. Rather, they want to see Bill C-58 ended here and now. I am sure some hon. members opposite want us to continue to debate this bill in the hope that it will be withdrawn from the order paper because it is taking up too much legislative time. I suggest we allow people who want to publish in Canada to do so, and that we allow those Canadians who wish to buy these publications to continue to buy them.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I have had as much mail as any member of the House on the issue of Bill C-58. From looking at this mail and reading it carefully, I have ascertained there were 352 letters, at the last count, against the legislation and seven in support of it. This is an issue that has gripped many people, and I am very sorry that the government has seen fit not only to gag its own caucus but to bring in closure to close off debate on the bill.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Mr. Kempling: It is not only a shame, it is somewhat disgusting. I should like to refer to an article that appeared in the Montreal Star, entitled "Incendiary". It had this to say:

> A group of enthusiasts calling themselves the Canadian Liberation Movement lit a merry blaze on Parliament Hill the other day and burnt copies of Time and the Reader's Digest.
>
> The bonfire, no doubt, was intended to symbolize at once the destruction of a dreaded enemy and the sacred flame of nationalism.

● (1730)

An hon. Member: You should stand up over there and make a speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) has the floor.

Mr. Kempling: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was reading from an article in the Montreal Star. As I said the article is entitled «Incendiary». It reads:

> The bonfire, no doubt, was intended to symbolize at once the destruction of a dreaded enemy and the sacred flame of nationalism. Whether a revitalized Canadian magazine industry would rise, as some believe, from such ashes is decidedly unlikely. Book-burning has an old and dishonourable tradition behind it; Canadians can live, and sustain their culture, without it.

[Mr. Epp.]

I read that article particularly because this is an example of the type of high feeling there is in our country at this time. In my riding, the most prominent daily newspaper is the Hamilton Spectator, a Southam publication, a reasonably moderate paper. It ran an editorial in this vein:

> In order to be considered «Canadian», Time and Reader's Digest should be prepared to surrender heart and soul to Ottawa, federal revenue minister Ronald Basford has decreed.
> In what seems to be a blatant attempt to administer the coup de grâce to the Canadian editions of the two magazines, the minister now not only wants to clamp controls on ownership but also content.

Then it goes on to describe the nature of the content, and in conclusion states:

> Taking away tax advantages from business and industry which advertise in magazines that are «domesticated» but still have a majority foreign ownership might be a partial answer to the problems faced by Canadian magazines. But, as we have argued here before, in the end it is still the reader who decides which magazine he wants to read. The advertisers will go where the largest readership is, regardless of ownership.
> Making things difficult for the competition is no guarantee that «pure» Canadian magazines will suddenly improve in quality and attract all those who now buy Time or Reader's Digest.

A few weeks ago I was talking to an old gentleman who raised this matter. I asked him how he likes Maclean's magazine. He said, «Great». I asked him if he thought the content was good. He said, «Great. Give them a little more time and they will be almost as good as Time.» In other words, Time to him is the best magazine, and he thought that if Maclean's were given a little more time it might be as good. Why should we have to take second best? I have a letter here from a constituent. I wish the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) were here because I am sure he would be interested in this. It says:

> I have just learned of the recent legislation which will seriously jeopardize the publication of one of Canada's finest magazines. This is the rescinding, next year, of section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act which allows Canadian companies to claim as a business expense advertising placed in the Reader's Digest.
> In this day of trashy publications and second-rate writing, the Reader's Digest is a bright and shining star—

This letter goes on at some length; it contains quite a few paragraphs.

An hon. Member: Continue.

Mr. Kempling: You want me to read it all? All right. It goes on to say:

> In this day of trashy publications and second-rate writing, the Reader's Digest is a bright and shining star, invariably wholesome, educational and vital. Its scope and appeal are largely dependent on the range of magazines from which it is able to select its outstanding articles. What kind of digest would we be left with if it could glean material only from Canadian magazines? We have two major magazines to choose from — Maclean's and Chatelaine — and a few more limited ones like the United Church Observer — all good publications, but certainly not adequate for a magazine composed entirely of extracts.
> After all, many Canadians already subscribe to Chatelaine and Maclean's as we do, and if Reader's Digest had to rely on such repetitive content it would have little appeal.

Then it continues by stating that this is one magazine that is available, above reproach, and so on. The last paragraph reads:

Here is one magazine that is above reproach. So what if there are articles from the American viewpoint? There are also Canadian selections, and English ones, and a good smattering from many other countries. This is what the world needs to bring its peoples into closer harmony. We need to understand various cultures and outlooks, and here they are presented intelligently, along with a wide range of human interest, scientific and historical articles.

It is signed by Rosemary Brown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: As I say, I wish the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby were here.

Mr. Paproski: The one and only Rosemary Brown.

Mr. Kempling: I would not say that. All I say is that it is signed by Rosemary Brown. I think we should be realistic and look at the contribution made by these magazines. Let us take Reader's Digest. It does $30 million worth of business in Canada. That is considerable. At least 90 per cent of its revenue produced in Canada remains in Canada. It has an investment of something like $8 million in capital assets. Its land is worth a little over half a million dollars. Its buildings are worth $2,700,000. Its machinery is worth $4½ million. It employs about 500 people and provides additional employment for about 1,000 others. We should think what would happen to these people. Can this magazine continue? We have heard that Time magazine intends to reduce its advertising rate for Canadians in order to offset the effect of the legislation. So what, really, would the government gain by this legislation?

An hon. Member: They have to look after their «gritty» friends.

An hon. Member: Canadian friends.

Mr. Kempling: When I speak it always seems that several people interject. This is great because it makes speaking at this hour of the evening, when the galleries are packed, very interesting. Thirty-two per cent of the stock of Reader's Digest is available to the Canadian people. Five out of six directors, as has been mentioned, are Canadian. I was very interested in the question the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) put to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. He mentioned automobiles and said that if we are doing this in respect of magazines and are insisting on 80 per cent Canadian content, why should we not also do it in respect of products such as automobiles, and so on? The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby said he thought this would be great. I say we would not have an automobile in this country if we had to rely 100 per cent on Canadian design and Canadian content.

● (1740)

I read Time, Newsweek, Reader's Digest and Maclean's. I have these magazines at home, where my family looks at them, and after a period of a few days I find that Time, Reader's Digest and Newsweek are dog-eared but Maclean's could go back to the newsstand as it is rarely read. That is their choice; it is for them to read it or not. But if they find other magazines more interesting, so be it.

I am concerned, as other hon. members are, about the content requirements and about some civil servants sitting in an office here in Ottawa with a ruler and pencil deciding just whether there is 80 per cent Canadian content in a magazine or if it is 80 per cent different from the content in the foreign issue of the same magazine. I think that is a backward step and many of the letters that I have received from my constituents have expressed this view. I will go through this pile of letters and select some which I would like to read to the House. I have about half of them here and the stack is about five inches high. I will read my constituents' comments into the record because they have expressed their views and have asked me to express them to the House, which I intend to do.

There is a letter from a gentleman who writes:

This is my letter of protest against the government's bill to remove the special income tax status of advertising in Time, Reader's Digest and a number of religious and scientific magazines.

He also sent a copy to the minister. I suppose I find the following paragraph in practically every letter that I receive. He writes:

Specifically with respect to the two first mentioned publications, they have an eminently deserved reputation that results from the quality of their offering and not, in my view, from the special tax standing they enjoy.

In other words, so far as he is concerned he has not been de-Canadianized or de-Americanized by reading these magazines. He finds that they are a source of information to him and he is intelligent enough to judge that information and to treat it accordingly. Another letter from a constituent reads:

We urge you to vote against the proposed government bill to withdraw the tax privilege from Time and Reader's Digest. We feel this bill is a serious threat to democracy and our tradition of free press.

Another letter is from a little old lady in a senior citizens' home who writes:

Both my husband and myself are quite upset over the action the government is contemplating on taking regarding the Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd.

We strongly oppose any action parliament may take against the Reader's Digest.

We enjoy reading the Digest and feel the articles printed are most interesting and worth while.

We also feel that the possibility of more Canadians becoming unemployed would be disastrous.

Many of these letters are in the same vein. This letter from a lady reads:

In this day of trashy publications and second-rate writing, the Reader's Digest is a bright and shining star.

Another letter reads:

I am a resident of Wentworth Lodge. For several years I have enjoyed and read Reader's Digest. I would most definitely like to continue doing so.

Could you please direct this letter to the proper department so that possible further legislation would be aware of my views and those of many other Canadians on this matter.

Some of these letters are very hard to read because they are written by elderly people. The following is a letter from a businessman:

I strongly object to the proposal of rescinding section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act. I have been reading the Reader's Digest for over 20 years and don't feel that I have been corrupted or Americanized.

I have some letters from students as well. One of them reads:

Non-Canadian Publications

Just a brief memo to express my opposition to rescinding of section 19(2) of the Income Tax Act.

I am writing in support of both the Canadian Reader's Digest and Canadian Time magazine. I fully believe that both should be allowed to remain as exactly "as is" as both are a credit to their industry and this country.

Some of the messages are very short and to the point. One of them reads:

We find Reader's Digest to be quite acceptable in its present form.

Another one reads:

We do not agree with the government's intention to introduce amendments to the Income Tax Act so disallowing as a business expense advertising placed by Canadian companies in the Reader's Digest.

That is signed by five or six different people, so obviously they have been talking about it. It is evident that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction, particularly in my riding, with the proposed action of the government, and if the press reports tomorrow that the government will impose closure on second reading of this bill they will have an indication of the warped view of the government regarding the attitude of Canadians. Here is another letter from a senior citizen who writes:

I wish to inform you that I want to be put on record as definitely against any legislative or tax change move that will cause the Reader's Digest or Time magazine to eventually have to close up here in Canada. They are two of the top publications here in this country, and their loss to the Canadian people would be a hard blow.

There are dozens and dozens of these letters. If I read them all, I would be here until midnight. But you can see the concern that people have in the country on the action of the government in this legislation. I try to take a very broad view of things. I am a Canadian businessman and I am as pro-Canadian as anyone. I have travelled rather extensively in the world and read everything I can get my hands on.

I am afraid that if you couple this requirement for Canadian content, and for content which is 80 per cent different from that in foreign issues, with what we are hearing from CRTC, particularly in the border areas where they are saying to Canadian cable companies that they are to take in the American signal, delete American advertising and dub Canadian advertising in its place, this is outright thievery. Here we have the government telling the cable companies that if they are to continue to enjoy a licence from CRTC, this is what they have to do. Again, this is a form of censorship which they are imposing. I have spoken to some of our Canadian television producers and they are appalled at what the government is doing. I notice that some of the television stations in the United States which are close to the Buffalo area are doing the same as Time and possibly Reader's Digest will do, that is, offering a reduced rate to advertisers.

We talk about censorship. I look at what we have in the country now. We have Information Canada, with about 2,200 employees, and there are about 1,800 information officers in the various government departments. If you go over to the Press Club across the road, you will find that there are about three members of government departments to every one member of the press. Every reporter in the parliamentary gallery gets a handful of «bumph» every day from the information officers of these various departments, and we wonder why some of the things we see in the House are not reported. They get all sorts of information fed to them, all of it with a bias, unless it is independent information.

When you take this together, you see that Time and Reader's Digest will obviously be phased out and you see the control in television, of which we see more and more, the growing size of Information Canada, and the 1,800 information officers in the various government departments. It is a pretty horrible thing and a pretty tragic thing to see happening in this country, and it certainly will not give us our present, independent view.

● (1750)

The letters I have received are short and to the point, but some of them are very interesting in their content. I must say that some of them follow the tenor of the letter many of my constituents received from Reader's Digest, but many express the concern of those who are upset about this. Some of the people who have come to this country from Europe are concerned about this legislation also. They saw it happen over there. But I do not like to draw that sort of parallel. I do not think we are that far down the road yet, but this is a dangerous step we are taking. It could be accomplished in another way, and I hope that when we get to committee we can amend this bill. I think we can come to some compromise on the ownership issue. I do not think we need 75 per cent Canadian shareholders controlling most companies. I think 51 per cent or 52 per cent is quite adequate. If most of the directors are Canadian, that is adequate, but when we see that there must be 80 per cent Canadian content I just wonder where they are going to get that from.

Other hon. members have mentioned some of our newspapers. If they had to comply with this regulation in the actual news section, if they deleted news from UPI, Reuters and some of the other news agencies they subscribe to, and gave up some of the rights they have with, for example, the Washington Post or the New York Times and printed only Canadian news, they would be hard pressed to put out a newspaper. I hope that when we get to committee we can really get to the heart of this bill and move some amendments which will make it more palatable and take away some of the concerns which have been expressed to me by my constituents.

As I have said, I have received 352 letters opposing this legislation, and seven letters supporting it. It would be only fair to read one of the letters supporting the position of the government, but I am unable to find it here because it is lost in the papers I have with me. I wish to close my remarks very shortly. I will quote from an article written by Charles Lynch. I will not read the whole thing because it is quite lengthy, but it has some very good content. He says the following:

—what are we to make of revenue minister Ron Basford's decree that, to survive here, the Canadian editions of Time and the Digest would have to be 80 per cent different from their U.S. parent publications? The . . . regulations make sense only in the context that they are designed to be terminally punitive in their effect, and that what the government is saying is that it wants to drive the Canadian editions of these magazines out of business, period.

Coupled with the insistence on 75 per cent Canadian ownership of the publications, the proprietors of these magazines would be made to attempt compliance, and thus put themselves, their heirs and successors in an editorial straitjacket that any self-respecting journalist would find intolerable.

Time Canada president, Stephen S. LaRue, is right when he says it is unreasonable to assume that news can be manipulated to meet a content formula, though perhaps a better way to put it would be that news can be so manipulated, but at peril to the public weal. Indeed, news is being manipulated in many countries, but Canada has not been one of them, and for us to join the list would be bad business.

LaRue says news is what actually happens, and you can't make it 80 per cent different by official decree.

That is the whole point of this debate. I am sure hon. members opposite have received the same kind of correspondence as we have. I do not believe for one minute that hon. members opposite have been receiving bags full of mail telling them to push this matter forward, to invoke closure, and so forth. I think they have been receiving the same mail as we have, and I hope they will have the courage to say so at committee stage, because obviously right now they are gagged; we have not heard a speaker on this bill from the government side for quite some time. They are obviously gagged and have been told not to speak. That is one of the sad things which happens in this parliament and in many of these debates. We hear some fire from the government, and suddenly someone says, «Shut up. Don't speak any more. Let the opposition do all the talking; the bill will eventually pass.» That becomes a parliamentary tactic. It is sad, on an issue of this type, to see hon. members opposite sit there and not have the courage to enter into the debate.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that in about two minutes I will be the first to speak in this extended time, our penance for taking time off on Monday. I am not sure whether that is an honour. I really hold no brief for Time magazine. In fact, I rarely read it unless I am on a plane going somewhere and it is handed to me. I do not have any real support to express for Reader's Digest. I read it regularly and have done so for some 35 years. I remember it from before the time it carried advertising. I enjoyed it then and I enjoy it now.

On the other hand, I want to express a great deal of support for Canadian publications such as Maclean's. I want to see Canadian magazines such as Maclean's grow and prosper and become better magazines, although frankly sometimes it is a little tough to read a Canadian magazine when the cover and feature story is about an American football player who seems to feel that the greatest thing in Canada is having a good looking blonde waiting in bed for him when he comes home, whatever the time of night, with fresh fruit and that sort of thing.

I am as much a Canadian nationalist as anyone. Recently I took a trip with the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. The then deputy chairman of the committee, who is sitting across from me, will remember this, I am sure. I spent no little amount of time pointing out to the committee that not only did I support Canadian products, but I also supported products from Hastings riding.

For example on that trip my socks, my shirts, my jacket, my coat and even my cufflinks were all made in the riding of Hastings, and those things which were not made there were bought there. I made sure everything was Canadian-made. I wonder how many hon. members opposite go out of their way to make sure every article of their apparel is Canadian-made. Of course, we have a little more incentive in regard to some apparel on this side of the House. I will not mention any manufacturer's name, but we might have greater interest in one brand of underwear. How many people in this House go out of their way to make sure the products they wear are Canadian? If I am interested in making sure the things that I buy and wear are Canadian, would it not be reasonable to think that I want this issue settled in what the government gives us as «the Canadian way»?

The government has not justified Bill C-58 and it certainly has not justified closure on second reading. What possible reason is there for that? I do not intend to go into statistics here. The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling), the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and other speakers who preceded me have given all kinds of statistics to justify not putting this legislation through. The hon. member for Provencher read a number of editorials. Frankly, I have forgotten the one that came from Barry McCullough of the Belleville Intelligencer in opposition to this legislation. It is not often that he and I agree, but we do this time.

A number of speakers mentioned censorship. I would like to think that is not a policy of the Liberal government and that by and large they would not be in favour of it. If they are not in favour of it, however, why would they impose this bill on us? I cannot see any reason for it. I look to the Minister for an ulterior motive and cannot find any. He is a neighbour of mine and in no way could be called stupid or lacking in imagination. Anyone who says that about someone who has his roots as deep in Belleville as the Hon. Hugh Faulkner is going to have to fight me. We do not turn out that type of person. The Faulkner name is enshrined in Hastings county; what used to be the Glanmore museum was originally the Faulkner house. Why would he bring in this legislation? The question keeps coming back. Why would he impose upon the country the obvious loss of jobs?

Mr. Faulkner: You have to go back to the O'Leary commission to understand why.

Mr. Ellis: You have to go back further than that to understand what you are doing. I am sure the good senator would not countenance this at all. We talk about the loss of the publishing industry and the loss of jobs, in Quebec particularly. I ask, without being partisan, why does the minister wish to impose that kind of income loss on a province from which the Liberal party receives a good deal of support? Surely the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) is not overly anxious to collect a few extra tax dollars. Considering the speed with which tax money is spent, I do not think the few extra dollars will last long. That cannot be the government's purpose, nor does the bill suggest it is. The House was told that only 19 per cent of the additional revenue will accrue to Canadian publishers and most of that will go to the Maclean-Hunter organization which, surely, is better able to look after itself than any other Canadian publishing group.

Hon. members may not know that I spent a couple of years publishing a magazine. I was in the concrete business and had a good deal of fun publishing a small quarterly magazine. I learned that large magazines like Time and Reader's Digest enable advertisers to write off the cost of advertising and thus place advertisements in smaller magazines like mine. The publisher of a small quarterly magazine can only attract advertising the preparation cost of which has already been written off. In other words, you can only use advertising which has been used in a much larger magazine and therefore paid for. If large U.S. or Canadian magazines had not paid the cost of creating advertisements—I am talking about photography and all the various costs involved in the preparation of advertising—my little magazine could not have carried well known advertising. The kinds of rates I was charging did not come within a country mile of covering the cost of preparing the advertisements I carried. As I see it, the existence in Canada of larger magazines helps smaller magazines.

A moment ago I talked of nationalism and said I liked to use Canadian products. I now raise a question concerning this government's views on nationalism. For example, why did the government not lend its support to the Brantford Binder Twine Company which a few years ago was able to produce and sell binder twine for between $6 and $7 a bale? The company got into serious financial difficulty because it competed with cheap products coming from Central America and South America. It could not meet the price. The company went to the government and said, «We are the only people in Canada producing this product. Farmers need it and we think you should help to maintain a Canadian identity in this industry.» In other words, it wanted help. But the government said no. It gave no help at all.

The Brantford Binder Twine Company closed its doors and, sure enough, less than one year later the cost of binder twine spiralled up. I have not seen the latest figures, but according to my last information the price has risen to around $25 a bale, or more than 300 per cent above the original price. That only happened because South and Central American interests controlled the product and forced the price up. The Canadian industry whose product had held the price down was allowed to go out of business.

While we consider the subject of this government's brand of nationalism, let me ask why it refused support to a large manufacturing concern in my home town of Belleville? I have mentioned this subject previously in this House and will not dwell on the details. The fact is that the Industrial Development Bank, a government-owned and operated subsidiary supposedly for the support of industry, refused outright to support a Canadian industry in Belleville. As a consequence, it was sold to American interests. In the first year after the American interests were allowed to take over, their net profit was one-third of the amount of money that should have been loaned by the IDB. That is a pretty shortsighted view and it is very difficult to understand when this government is using nationalism as an excuse.

I could go on. An industry in the southeast corner of my constituency closed its doors within the past two months. It was faced with a product from the United States that was being mass-produced there at a cost with which they could not compete. The government was asked to do something about the tariff situation. It refused. As a consequence, some 300 people are out of work. The 150,000 square foot factory is sitting idle. If that sort of thing is the government's reasoning, why, then, this afternoon did it not accept the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) to have a special debate on the postal workers being off work? After all, there are small industries in not only my community but others that will be bankrupt before the end of this month if postal services continue to be unavailable.

I know that it is great for the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) to want to fight this union. I suspect that a personality clash is keeping the strike going. I have talked to people in my constituency; they say, «The heck with it. If that is the way they want to be, let them go on strike.» It is easy to hold that view. However, it is not easy when you know that small businesses in all parts of Canada are facing financial hardship. I know of one case where if the mail does not come through within the next week to ten days, they will be bankrupt by the end of this month.

Mr. Alexander: They don't care.

Mr. Ellis: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is probably correct, the government does not care. I must again ask myself why the government would bring in this piece of legislation. If they had brought in legislation that had to do with ownership, it might have been different. However, they say that a publication must be 80 per cent different from the parent magazine. As I said a moment ago, I regularly read Reader's Digest. The reason is that it gives me a cross-section of publications from all over the world. If it were 80 per cent different from the one regularly published in the United States, I suppose I would buy the one published in that country because I want to read different points of view from all over the world.

The fact is there will not be a Canadian Reader's Digest. I strongly suspect that the Canadian content we now find in that magazine will depreciate measurably. After all, if they are kicked out of this country why should they continue to put in Canadian content? I can think of no good reason. I enjoy the Canadian portions found in Reader's Digest. I like to read them, together with pieces from Europe, Australia, Asia, South Africa, South America, the United States, and so on. That is the richness of the magazine, the reason why I like to read it.

If it were an ownership issue, that would be different. I sometimes feel there might have been an attempt to make those two magazines Canadian-owned. But there was no such attempt. The guideline was content, and that is getting into censorship and it is something I cannot agree with. Liberal party policy does not usually embody any particular anti-foreign control attitude. Even the Foreign Investment Review Act which was passed some time ago does not legislate against U.S. take-overs.

Like so many other members, I have received all kinds of mail on this question and the mail is running better than 100 to 1 against the legislation. One letter in particular outlined in strong terms the case against Maclean-Hunter which, as owner, publisher and distributor was keeping certain competitive magazines off the stands. This particular constituent of mine had to import the magazine he wished to read. The fact is, he did import the magazine.

The legislation before us will not prevent people reading Time and Reader's Digest. The price may go up by 50 cents because they are no longer published here and because there is less Canadian advertising, but whatever the price may be I strongly suspect Canadians will continue to buy these two magazines.

With these considerations in mind, Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister why he has brought this bill before us. What is so important about it that it justifies closure on second reading? What is so important that it should run counter the policy his party has expressed with regard to censorship? What is so important about it as to warrant the loss of so many jobs and so much income in the very province from which his party derives so much of its support? Until we have an answer to these serious questions, I find I cannot support this measure.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should first apologize to you and to the last speaker for moving between you and the speaker. I know better. I have breached the rule and I can only offer you my apology. I hope you find yourself able to accept it. It is a strange thing that in the world of print we should be telling Canadians what is good for them, whether they want it or not. It reminds me of the time when some of us were a little younger and there were several home cures we were required to take. It took a lot of persuasion and, on occasion, an element of force before the youngster took those remedies. It might have been cod liver oil, or a number of other things. They were certainly not palatable, but taken they were for the good of our health. We now find the government telling Canadians what is good for them. Hon. members can read the bill backwards, forward, or hold it upside down; it still tells us what we are going to read.

It is strange that this should happen, because government is supposed to lead. It is supposed to persuade the people, it is supposed to submit some of its ideologies to the people at election time. It is not supposed to drop on people what has never been mentioned prior to an election and tell them what is good for them. When our scientists at college start to read in their subjects, they read German science, Russian science, British science, French science, even U.S. science. If one were studying philosophy, one would be referred by one's professors to authors ranging from Socrates, and no one would ask the nationality of the author of the article that they were asked to read. They would be told that it was pertinent information to the subject under discussion and therefore they should read it to be properly informed.

If one were to study medicine, one would find oneself finally having to take the Hippocratic oath symbolic of the history and ethics of medicine. One would go from there to what is now considered most modern in medicine on the North American continent, something that is probably getting more headlines than anything else, the Chinese treatment for disease and pain by acupuncture, which in China is as old as medicine and which may be as important as a multitude of other aspects of medical research.

The only field in which Canadians are going to be subjected to an 80 per cent orientation of subject matter is in the printed word and the airwaves of information. We are going to go to the people who most need this information and tell them that castor oil is on their spoon and that they had better take it. The people in my constituency have proven their loyalty to Canada ever since they settled here. They have participated in Canadian affairs, whether they were at home or at war abroad, in a fashion that I think speaks well of them by any measurement of Canadian society. I have had but two constituents say, «I favour this bill», but I have had hundreds of people say, in conversation and in correspondence, that this is censorship, that they do not want it or approve of it. Furthermore, they have continued to say that no matter what we do about advertising placement in Canada, they will continue to subscribe to the foreign magazines they are presently buying. Reader's Digest, wholly from the United States perhaps, will still be on their reading table.

At this moment in time Reader's Digest is a magazine that is published under certain terms and conditions in Canada. It has a Canadian content. The people of Canada who have been accustomed to reading Reader's Digest will continue to read the United States edition—unless the postmaster puts them out of business in the United States too. We are not going to gain anything from laying down new guidelines that we hope will eliminate Reader's Digest and Time in Canada. We may lose entirely. The government is just rolling the dice and does not know which number will be coming up next. However, my guess is that we will lose rather than gain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look at how the Government of Canada and its regulatory bodies have interfered with the media as an example of what it may do to those who oppose it. Since this bill has been presented I have asked many questions about what people watch on television when they have a choice between Canadian and American television and Canadian and American-produced programs. One can praise the CBC as long as one likes, but the fact is that excluding news and sports items, 95 per cent of the viewing in an area where both Canadian and American television is available is of foreign-produced programs on Canadian networks or on foreign networks directly.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. McCain: Someone says "Shame". I say to that person that the shame is on him, because when free choice goes out the window I am reminded of someone watching a hockey game in Cuba for only 30 seconds and then having the program jammed. We are becoming involved too much in the kinds of controls in countries which have governments which no member over there would support, yet they create the very atmosphere in which it cannot be avoided.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 6.30?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. Pursuant to the order made on Wednesday, November 5, it being 6.30 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 6.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF MISUSE OF MINISTERIAL PERMITS BY CHILEAN REFUGEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion in a case of special and urgent circumstances relating to hundreds of Chileans who were allowed into Canada under special ministerial permits and who have held, and continue to hold, meetings, illegal in terms of the permits. Because of the fact that the New Democratic Party of Quebec has organized a fund raising campaign from their headquarters in Montreal, and that certain Cuban diplomats in Toronto, one of whom has been charged with obstructing police, are all working for the movement of the revolutionary left, the armed resistance movement seeking to overthrow the present Chilean government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees):

That the government be instructed to undertake an investigation into the misuse of the special ministerial permits as well as the allegations that foreign sources are using Canadian soil as a platform to carry on international subversive political activities.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for that motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

FAILURE OF FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL TO INFORM DEPARTMENT OF INTENTION TO LAY OFF EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The Falconbridge Nickel Company of Canada did not give prior notice to either the manpower department or the Department of Labour of its intended two phase lay-off of 1,000 workers at its Sudbury basin operations, and in view of the Provisions of the Canada Labour Code, section 60, division V2 with regard to group termination, which state that if a company is laying off employees it is required to notify the manpower department and the Department of Labour in advance and the length of time is determined by the number of workers laid off: 50 workers, 4 weeks; 100 workers, 8 weeks; 300 workers, 12 weeks; 300 plus workers, 16 weeks, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemns the Falconbridge Nickel Company's action and calls on the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to inform Falconbridge that it ought to withdraw its lay-off notice to its employees or at least to conform to the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO REVAMP THE FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER STANDING ORDER 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the seriously continuing and even increasing problems facing the Canadian footwear industry, whose share of the domestic market has dropped to less than 46 per cent and whose labour force has dwindled alarmingly, since the flooding of the Canadian market by shoes from low cost-price countries in the last few years is having disastrous consequences, and since the Canadian customs tariff policy needs immediate reviewing because the whole economic situation has changed since the measures adopted by the federal government for the footwear industry in 1973, when the Canadian production was increasing, which is no longer the case, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House be allowed to discuss immediately the problem of the Canadian footwear industry by assessing the results of the government policy announced in December 1973 and, since it seems that the sector strategy can be efficient only provided there is a Canadian footwear market, that the House consider seriously the four point program proposed by the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada whose aim is to support that sector strategy, in particular through action in the field of duty and quotas on imports.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion therefore cannot be put.

TABLING OF EIGHTEENTH REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the eighteenth report of the Clerk of Petitions presented by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standings Orders as to form.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF BUDGETARY DEFICIT FOR THIS YEAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of the tabling yesterday of supplementary estimates in the order of about $1¾ billion. In view of the additional spending and the further supplementary estimates that we will probably receive in due course, will the minister tell the House now what his estimate is of the budgetary deficit for the current fiscal year? I ask him whether he will tell the House because I know he must have that information?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the best judgment we have at this time is that it will be between $5 billion and $6 billion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What a government!

FORECAST OF TOTAL EXPENDITURES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since my hon. friend the President of the Treasury Board has got into this I should like to put a question to him. In view of the forecast of expenditures for the current year, which was made in June by the previous Minister of Finance of approximately $29 billion, and in view of the supplementary estimates yesterday which bring the total estimates we have received to date to about $30 billion, a billion more than was forecast by the former minister of finance in June, is the minister still forecasting total expenditures for this year at that same level?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, when I tabled the blue book in February this year I said that the total expenditures this year would be less than 16 per cent above the total expenditures of last year. It is going to be as predicted because those supplementary estimates are quite substantial. There will be another set tabled before the end of the year but all that will be within the forecast we made in February.

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. That kind of penalty killing and skating around may be acceptable in some quarters. It is the kind of evasion that has destroyed the credibility of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of these evasions and the figures that have been quoted, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if he would agree that what he said on October 30 in this House, that we are sticking by the budget predictions of June, should be changed to say that it is really the Canadian people who are getting stuck?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NUMBER AND AMOUNT OF FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES—RESTRAINT OF EXPENDITURES WITHIN AMOUNT OF INCREASE IN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise this House if in fact there will be one or two further sets of supplementary estimates filed with respect to this fiscal year? Can he indicate the magnitude of the amount covered by these two estimates?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I just told the Leader of the Opposition that before the end of the fiscal year there would be another set of supplementary estimates. I do not expect to have two more sets before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question. These advocates of fiscal kleptomania who sit across from us have now come to the situation where they are exceeding the 15 per cent referred to by my head-shaking friend over there, the President of the Treasury Board. As the gross national product this year will not increase more than 11 per cent, will the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Finance—I am impartial as to which minister answers—indicate to this House when they intend to restrain their expenditures within the limits of the increase of the gross national product?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I notice that as much as half, if not more, of the expenditures involved in the supplementary estimates tabled yesterday were for the oil price subsidy, medicare and the defence budget. I take it the hon. gentleman's opposition also extends to those programs, and I am happy to note it on the record.

Mr. Baldwin: Answer the question; we are not running the government, but we ought to be.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—POSSIBLE PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT ON USE OF SURTAX TO CONTROL PROFESSIONAL FEES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance concerns, in the opinion of many, the lack of effective control imposed on professional incomes under the government's control program and the Prime Minister's attempt yesterday to shift responsibility to the provinces. Has the government obtained agreement from the provinces concerning the procedures for controlling professional incomes and, specifically, has the federal government proposed to them the levying of a special surtax as a means of achieving this end?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. gentleman that the finance ministers agreed at their meeting that decisions with regard to professional incomes should be joint responsibilities of the federal and provincial governments. In that sense, it would be a mistake to describe this as a shift in responsibility. A working party of federal and provincial officials has prepared proposals about professional incomes. This question will be discussed at the meeting next week and we hope that either at that meeting or at a subsequent meeting of ministers of finance, these proposals will receive final confirmation.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since it will be totally impossible for any one, two or three provinces on their own to control professional incomes, as professional people in the absence of a national program would simply move from one province to another, will the minister assure the House that any province's failure to institute a serious program for controlling professional incomes will result in the federal government's imposing such a program on the province which has neglected to do so; and, specifically, will the government put teeth into such proposal by levying a special 100 per cent tax to tax away increases in income beyond the $2,400 ceiling imposed on other Canadians?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is the effect of the over-all program. Without question, professional incomes, like other incomes, are subject to the guidelines and the ceiling to which the hon. gentleman referred. The principal question for discussion is the most effective means of monitoring this. We have proposed to establish, with the provincial governments and professional associations, a standard form of billing which will be reviewed for the purpose of seeing if there has been any violation of the guidelines. We also propose that it shall be mandatory for professionals to file with the Anti-Inflation Board a statement of their professional income, so that it can be seen if in an individual case there has been an excess beyond the guidelines, to which the provisions of Bill C-73 will apply.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister having acknowledged before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on November 7 that what he just said will not apply to professionals if their additional income is earned from "additional effort", or, I would add, if they change the mix of the kind of services they provide and increase income by that method, and as either of these loopholes is open to virtually all professionals, which, as the experience of other countries shows, will make professional income controls totally ineffective, will the minister answer my question, yes, or no. Will the government impose a special surtax on professional incomes, that is, on the total income in excess of the $2,400 ceiling?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question. Under Bill C-73 that exact régime applies. With regard to any professional person found to have exceeded the guidelines, that is the régime that would apply. The hon. member refers to it as being a loophole, that professional people should not be entitled to get a further return for more effort. I would point out that this is the same provision for blue collar workers on piece rate and for people working overtime. The same exemption exists throughout the work force.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFUSAL OF FRANCE TO INVITE CANADA TO ECONOMIC SUMMIT MEETING

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

According to the latest news, the new Canadian ambassador to France, Mr. Gérard Pelletier, had not yet presented his credentials to the French authorities while at the same time France simply ignored Canada for the important economic summit in Rambouillet scheduled for the weekend. Considering that this is an important issue, can the minister take stock of this matter and indicate whether Canada intentionally delayed the presentation of these credentials because of the attitude of France concerning the economic conference, to show the French government that Canada and the United States are not the same country but that Canada has its own social, cultural and economic identity?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of such innuendo but I shall refer the question to the minister for checking.

DELAY BY AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE IN PRESENTING CREDENTIALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. In that case, can the minister tell the House if he knows why Canada has not been invited to Rambouillet? Has not the ambassador, immediately upon assuming his functions, presented his credentials to ensure the presence and the very existence of Canada in France?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not know how the presentation of credentials is scheduled in France, Mr. Speaker, but I shall refer the supplementary question to the minister for his own consideration.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO RESTRAINTS ON MAIN AND SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance or, in the alternative, to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the Prime Minister's statements and those contained in the white paper as to government restraint on expenditures, will either of the two ministers inform the House whether there were any restrictions or cutbacks from the estimates as published last February or were there any actual restrictions on the estimates contained in the supplementary estimates tabled last week so that restraint becomes a word for this year and not merely some sort of slogan for next year?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, at the presentation of the June budget, we established a program to cut expenditures by $967 million in fiscal year 1975-76. Such cuts were made where projects had been presented after July. We did not announce other measures on October 13. We are now preparing the estimates for next year and we hope to apply this policy further and perhaps make it more efficient for next year's estimates.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Can the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that any restraint or published figures of restraint with regard to the 1976-77 estimates will not be merely cutbacks on inflated figures that are brought in so that beautiful, healthy cuts can appear to have been made?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that it is impossible to indicate at this time what cuts we are going to make. That will be made clear when the estimates are tabled in the House in early February next year.

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTED PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As this country does 70 per cent of its export and import business with the United States, and as during the third quarter of this year the United States increased its productivity by no less than 9½ per cent while we continued our steady decline, is the minister planning to introduce in the near future productivity incentives to be paid in direct proportion to increases in productivity so that we do not continue to lose a steadily increasing proportion of the Canadian and export market to better priced American goods?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is an interesting proposition. I don't think I can give a short answer to it; I am not sure whether the hon. member is talking about worker productivity or general productivity within a company. If he is speaking of the latter, this has been a subject I have been discussing with industry as recently as half an hour ago when I met with the Canadian Chemical Association. I agree with the fundamental premise of the question, namely, that productivity has to be improved, and we shall certainly use every means we can to do this.

Mr. Hees: I can assure the minister that I am talking about industrial productivity as he assumed. I hope he will make better progress than his predecessors did, because they have been telling me the same sort of thing year after year.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO DEAL WITH HATE MESSAGES BY TELEPHONE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. It has to do with a despicable practice, a practice which, I believe, Canadians do not want, do not believe in, and, I might add, cannot afford. In the light of the fact that the Attorney General for Ontario wants to crack down on hate messages by having amendments made to the Criminal Code, can the minister assure the House that he is receptive to this very necessary move and that he will introduce very shortly amendments to the Criminal Code in order to prevent this hateful discriminatory practice to which I have referred?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): The Attorney General of Ontario raised this matter with me at a recent meeting of attorneys general in Halifax and I was sympathetic to the representations he made. It is still not clear to me why charges could not be laid under section 231(2) of the Criminal Code as it now reads, but this is a matter which my officials and the officials of the Crown office in Ontario are presently examining. With regard to any prospective amendments, I am awaiting written representations and explanations from the Attorney General of Ontario and I intend to discuss them at a federal-provincial meeting we are holding in Ottawa on December 11 and 12.

Mr. Alexander: I want to thank the minister for that answer. I am sure he is aware that this is an extremely important subject and I hope, with all due respect, that he will show some leadership in this connection; we cannot afford to have this thing going on as it has been in the past to the detriment of so many Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HUMAN RIGHTS

REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF BILL C-72

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Turning now to another matter, Bill C-72, which I believe lies within his jurisdiction, may I ask the Minister of Justice when the proposed legislation on human rights is likely to be introduced to parliament for second reading? Various circumstances, including the presentation of the report on immigration, require that this matter be dealt with expeditiously. Can the hon. gentleman give me an assurance that he, together with the House leader, can bring this bill forward for second reading as soon as possible?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): With regard to the earlier question, may I say I fully share the hon. member's concern about the harassment by telephone of certain groups that is going on in Toronto. I share the seriousness with which he regards it. As to the second question, House business is, of course, a matter to be negotiated between the various House leaders. Our program has been held up because of the anti-inflation measure; also, the federal-provincial meeting to which I referred earlier is being held to deal with Bill C-72, the human rights bill, and I think it would not be useful to bring the measure forward for second reading until that meeting has been held.

MANPOWER

NOTIFICATION BY FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL OF INTENTION TO LAY-OFF EMPLOYEES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the minister's answer yesterday that he would check with his department regarding whether Falconbridge Nickel Company had contacted his department with respect to advance notice of the company's two-phase layoff, is he now prepared to tell the House whether or not his department was contacted? If not, in the light of the federal Labour Code which requires 16 weeks notification if more than 300 are being laid off, is he prepared to order Falconbridge to conform to this particular statute?

● (1430)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I initiated the request for information on this matter but I did not have it at the time when I came to the House for the question period this afternoon. On the second point, without getting too much into the area of legal matters, it is my understanding that the Canada Labour Code refers in these opinions to firms under federal jurisdiction. It would probably be more apt to have the matter raised in the provincial house of Ontario, where I think more action could be taken regarding Falconbridge itself. However, I am certainly keenly interested and I will be letting the hon. member know what voluntary methods we can support in order to get some action.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF TAX CONCESSIONS TO FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL ON OPERATIONS IN NAMIBIA

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will address to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that Falconbridge is implementing production cutbacks in Canada while at the same time maintaining increased production at its overseas plants—so obviously the workers of Ontario are subsidizing the overseas operations of Falconbridge—is the government now prepared to withdraw the tax concessions granted to Falconbridge for its operations in Namibia?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to examine that more deeply.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF SIGNING AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON WEED CONTROL IN OKANAGAN BASIN

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Considering the negative decision regarding the $100,000 federal share in the dredging program to combat weed growth in Okanagan lake, can the minister now say what decision has been made regarding signing the general implementation program for weed control in the Okanagan water basin with the provincial government?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the plan to contribute $100,000 toward the removal of weeds in the Okanagan lakes was subject to treasury board approval, which was not obtained due to the restraint program. However, the implementation agreement on the Okanagan basin is now before us. It will be signed in the very near future and hopefully out of that agreement some long term program for the treatment of these weeds in these very valuable lakes will flow.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—METHOD BY WHICH BOARD WILL CONTROL AND ROLL BACK FOOD PRICE INCREASES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When the minister appeared before the standing committee in connection with the examination of Bill C-73 he indicated in reply to a question that he had no idea how the Anti-Inflation Board would respond to or control food price increases. When the minister appeared a few days ago before the Liberal convention in Ottawa, he told the assembly that they would be rolling back food price increases. My question is this: Has the minister had an opportunity in the interim to meet with the Anti-Inflation Board and, if so, can he tell the House exactly how the board proposes to roll back any food price increases?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. gentleman to questions asked in the House regarding a Loblaws subsidiary; it was to that particular incident that I had reference. It seems to me that with the bill before the committee it would be appropriate to discuss this further when I reappear before the committee, I believe next week.

FISHERIES

ST. PIERRE-MIQUELON—COMPLICATIONS IN DISCUSSIONS WITH FRANCE IN DETERMINING OFFSHORE RESOURCE RIGHTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries). In my question to him yesterday about bilateral discussions with France on fisheries matters as they related to St. Pierre and Miquelon, he indicated that the fisheries relationships with France were complicated. Would the minister elaborate on that or make a statement on motions listing the complications that exist between the two countries?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the word "complicated" was not the right one, but I will stay with it. I am sure to the eternal gratitude of many Newfoundlanders, the fact that St. Pierre and Miquelon is not 200 miles away obviously makes extending the jurisdiction more complicated, and it was very much to this that I was referring. I am also grateful that St. Pierre and Miquelon are closer than 200 miles.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the sensitivity that now exists between Canada and France, and in view of the fact that St. Pierre and Miquelon could be a stumbling block with regard to Canada's position of eventually extending the limit to 200 miles, has the minister anything to advise the House about the discussions from that point of view?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should remind the hon. member that we are still very much in a state of preliminary negotiations regarding these matters. We must recognize a geographical fact which will have to be taken into account, but I am sure the problems can be overcome.

[Mr. McGrath.]

ENERGY

OIL—METHOD OF MAKING UP REDUCTION IN TAX REVENUES CAUSED BY REDUCTION OF EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. According to press reports the minister has informed the United States government, though not this House, that Canada's exports of crude oil will be reduced to 500,000 barrels a day. Since this would reduce export tax revenues that are needed for the import subsidy program by approximately $120 million, would the minister inform the House how these funds will be made up? Does he anticipate a rise in the Canadian price of crude oil, is he simply going to add to an already overwhelming deficit, or is he going to make spending cuts in other areas?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have received the report of the National Energy Board and it is presently under discussion with my colleagues. I hope to be able to table it within the House within the next two weeks. As for the question concerning how we will be able to finance what is quite clearly a steadily decreasing export effort, I would remind him that efforts were made last year in this regard. The 10 cent excise tax should provide in the order of $350 million this year, and in the next calendar year over $500 million.

Mr. Andre: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Without accepting the minister's figures and contention that that looks after the total deficit, may I ask him a question regarding the supplementary estimates, which include an increase in the budget of the energy supplies allocation board of $385 million. The recent 10 per cent increase in oil prices by the OPEC countries accounts for $130 million maximum, leaving a difference of at least $250 million. Since the amount of exports are totally predictable—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member is aware that under our procedures he will have an appropriate opportunity to question the minister in detail when the estimates are before the standing committee to which they were referred yesterday. This is not the forum for that kind of question.

HARBOURS

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO APPLY NEW POLICY

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since to my knowledge the government has not yet finally determined its policy for the development of port facilities in the country, especially in Quebec, can the minister tell the House whether he plans the early introduction of a bill to that effect?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor indicated that legislation would be forthcoming, and that certain work was in the hands of a task force to determine the exact form of port structures in Canada. This is still the case.

MULTICULTURALISM

REASON FOR FAILURE TO FILL VACANCIES ON NATIONAL COUNCIL AND HOLD CONFERENCE IN OCTOBER, 1975

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for multiculturalism. In view of the fact that approximately one-third of the positions on the National Consultative Multicultural Council became vacant as of last May, can the minister explain why reappointments have not been made to this council?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that there has been some considerable thinking going on within the council as to whether a council composed of 101 members is not a little unwieldy. The feeling is that this number should be reduced gradually, and under that principle more appointments will be made within the number to which the hon. member just referred, hopefully very soon.

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that in 1973, when the first national conference on multiculturalism was held, the government took the position that a conference should be held every two years, which means that there should be have been one in October 1975, can the minister indicate what the reasons were for not having held this conference as originally planned? Was it shortage of money, lack of interest, or a change in government policy on this subject?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will realize that there have been many more meetings than usual, both regionally and nationally, of the 101 members going into the annual report. We are now coming to grips with some revisions to policy, so we thought it would be best to have a conference some time in February, and that is the plan now.

ENERGY

OIL AND NATURAL GAS—TIMETABLE FOR PHASING OUT EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate to this House when the government plans to phase out exports of gas and oil to the United States, or does he go to Washington to make these statements before advising this Chamber? What is the government's long or short-range planning?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is a very general question. As to the first part of it in respect of oil, I have already answered that by indicating I will be tabling in the House the report of the National Energy Board on oil. As to the second part of the question on natural gas exports, the National Energy Board produced a report in May or June of this year in which it made clear that we were running into an increasing supply-demand situation and that there was a possibility we might have to reduce our natural gas exports to the United States, not over this winter but the following winter.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the minister has committed himself by making a statement in Washington without advising this Chamber, and I think that is wrong.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—MAXIMUM WAGE INCREASE—METHOD OF CONTROL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Considering the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on control measures and taking into account Bill C-73 which is in the public interest, I would like to ask the minister whether the amount of $2,400 is viewed by the government as an average increase or as the maximum increase for all groups of workers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is the maximum for all wage earners.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary question.

Since the Pepin-Plumptre Board announced yesterday the creation of a flying squad to check the increases we have experienced since the government's announcement, will the minister, in view of the provisions of Bill C-73, provide for the setting of a mechanism regarding those increases with respect to the implementation of a bill to be known in a few weeks? Besides will the government have the power to roll back prices that have already been upped in view of the contents of the bill?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the bill has provisions that allow changing the level of compensation in cases where an increase exceeds the guidelines. As I said to the leader of the New Democratic Party, we are discussing with the provinces the matter of controlling the income of professionals. The program guidelines will apply to all wage earners depending, of course, on their jobs.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SULPHUR DIOXIDE EMISSIONS FROM SYNCRUDE PLANT—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT STANDARDS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of the Environment relates to the Syncrude project and the widespread concern about sulphur dioxide pollution from that project. In view of the minister's statement in July 1974 that the environmental impact study done by the Syncrude companies was unrealistic and inadequate, and the recommendation of the minister at that time was in respect of 40 long tons emission, and in view of the fact that the Alberta government has now issued permission in respect of 287 long tons for the Syncrude project, will the minister advise the House whether she continues to oppose anything beyond the 40 long tons emission standard by the Syncrude project, and indicate whether she has advised the government representative on the management committee to take a position opposing higher emissions from those stacks?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the accepted levels of emission for the Syncrude project have been established by the province of Alberta. This is mainly a problem for Alberta and, therefore, we do not have national guidelines or standards relating to that specific type of industry. The standards have been established by the province of Alberta and this is very much the responsibility of the government of that province. However, the hon. member is right in saying that we are far from satisfied with the environmental study which has been made by Syncrude. We have asked for supplementary data and information concerning the industrial process. We are engaged with the government of Alberta in a very wide study on the effects on the environment of the development of the tar sands. As the hon. member knows, we have signed an agreement with the government of Alberta involving an amount of $40 million to be spent over a period of 10 years, and under which the federal and Alberta governments will share in the expenses.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's expressed concern over the emission standards, and bearing in mind the problem regarding a conflict of interest in that the minister's own government is involved in the development of the tar sands, would she advise when she will have clean air standards under the federal Clean Air Act so we can have some orderly leadership in terms of environmental impact from the sulphur dioxide emission at that plant?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that we do not feel we have a conflict of interest. Quite to the contrary, it is precisely because we have some involvement in that project that any activity at that site falls within government policy, under which environmental impact studies must be produced to the satisfaction of the Department of the Environment. Any such activity should thus fall well within the standards established by the Department of the Environment.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY OF CONTINUING STOL EXPERIMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recently reported philosophy the Minister of Transport is attempting to instil in the Department of Transport, can the minister give the House and the country some idea whether the government is prepared to continue with the STOL experiment, and that this does not necessarily mean the government will be spending an additional $16 million in Montreal to improve the downtown airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the current state of the STOL experiment, but have taken no decision about its exact extent. We are certainly satisfied that it has proven the value of this form of service between pairs of cities.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, it has proven the value, but has it proven economic feasibility?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it was not anticipated that the Montreal-Ottawa run with Twin Otters would in fact be economically feasible. The point of the study was to prepare the way for other short takeoff and landing craft such as the DASH 7 which may soon be available.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, did the Minister of Transport receive a telegram from B.C. Did he receive that telegram and how does he intend to reply?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the second telegram which refers to the first, which I have not seen. I will be looking into the matter to see whether I might add any comment regarding the normal legal situation in relation to freight rates in Canada.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED VIOLATION OF BILL C-50 IN SETTING SUPPORT PRICE FOR BEEF

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in light of the October 23 statement of the Minister of Agriculture that the support price on beef was approximately $1.50 per hundred weight lower than the previous year because of "lower feeder cattle prices", which violates Bill C-50 in spirit, I would ask the Minister of Justice to scrutinize the statement in question in order to ascertain whether it is in fact a violation of the provisions of the bill by overlooking the clause "to reflect the estimated production cost of the commodity", in this case being the cost of production of the animal, either as a calf or a feeder, until it enters the feed lot?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would bow to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, in respect of expertise in this matter, but I will scrutinize the statement referred to in the hon. member's request.

REQUEST FOR OPENING OF NORTHERN AIRSTRIPS TO CLASS III OPERATIONS DURING WINTER MONTHS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Several remote communities in northern Manitoba are serviced by air only. In July, five airstrips were closed to class III operations, which has restricted the movement of patients to hospital. At present, patients are being moved by charter only. Because of the high cost factor, patients are having to wait long periods to receive medical attention. Will the minister consider the opening of these five airstrips to class III operations for the winter months?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been looking at the thorny question of certain airstrips in Manitoba which are substandard for certain types of operations and have not been able at this point to arrive at a conclusion which would allow that kind of operation within the ordinary bounds of safety. We will go on looking at the question, although I think the prime responsibility for bringing those airstrips up to standard should be mainly that of the builder, which is the government of Manitoba.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): My supplementary question is also to the Minister of Transport. The airstrips which are closed are now serving Indian reserves in northern Manitoba and Indian reserves are the responsibility of the federal government. I would ask the minister to consider that the airstrips were closed for summer operations and that the winter operation of airstrips is quite different in the remote frozen north.

Mr. Lang: I am quite aware of that. I am also aware of the fact that emergency circumstances may make landings necessary which ordinarily would not be considered safe. I think, therefore, that is taken care of, but that will not allow for regular operations.

MIRABEL—REASON FOR PAYMENTS TO CONSULTANTS FOR DESIGN OF RUNWAYS AND TAXIWAYS

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, but first I should like to thank the minister for his written reply to my October 27 question confirming that the official Banaim list of consultants is correct in showing the Ministry of Transport as the only agency responsible for the design of airways, aprons and taxiways at the Mirabel airport. I wish to ask the minister whether he can explain why the answer to order paper question No. 2945 shows $9,770,175.06 being spent on outside consultants for the design of runways, aprons and taxiways at Mirabel airport.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look at what the hon. member suggested.

Has any decision been made regarding the date for a tender call for the reconstruction of Camp Hill hospital in Halifax and, if not, which government next has to make some decision before progress can take place?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to the hon. member's question that the proposed Camp Hill hospital is at present in the hands of the government of Nova Scotia. They are looking over the project and we are awaiting their answer.

Mr. Roger Young (Niagara Falls): My question is directed to the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Speaker. In view of the serious storms which struck the Great Lakes last Monday evening and in view of the serious wind and water damage which was left in its wake, has any consideration been given or will any be given to making federal emergency assistance or disaster relief available to the communities and individuals which were so hard hit?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a fairly well accepted policy that where there is damage caused by natural disaster relief is primarily under provincial jurisdiction. However, in the event that circumstances are beyond the resources of the province—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: —the federal government has indicated on a formula basis its willingness to assist.

IMMIGRATION

PORTUGUESE REFUGEES FROM ANGOLA—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ASSIST—SUGGESTION MINISTER ATTEND MEETING OF PORTUGUESE PEOPLE IN TORONTO

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the serious suffering many Portuguese citizens have undergone as a result of their ouster from Angola, what steps have the minister's officials taken to assist these people and what facilities are available for many of them to come to Canada as refugees?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in response to representations from my colleague, the hon. member for Spadina, as well as other hon. members we have looked into this and we are following the situation very closely. As the hon. member knows, people from Angola are also Portuguese citizens, even after November 11 which I believe was Angola's independence day. We have issued instructions to expedite any applications of Angolans who have relatives here in Canada. We have asked our people in Lisbon and in other offices nearby to treat those applications with the greatest consideration. I must say that we have not had a great volume of people as yet applying from within Canada for that consideration, but we are watching very closely.

Mr. Gilbert: I wonder if the minister or his officials would attend the meeting of Portuguese people in Toronto next Tuesday to explain the position of the government in this important matter.

Mr. Andras: There was a meeting in Ottawa with representatives of the Portuguese community led by the hon. member for Spadina about a month or two ago. The information I have just given to the House a minute ago was conveyed to the Portuguese community in Toronto. I personally met with Portuguese people in Winnipeg about a month ago and told them the same thing. One of the problems is that people in Angola are not refugees under the definition of the UN convention, but we are doing our best to watch the situation and I will be glad to meet with them or have somebody meet them to elaborate our position, but we have already informed them of our position on this matter.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In answering some questions regarding Bill C-73 he said the gross income of professional people will be regulated to a maximum of $2,400. If the gross income of professional people is to be regulated, what will stop professionals in Canada from raising their fees to their clientele and working for, say, nine months out of twelve?

SUGGESTION INDEPENDENT PRODUCERS DISTRIBUTE OWN FILMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Representatives of the National Film Board are now asking independent producers, when bidding on a project, to include the cost as well as the method of distribution of the film. Is it the policy of the minister's department that producers now also become distributors of films, and does he not agree that such a policy would seriously prejudice, if not kill, many small independent producers, and that such a policy is designed to funnel business to the government corporation which already has its own distribution facilities?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I fully understand the question. Let me examine it before I answer the hon. member.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF ACCEPTING PRIVATE BILL DEALING WITH GUN CONTROL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a week or so ago I asked the Minister of Justice whether or not, in view of the very widespread increase in gun toting criminals, he would be prepared to give consideration to accepting the private bill that I have introduced which provides for a minimum of five years for gun toting criminals, hoods and their like, without there being any reduction by parole, and he said he would look into it and let the House know.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if that were solely the effect of the right hon. gentleman's bill, I would share his concern. I am preparing a number of amendments to the Criminal Code and I am taking that into account. But the effect of the right hon. gentleman's bill, as I understand it, would be to provide a minimum sentence of five years for the commission of any indictable offence while carrying a firearm, which could have the effect that a hunter, for example, charged with drunken driving while carrying a firearm in the back of his truck—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: —could end up with a five year minimum sentence. The gentleman opposite do not like it, but that is the advice I have as to the effect of the bill. That is why I am not prepared to suggest to the House leader that we deal with that private member's bill, but the sentiment of the bill in terms of the desire to control the use of firearms and increase the standard of care for firearms is very much in my mind, and it will be introduced in the House in due course.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask the government House leader how he has plotted the time of the House for the rest of this week and next week. I use the word "plotted" in its best sense, of course.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I try to plot as much as possible in consultation whith my hon. friend and with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is the intention of the government to proceed immediately with Bill C-58. When the debate on that bill is concluded, I have two bills in mind: Bill C-20 and, if possible, the government annuities bill which I hope will be on the order paper for debate by Monday. Those are the items which are immediately before the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister makes it unnecessary for me to ask one of my two weekly questions, in that he has now made it clear that we will be dealing with the government annuities bill very soon. Can the minister now tell us when we will deal with the bill implementing the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs with respect to Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war?

Mr. Sharp: I regret that I am not in a position to answer that question as yet.

TIME ALLOCATION MOTION WITH RESPECT TO BILL C-58

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as appears in Votes and Proceedings, I gave notice of my intention to proceed under Standing Order 75C to propose an allocation of time on Bill C-58. I therefore move, in accordance with Standing Order 75C:

That, in relation to Bill C-58, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, five hours shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and

That, at the expiry of the fifth such hour, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding before the House, if required for the purpose of this order, and shall forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I propose this motion with reluctance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and other hon. members are well aware that, pursuant to the provisions of the Standing Order, a two-hour debate is to follow the presentation of the motion. I hope all hon. members will have ample opportunity to describe their reluctance during that two-hour period, rather than at this moment. I believe the Standing Order requires that we put the motion forthwith, followed by a two-hour debate. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Any remarks at this moment by the President of the Privy Council would, of course, initiate the two-hour debate. I wonder whether it is the disposition of hon. members to conclude the remaining routine proceedings before commencing the debate. If that is agreed, I could call the remaining routine proceedings and then we could begin with the remarks of the President of the Privy Council. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Question No. 2,942—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the amount of government assistance of all forms of price support, subsidy, etc. in the years 1973-74 and 1974-75 for (a) beef (b) meat other than beef (c) eggs (d) dairy products (e) grains (f) fruit (g) vegetables (h) other forms of assistance to farmers such as fertilizers or pest controls?

2. (a) Have estimates been prepared of the costs in the above categories for the year 1975-76 and, if so, what are they (b) alternatively, what are the estimated commitments to date?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): In so far as Agriculture Canada is concerned: 1.

	1973-74 $		1974-75 $
(a)	Nil		46,470,824
(b)	66,778		1,914
(c)	Nil		Nil
(d)	118,580,572	manufactured milk and cream	229,662,713
	51,473,766	Consumer milk and powder	74,620,777
(e)	22,273,304		21,425,938
(f)	Nil		Nil
(g)	35,927		636
(h)	1,038,000		1,752,356

2. Estimates have been prepared, but in the area of price support it is not possible to outline all levels of expenditure in advance, since under the Agricultural Stabilization Act expenditures are not required every year for each category of product. With the foregoing qualification, estimated expenditures in 1975-76 will be as follows:

(a)			(b)
	Estimated 1975-76 $		Paid To Date $
(a)	20,500,000		3,002,824
(b)	Nil		Nil
(c)	Nil		Nil
(d)	266,000,000	Manufactured milk and cream	146,879,500
	16,320,000	Consumer milk and powder	6,108,260
(e)	21,000,000		9,116,515
(f)	500,000		Nil
(g)	13,600,000		13,218,591
(h)	3,375,000		Nil

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: The amount of government assistance in the form of a price support or subsidy is: 1. (e) 1973-74, $69,385,925; 1974-75, $81,230,325.

2. 1975-76, $200,000,000. The above payments are made, under the two price wheat program, to the Canadian Wheat Board, the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board and directly to wheat producers in Quebec and the Maritimes. These payments reduce the price of flour and are a consumer subsidy.

CANADIAN WILDLIFE SERVICE—BIRD KILLING PERMITS

Question No. 3,110—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. Is it the policy of the Canadian Wildlife Service to issue a permit for the killing of a bird which is considered to be the first of its species to appear in a particular province if (a) a specimen of that bird is already in a collection in (i) Canada (ii) elsewhere in North America (b) that bird is of a species listed in the Red Data Book of the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources as a rare species?

2. What specific criteria are applied by the Canadian Wildlife Service to determine whether an applicant for a permit to kill a bird for collection purposes should be granted the permit?

3. For the purpose of issuing permits to kill birds for collection purposes, what specific criteria are employed by the Canadian Wildlife Service to define an eligible (a) applicant (b) institution (c) scientific inquiry or experiment?

4. What safeguards are enforced by the Canadian Wildlife Service to ensure that permits issued by them do not contribute to the depletion of bird species which are rare in (a) a province or region (b) Canada (c) the world?

5. Has the Canadian Wildlife Service considered the application in Canada of the practice in Great Britain of absolutely prohibiting the killing of a bird where the sole purpose is to verify its identity or to add it to a list of known species and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, for what reason has that system not been applied in Canada?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. George Baker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. (a) Some permits are issued to agencies such as the National Museum of Natural Sciences, Provincial Museums, some universities and Provincial Wildlife agencies without species restrictions except for those species native to Canada which are rare and endangered or are under provincial jurisdiction. (i) Yes; (ii) yes (b) Not all species listed in the IUCN Red Data Book are really rare by Canadian definition. In these cases there is no biological reason not to do so.

2. The criteria are listed in Section 19 of the Migratory Bird Regulations—P.C. 1975-1689. THey include, where applicable, a review of the research proposal, reputation of the applicant, including letters of support from recognized scientists, the species and area where collecting is intended.

3. (a) Letters of testimony from reputable scientists on behalf of new applicants as required by the Migratory Birds Regulations: (b) Personal knowledge of issuing officer as to whether an institution is bona fide; (c) Each research proposal is viewed on its merits, consequently it is not possible to have a single set of criteria. Some permits are issued to facilitate monitoring of toxic chemicals in the environment or the salvage of birds killed accidentally.

4. (a) No particular protection is given to stragglers not known to breed in a province, except restraint exercised by responsible scientists; (b) No particular protection is given to stragglers not known to breed in Canada; (c) Birds that are rare elsewhere in the world are not likely to be found in Canada and if found outside their normal range are likely to perish in any event.

5. Yes, it was considered; (b) This practice was rejected because of the less advanced state of knowledge of the distribution of migratory birds in Canada.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—ISSUE OF WHEELED VEHICLES FOR ARMOURED CARS

Question No. 3,132—Mr. McKinnon:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PASSENGER RESERVATION SERVICES

Question No. 3,248—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Did the Department of National Defence sign a contract with Air Canada for passenger reservation services on the Air Canada computer at a cost of $1,866,662?

2. Was the average in 1974, 25 percent on a number of available seats and, if so, what government action has been undertaken to optimize possible dollar savings?

3. Does the Department of National Defence book passenger reservations on an individual basis and, if not, would it be more economically efficient to do so?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. As stated in reply to Question No. 1,951 (Hansard 110, page 4767, dated March 14, 1975) approximately 23 per cent of the total available seats were not used. The contract with Air Canada will enable the Department to significantly improve seat utilization with consequent dollar savings.

3. Yes.

LAWYERS RETAINED BY GOVERNMENT IN CONSTITUENCY OF VICTORIA, B.C.

Question No. 3,265—Mr. McKinnon:

1. What were the names and addresses of all lawyers and law firms in the Constituency of Victoria, British Columbia who performed services for the government in 1973 and 1974?

2. By year, what was the total amount paid to each?

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. See Question No. 3,096 of July 30, 1975.

[English]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME ALLOCATION MOTION WITH RESPECT TO BILL C-58

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp:

That, in relation to Bill C-58, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, five hours shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and

That, at the expiry of the fifth such hour, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding before the House, if required for the purpose of this order, and shall forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the bill.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I propose this motion with reluctance because it had been my hope that the parties would agree to allocate time for the conclusion of the second reading debate on Bill C-58. I approached the House leader of the official opposition with this in mind and he advised me that he could not agree, on behalf of his party, to a time allocation of any kind. A motion under Standing Order 75A therefore became impossible. I thereupon approached the House leader of the New Democratic Party, who informed me that he would have been ready to participate with all the other parties in a motion under Standing Order 75A, but he was not authorized to join with the government in a motion under Standing Order 75B.

Because of the pressure of other legislation and the long period during which Bill C-58 had been discussed at second reading, the government felt that it should take the responsibility for bringing the second reading motion to a vote within a reasonable time. I remind the House that already there have been 47 speakers on Bill C-58 and they have expended a total of six days in their speeches. This motion allocates another five hours of debate, equivalent to at least another full sitting day. This will enable another seven or eight speakers to participate if they wish to speak for the maximum period of 40 minutes each, and a good many more if the speakers are content to limit their speeches to a shorter period, say 20 minutes. I doubt, therefore, if anyone could accuse the government of having unduly limited the expression of opinion by hon. members on this piece of legislation at the second reading stage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Indeed, the government may be open to the charge of having let the debate drift on too long before taking its responsibility and bringing second reading to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A number of other charges, too.

Mr. Sharp: Moreover, it is only when the bill gets into committee and at the report stage that amendments can be proposed and debated. The House will recall that because of the desire of various outside groups to make representations, there was unanimous agreement to refer Bill C-58 to the standing committee rather than to the committee of the whole House which is the usual route for bills relating to taxes. It was the universal desire of the House that this bill should get into committee where the various groups pro and con could make their representations.

Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C have been used infrequently—75C very sparingly indeed. I am inclined to think that in the future more use should be made of the principle of allocation of time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Or, if I were to use a phrase which might commend itself more to members of the opposition, if we were to use the principle of management of time, which I think is useful to all parties of the House, I would think—

An hon. Member: You mean manipulation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —that something of this kind would be regarded with some favour. Moreover, I believe that the weight of debate should be shifted forward—I know this view is shared by many people in the House, including at least some of the House leaders—away from second reading, which tends to be repetitious and discursive, and toward the more focused debates which take place in committee, at report stage and on third reading.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1510)

Mr. Sharp: It is my intention to bring proposals like this before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization within a short time. Meanwhile, since we have to work with the instruments that are at our disposal, I feel the government is fully justified and the people would expect us to bring this issue to a vote at the present time so that the public can make its representations to members of this House and we can reach a decision on this very important bill.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly obvious that a government which cannot manage the economy certainly cannot manage this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: It is rather ironic that this motion for closure, or allocation of time, is brought under Standing Order 75C and the godfather of that rule now sits in this House occupied with other business, and the rule itself was imposed upon this House by closure. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) would say: It's a long, long lane that has no ash cans.

It is amazing for me to see hon. gentlemen opposite, those who formed the Liberal opposition of 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962 and 1963, sitting in this House now and behaving as they are, having seen the kind of organized resistance there was at that time. Not too many of them are here now. I think the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) was here, and I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) was here in 1963. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) was probably behind the firing line, fashioning the bullets—most of them duds. In those days, the Liberal opposition facing the government under my friend the right hon. member for Prince Albert, took 65 days, 70 days, 75 days, 80 days, and a one time 88 days to consider supply: 88 days to put supply through this House because of the organized opposition and filibuster of the Liberal opposition of that time!

An hon. Member: Where is that government now?

Mr. Baldwin: Those practitioners of the open mouth have become advocates of the muzzle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who does not fear the use of closure. I have always said in this House and outside that if members of the House, whether of the opposition parties or on the government side, took up time that should not be taken in a fruitless and useless filibuster, the government had a responsibility to intervene.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I have never argued otherwise. But they have to be very careful and sensitive with respect to the issue. Members of the House on all sides—I even include those silent members of the phalanx of the sphinx who sit over there saying nothing, breathing loudly and sometimes making speeches—when there is a case to be taken to the people of Canada, as we in this party felt there was after careful reflection of the principle involved in this bill, have the duty—not only the right, but the duty—particularly members of the opposition, to say that we will debate the measure to the extent necessary so that the people of Canada may be aware of what the government is trying to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Bill C-58 is not a long bill but it is rather intricate. It was not apparent to the people of Canada exactly what the government was trying to do. I see the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) shaking his head. He knows better. I only wish we had a freedom of information bill, because I would love to examine his files and see the letters that were sent to him opposing this measure. Hon. members on this side received a deluge of mail up to the time the measure was debated before the recess. We were doing what was our responsibility, laying the facts before the people on this issue.

The speeches have not been long. Yesterday there were nine speakers including the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). All in all, it was a short day. In my judgment, if the President of the Privy Council had restrained his impetuosity and stayed in line, this bill might have been completed today or on Monday. But, as I have said, the speeches were not long. It is the right, the duty and the responsibility of members of the opposition, on an issue of this kind where principle is involved, to say what they have to say on behalf of their constituents and the people of Canada generally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Having said that, I do not need to go any further than to say we intend to oppose this most improper and monstrous motion. Before concluding I would respond to the invitation of the President of the Privy Council with regard to abuse of the time of this House. I suggest to the hon. gentleman, as I have told him privately and in correspondence, that when we can restore to members of this House, on all sides, some capacity to challenge the government in an adequate way to deal with supply in the House—at least to the extent that some departments can be brought into the House and examined adequately—when private members have an opportunity to raise issues which can be debated, and that includes members on the government side, when there are supply days which are meaningful, when the opposition has some right to select the time when controversial matters of current interest can be debated, the President of the Privy Council should consider taking this blunt and useless weapon which was rammed down the throat of this House by the present Minister of Finance—the closure rules—and modify them so they can be used on appropriate occasions.

Speaking for myself, I would have no compunction about that kind of rule being placed on the rule book of this House. But there must be a quid pro quo. We must restore to this House the rights which have been filched from it over the last three or four years. This democratic process can only operate on the basis of a partnership between the government and the House of Commons. That partnership does not now exist.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if instead of being limited to ten minutes I were limited to one word with which to describe this motion, that word would be "stupid".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say that the government's action in presenting this motion is stupid for two reasons. One of the reasons is that in my view there are better ways to deal with the management of the time of this House—and I shall say something about that in a moment. The other reason is that I am convinced that the effect of this motion will be that second reading of Bill C-58 will be attained in this House later than would otherwise have been the case.

If this motion carries and there are to be five more hours of debate, that takes it beyond tonight and over to Monday, so Bill C-58 will come to its second reading vote some time this coming Monday evening. I am satisfied that otherwise the debate would have petered out today.

● (1520)

Mr. Sharp: That is not the message we received.

An hon. Member: You sent the wrong messenger.

Mr. Sharp: You cannot have it both ways.

An hon. Member: There is no agreement.

Mr. Lawrence: We do not have to agree with you. The debate would have been over at five o'clock. This is stupid.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Although the time for the debate is limited, many hon. members can speak their minds. I hope that in the meantime hon. members will allow the Chair to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize the the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) said that he had been told by members of the official opposition that they could not agree to time allocation and had a long list of speakers. According to my information—after all, we talk to our friends behind the curtains and we know what is happening—debate would have petered out this afternoon, or tonight at the latest.

The other reason for my thinking this method stupid is that there are much better ways of concluding a debate. I still believe in collective bargaining, in arguing things out until there is agreement. I know that in collective bargaining matters this government does not always stay at the table as long as it should, and the minister felt that in this instance he had stayed long enough. Let me remind him of two recent instances. I pick my words carefully, as I know one does not disclose secrets which are discussed at meetings of House leaders. Even so, I can remind the President of the Privy Council and my other fellow House leaders that when we met as a group on Thursday, October 23, we planned a program of business for the rest of that week and the next week until Friday, October 31. We got through that program of business, plus one more bill. We met again on Thursday, October 30, to consider a program of business from that day until Friday, November 7. What happened? Again, we got through all the items in that program, plus one more which we had not planned.

There are times when debate bogs down. What is wrong with that? This is the place of debate. There are times when members feel strongly about an issue and debate is extended. But I still think that the best way to sort things out is by sitting down and talking them through until there is agreement. In this case, I think that either agreement could have been reached or the debate would have died a natural death. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a stupid method to apply to this issue. It is unfortunate, as well, because of the negative effect it has on efforts to arrive at some basis for managing the time of this House.

I make no bones about it: I have been involved in some pretty vigorous battles around here to do with closure. I was not here when Sir Robert Borden's Conservative party was in power in 1913—

An hon. Member: Are you sure, Stanley?

Mr. Dick: Check the record.

Mr. Lawrence: He came the next year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) mentioned that Standing Order 75C, which we are now considering, was forced through under closure. He did not point out that the closure motion that was used for this purpose was rule 33, a Sir Robert Borden creation back in 1913. Not only have I been involved in some battles against the imposition of closure; I have contended, in speeches and in written articles, that if this place is to survive we must find ways to better manage and allocate our time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to hear the support from the government side. But managing and allocating our time does not mean having the government side do this unilaterally or dictatorially. Both sides of this House were elected properly and officially. Both sides ought to have their say. I believe that we can work out rules on the basis of all—

Mr. Baldwin: You had your chance in 1972, and you blew it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was in 1972 that the twenty-ninth parliament was elected, and thank heaven, we got lots of things through in that parliament before this government went completely reactionary.

I point out that we have been willing at any time to agree to an all-party arrangement to bring this debate to an end. We have kept our speeches to the minimum. Yesterday, only one of our members spoke—our leader. He talked no longer than 15 or 20 minutes. Today, only the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) is to speak, and he is always brief and to the point. We have said in our speeches that we are not as scandalized at Bill C-58 as are our friends in the Progressive Conservative party. Hence, I make the point that I am not speaking against the use of Standing Order 75C as one who wants to block the vote on Bill C-58. We think it should come to a vote, and have said so a number of times. We also know that the vote on second reading will not be the end of the bill. It must go to standing committee, remain there for goodness knows how long, return for the report stage, and be read the third time. So if the decision to close this stage of the debate is taken, it is not the end of democracy. But I still think it is a stupid way to go about it.

An hon. Member: Do you spell that with a double "o"?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear my hon. friend asking if I spell "stupid" the usual way, "or s-t-o-o-p-i-d." At any rate, this is a stupid way to deal with the management of the time of this House, and we shall vote against this motion. I am sorry this method is being used, not only because I think it is the wrong way to bring this debate to a close but because it is a setback to efforts for arriving at a reasonable and rational arrangement for the effective use of the time of this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada, I want to express our very deep concern over the position taken by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) who has to resort to Standing Order 75C, which is, in effect, taking away the privilege acquired through our electors, the opposition's right to speak. As far as we are concerned in respect of this bill, we did not abuse the time of this House, something we never did.

I would state at this point that Progressive Conservative members appear to be more directly involved than we are in the legislation, possibly because they have a larger representation of constituents against and receive more correspondence opposing the bill. First I must commend that party for having spoken so often. I believe in a democracy one can speak when one feels, and when one must do so in this House.

When he introduced his motion, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) suggested his view was shared by a number of members in this House. I submit that point of view, on the motion introduced under rule 75C this afternoon, is not at all shared. I believe this is unilateral action. We in the Social Credit Party and all the House leaders here, both opposition and government, feel there are far fewer interventions, far fewer changes in time allocations for the various bills, as the hon. member said before me, when there is a consensus between the four House leaders. I believe the procedure is much more successful thereafter, and there is much better opportunity to prepare for a smoother and shorter debate, and a better chance of being heard.

I believe rule 75C has no place here this afternoon and would create a very dangerous precedent, because rule 75C is used to deal as swiftly as possible with Bill C-58 within five hours, after two hours' discussion on the motion for rule 75C which makes seven hours in all. The bill will not be voted this week yet. The business on Bill C-58 is further delayed by two or three days.

I suggest that with this move, the President of the Privy Council demonstrated he simply will not talk with House leaders. That I regret very much, and I hope it will not happen too often.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the motion to limit debate under Standing Order 75C. In the past two days I have heard many comments by opposition members about this motion and Bill C-58. The term "censorship" has constantly been used. They say the government is censoring Time and Reader's Digest and bringing censorship into this House in terms of this motion. I will later speak about Time and Reader's Digest to show how ridiculous it is to say that we are invoking censorship in this case. I wish to deal with the motion and the history of this bill. This bill has been in the House for 5½ days. There have been 34 opposition speakers—31 Progressive Conservative and 3 NDP. The opposition has spoken for 14 hours and this side for 3½ hours, for a total of 17½ hours. We are proposing an additional 5 hours, which will make a total of 22½ hours.

Since this parliament began in September, 1974, five bills have taken up the bulk of the allotted time. The budget bills took days and days, and the competition bill took weeks. There were a couple of bills in which I was involved, one of which was Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act. It was introduced into the House on October 25, 1974, and given third reading on April 30, 1975.

In that period of about seven months there were 36 Conservative speakers and NDP. Second reading took 15 days. I might also mention that the petroleum administration bill was introduced during the twenty-ninth parliament and there was a long debate at that time. Bill C-8, the Petro-Can bill, was given first reading on October 3, 1974, and finally passed on July 23, 1975. Second reading took a total of 11 days. With regard to this bill, there were 12 meetings in committee when only clause 2 was dealt with.

If we are going to allocate time intelligently in this House, we have to do something about these prolonged debates. In at least one instance there was a real filibuster in this House. That was with regard to the petroleum bill. The business of the House cannot continue unless we get rid of this kind of prolonged debate where the attempt is not just to debate the issue but to prevent a bill receiving second reading. Yesterday, a number of members said that this bill should not have been brought forward at this time because there are far more important things to debate, such as inflation, the restraint guidelines, and so on. However, 34 Conservative members spoke on that bill for 14 hours.

In the British House of Commons I understand they have a way of allocating time. Second reading of a bill usually involves no more than one full sitting. A sitting may be extended to the next day, but normally it is one sitting. The place to debate this bill is in committee. A number of opposition members have stated that they want the bill moved to committee so they can suggest amendments and receive briefs. That is where the bill should be considered in detail. Therefore, I think it is right that we complete this debate in the next five hours and get the bill to committee.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to cover the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, but his attitude indicates that he does not know as much about parliament as he should.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The trouble is that some members sitting opposite, regardless of the length of time they have been here, have displayed the same lack of knowledge of this institution that the member who just spoke evidenced to such high degree. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) is not here at the moment, but it is of interest to note that the motion was moved by him—a motion of guillotine, of closure—and seconded by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury), both of whom were long-time civil servants of high degree. Today, they will espouse the philosophy that they held and which is generally held by those in the higher echelons of the civil service, namely, that the House of Commons is of no consequence, they have the answers to all the problems and all we have to do is rubber-stamp whatever they bring before parliament.

I listened to the President of the Privy Council and I had never seen him perform better. It was an outstanding performance of piety and regard for parliament. As I listened to him I was reminded of Sir Winston Churchill's observation concerning a minister who had served in his cabinet during the days of war, Sir Stafford Cripps: he said, "Mr. Speaker, God Almighty never made a man as honest as he can look on occasion."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There he was, today, displaying that love for parliament embalmed only in words. I would suggest, having regard to the philosophy which he enunciated, that he should get in touch with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) who, in the course of an answer to me this afternoon, said that House business is a matter to be negotiated between House leaders. I have never known a better answer. I suggest that these ministers who would trample on the rights of parliament should get in touch with the Minister of Justice who in the few short months he has occupied that portfolio has shown an appreciation of parliament.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) summed up what is being done in one word—stupid. I find myself in disagreement with him. This is not stupidity; it is Liberal government arrogance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the same thing.

● (1540)

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the kind of thing we saw in such abundant measure in the House of Commons during the days of the pipeline debate. I recall, too, that when the Liberal party was in power they brought about a flag for Canada by closure, knowing that they could not achieve it otherwise.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member is just on the outskirts of greatness as a parliamentary secretary, and all I can say is that his applause indicates his lack of knowledge of the subject. I say that with great respect to him.

What are they afraid of over there? The President of the Privy Council says this issue has been before parliament since April. The notice of ways and means was concurred in on April 18 and the bill was given first reading on that date. The bill was debated on May 8, 16, 20 and 26, and then there was a hiatus between May 26 and June 4. Then it was brought in again. Who is responsible for that? A government which does not know how to carry on government!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister who is responsible for this bill surprises me greatly, trying to push through a measure which is widely opposed across Canada, and denying members of parliament the right to express themselves clearly and succinctly on a proposal which is dangerous to freedom of speech in this country and which constitutes a type of censorship. I am not here—I mention this only because we shall be arguing the case later—as a proponent of Time or Reader's Digest. As far as the latter is concerned, I can see no reason for this legislation. As far as Time is concerned, when I see the line-up on the part of those who want to bring about this change, when I see the owners of Maclean's magazine which has taken such a strong stand in this regard, I think it is worth pointing out that the company owning Maclean's was in receipt of revenues last year totalling $132 million, that it is the largest publisher of national periodicals in Canada and that it publishes periodicals in the United States, Great Britain, France, South Africa, Germany and Austria.

What is going to happen? The party opposite has a majority in numbers—though they are not representative of the people of Canada—and they intend to force this bill through by closure. They are going to deny discussion. If the bill is passed, what will happen? A monopoly of the thinking of Canada will be assumed by Mr. Peter Newman, the editor of Maclean's. That is what will happen. Hon. gentlemen opposite smile. The castigation he gave the former leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Pearson, was a disgrace. He is a man with no idea of the democratic system at all; a man who believes in power. All his writings have to do with power. Yet he will be in a position, as editor of a magazine with a million circulation, to dominate the thinking of Canadians to an extend no one has yet been able to achieve. I am opposed to monopolies, either in general or in particular, when they have to do with the thinking of Canadians. Yet this area is to be controlled and dominated by a person who has no regard for the parliamentary system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The President of the Privy Council will recall the pipeline debates. He smiles; he bows his head in acknowledgment. I smile, too, when I think of the reaction of the Liberals at the time of that debate. They trampled on the rights of parliament as the government is endeavouring to do now, and they reaped their reward when Canadians had their first opportunity to speak. All I can say is this: You can apply the muzzle. You can let fall the guillotine. But this legislation in its present form constitutes such an interference with the freedom of thought and freedom of the press in Canada as to constitute a dereliction in the constitutional rights of parliament to interfere with freedom of speech.

First, there is the control over thinking with Peter Newman. Second, there is the denial of the alternative regarding Canada being shown or revealed by any magazine which could compete with Maclean's. Third, there is the attitude on the part of the government that because they have an arithmetical majority they can trample on the rights of the Canadian people. It is not stupid; it is even worse than that: it is further evidence of the fact that the Liberal party today is in keeping with what happened in 1956 when the rights of parliament were trampled upon. That is happening now, because you have a group of individuals who, regardless of what is brought before parliament by the government, have to toe the line and support the administration, irrespective of the dangers and difficulties which will ensue for parliament itself.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to make one point in addition to those which have been made, and I think it is exceedingly pertinent. My understanding is that since the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) announced the guidelines which would constitute the background of this bill—perhaps they are not so much guidelines as the very foundation upon which the administration will be based—we had a debate yesterday and we are having five hours more debate. I would simply make the point that it is not correct to seek to give the impression in the House or in the country that there have been 5½ hours or 6 hours of debate on the issue which is now before us. The issue was only put before the House precisely when the Minister of National Revenue stated his position. Prior to that time there had been grave doubt as to the basis upon which this bill would be administered.

I suggest that for a government to impose what is, in effect, closure upon a discussion after 3 hours or 3½ hours of debate—that is what it is, 3½ hours of debate—on an issue clearly before the House, because prior to that time we were debating in the midst of fog without any clear idea how some of these things would be interpreted without any idea as to the basis of administration, is to impose closure after only 3½ hours of debate on the actual issue.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I thought we were discussing Bill C-58. Can one rise now to talk about Bill 58?

An hon. Member: We are discussing Standing Order 75C!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The House is debating a motion on time allocation for Bill C-58.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the official opposition, I know of no more difficult task than to follow the speech just made by our leader and the very enthusiastic speech made by the former prime minister of Canada, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Translation]

I will now address the government. I am surprised that the government faces us today with a guillotine motion. I am surprised, because for quite some time already they have had a majority which enables them to manage the country in the democratic way we all know. But in spite of that majority, they have chosen today to muzzle and tie up the official opposition, to accelerate the passing of this bill. I am surprised, but maybe not because we read during the weekend that those people, at a Liberal convention, had voted almost unanimously against capital punishment, and we realize now how easily they dare impose closure, how easily they resort to guillotine, and let the blade fall on the heads of democratic forces in the House.

But on the other hand, one or two contradictions more do not really matter. What surprises me also, Mr. Speaker, is that on many occasions this government was depicted as cynical, machiavelical, disrespectful of popular will, and recently—

An hon. Member: By whom?

Mr. Wagner: A government member, who was at the same time the joint chairman of the convention, asks by whom. The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux Montagnes

(Mr. Fox) should know that at the Liberal convention Mr. Trudeau's leadership was unofficially questioned by 19.8 per cent of delegates, but not officially of course, Mr. Speaker.

If we wanted to know the true figures and if all of Canada had been truly represented at that convention, the figure expressing resentment against the Trudeau administration would probably have been 35 per cent.

In view of this resentment of the Canadian people and these rising protests, I am therefore not surprised that the government is showing once again its old arrogance and saying to the official opposition: A few hours more would be detrimental to Canadian politics and we must therefore muzzle you.

Mr. Speaker, may I say that the members opposite seem to be afraid of history, but history is back to haunt them today. We can already see the ghosts of C. D. Howe and St. Laurent. Those were historical times. Closure had been invoked at that time and we know what historical results it had for that government.

Today maybe on a less significant level, I admit it, the principle is still valid. Today this same government is using the muzzling procedure to impose closure. The judgment of the opposition will also be the judgment of the whole Canadian people concerning the Trudeau administration, which has already been judged in 1972, which was judged recently in Hochelaga and which will continue to be judged as a government which does not care about democratic principles, and uses its omnipotent majority to try to muzzle the official opposition. It will not succeed! You may be happy today and you may still be happy next week, but when the next election is called, this government will see that Canadians have a long memory. Action of this type is not likely to give the people a better idea of the democratic process.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I take part in debates dealing with House procedure, but I think this is an important debate and I have a few things to say about it. I was astounded by the comment of the leader of the government in this House, that parliamentary business should be a matter between House leaders. Surely that is not the way parliament is to be conducted. I can only say it is another example of the very blatant use of government power and arrogance.

I think much of this bill represents a feeling of frustration, a feeling that the opposition in this House cannot make itself heard effectively. I trace this to the 1968 change in the rules whereby the business of supply was taken out of the House. Well over one-half to two-thirds of all the business in this House has a financial component. By taking away the business of supply, whereby the government had to justify its expenditures to the House as a whole and a minister could not get his estimates through until approved by the House as a whole, the government has become much less responsible to the House and to its members. Therefore, I think this debate can be traced in large measure to the failure of parliament since the rules changes of 1968 to have any adequate control over public expenditures. The government has replied that we can have opposition days and move a motion directed at a particular government department. But all that the government has to do is to sit out the criticisms until ten o'clock; the day will then be over and the government will have won its position without disclosing it or being made accountable.

The important thing to note about this bill is that it is a form of censorship, which is essentially dangerous in any free society. One person in the communications field who was talking to me about the CRTC and the CBC—I might add that he is a supporter of the party across the way—said to me, "You don't really criticize the government too hard because you don't always quite know how governing bodies will view any criticism of the government". So that criticism of the government, while it may exist privately, is evident in the communications world in Canada; but there is a very marked reluctance to criticize the government of the day too severely. It cannot be said any better than it was said by my seatmate, the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), when quoting from the Calgary Herald of October 27 in reference to this bill, as follows:

● (1600)

That is a very dangerous precedent, even if the aim—to make fully Canadian magazines more viable—is praiseworthy. The regulations are not, strictly speaking, censorship. However, they tend to legitimize a mechanism for government interference in the decisions of a publisher. They also tend to create a climate which discourages vigorous criticism of the federal government—a disturbingly authoritarian government, at times. Donald Macdonald's decision to withhold federal advertising from a Montreal separatist newspaper is significant in retrospect. When a government begins to take measures against publications whose editorial position it dislikes, the habit can quickly become ingrained.

The government's s action against Time and Reader's Digest, admittedly, is not intended to silence voices of dissent. The hope is that stifling these two magazines will enable Maclean's, Saturday Night and the like to breathe more freely, commercially speaking. But no matter how noble its purpose, a government that sets out to destroy or financially cripple a magazine bears watching. It might develop a taste for blood.

I think this is the important aspect of this bill and the aspect with which the debate has generally been concerned. It was said by the government House leader that more speeches should take place on third reading and at the report stage. I am one of those who believes that in practice, unless we speak on second reading, what we might say at third reading and at the report stage will be of little value in explaining to the public at large what we think about a particular piece of legislation. I am one who supports strongly the suggestion that debate in this House at second reading is the most valuable way in which issues can be put before the Canadian public.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this motion, I think there are a few facts of which I should like to remind the House. The subject of Bill C-58 has been a matter of public debate for at least two decades. The government announced its intention to move on this matter on January 23, 1975, in a statement in the House by the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner). Three of the respondents for the opposition, the hon. members for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), expressed basic support for the policy announced in January. In this regard one need only check Hansard of January 23, pages 2527 to 2529. If one does check the exchange of hon. members, one will see that all three hon. members indicated they had been impatiently awaiting that announcement. The hon. member for York-Simcoe began by saying:

—I would first like to say, on behalf of the official opposition, that we are pleased the government has clarified this matter at long last.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie and the hon. member for Lotbinière echoed this comment. We can see that the policy to be implemented under Bill C-58 was announced almost ten full months ago and on April 17, almost seven months ago, notice of the ways and means motion on which the bill was based was laid before the House. The next day, April 18, the bill was given first reading. This bill has been debated at second reading stage for six days, May 8, 16, 20 and 26, June 4 and November 12, for a total of 19 hours. Some 47 members have spoken—12 Liberals, 30 Conservatives, 3 members of the NDP and 2 Social Credit members.

While this extensive debate has been going on for hours, spread over seven months—ten, if you deal with policy—we have been exposed, as well, both publicly and privately to the views of persons and corporations directly affected. We have heard from Time, Reader's Digest, the American broadcasters, Maclean's and other interested Canadians both within and outside the media. We have heard claims and counterclaims; we have heard rumours and counter-rumours but all we have come up with thus far in the House of Commons is talk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: We do not need much more talk now.

An hon. Member: What are you doing? Where have you been?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: We have had 19 hours of talk, and the government proposes another five hours. After that, in order to be in a position to make decisions the House of Commons will need facts; and the place to get the facts is in committee, not at second reading. The Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts can call witnesses. Interested parties and representatives of Time and Reader's Digest can appear at that time to put their case to the committee. Then the committee can make a decision based on the facts. Eventually, so will the House be in a position to make its decision based on facts and not, as has been the case on occasion in the past when there has not been too much fact, perhaps on posturing and other things outside the realm of actual fact.

The time has come for the bill to go to the committee. Those who have been so concerned with this matter have the right to make their case in public. The government has no desire to unduly restrict debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where have you been?

Mr. Anderson: The government has no desire to unduly restrict debate, especially on a measure that concerns the media. However, one cannot but conclude that all points of view will be expressed more than adequately after 24 hours of debate. The time has come for the bill to go to the committee. If I may use the words of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the time has come for the bill to go to the committee "at long last". Amen!

[Mr. Anderson.]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, from the speech of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) it is obvious to most of us that he just came in and has missed the speeches of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

An hon. Member: He was just lucky, I guess.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The point of those speeches, particularly the speech by the Leader of the Opposition, was to the effect that the guidelines relating to how this bill is to be applied have only been the subject of debate, in terms of time, for 3½ hours. I think the hon. member missed the point completely. No one will deny, in so far as second reading is concerned, that there have been a great number of speakers. I wish there had been more speakers from the government side, rather than those members sitting there like the trained seals they are, backing up everything this government does, good or bad. I am glad there are a few in this House who are prepared to stand and say that this government is wrong. There are very few on that side of the House who are prepared to do that—and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is not one of them. The whole point of the speech by the Leader of the Opposition was that these guidelines and how they are to be applied—which is really the guts of the bill—has only been the subject matter of debate in this House for 3½ hours.

Someone has asked what parliament is all about. Parliament is a place to discuss these issues. I have listened to the arguments and I have read the statement of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) in respect of the length of time of debate. The only thing that statement has done is indicate just how inadequate the President of the Privy Council has been in respect of the management of the business of this House. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) called him stupid. Well, I have not been here long enough to say that.

● (1610)

Mr. MacFarlane: He did not say that; he is too honourable.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): But I have been here long enough, Mr. Speaker, and I have had enough to do with the management of the business of this House in the short time that I have been here to realize that the management of this place has been stupid. There are members from all sides of the House who are interested in reforming the rules. I have on the order paper a private bill regarding the order of business, and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) issued a very detailed and long statement on how he would like to see the business of the House organized. But one thing none of them has said is that the business of the House should be organized in such a way that the members of the House, whether they sit on the government side or the opposition side, should be muzzled when we talk about a matter of significant public interest.

There can be no doubt about the interest of the public on this issue. I do not know of any issue, whether it be capital punishment, abortion or bilingualism, about which I have received so much mail—not form letters such as we get on some issues, but letters from people who felt so strongly with respect to the matter that they decided to pick up a pen and write a letter in their own way. Some say that that has been induced by a campaign, but nonetheless those are sentiments expressed by Canadians whom the closure rule should not muzzle.

In so far as the management of the business of the House is concerned, let me just say that if there had been reasonable communication between the government House leader and the opposition House leader with respect to the length of time, we would have found, perhaps, that the debate would have finished much sooner than it will finish now. The hon. lady opposite—I am reluctant to call her that, because we will have a question of privilege—is shaking her head to say no. I happen to know that that is so.

I do not know who the messenger boy was that was sent over from the government side to determine how long this debate would last. If it was the whip of the government, then I can understand how the mistake was made. But if the government House leader had come across and spoken to his counterpart, as he calls him, concerning the number of speakers in the debate, I think he would have ascertained the length of the list of speakers. But more important than that is how this House can stand such stupidity. We have been standing stupidities as long as I can remember since 1972. As long as I have had to look at the government opposite, we have been standing inadequacies in management. But the one thing we should not do, and it is very important when an issue has had so little time for the type of real debate that counts—only 3½ hours, as mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield)—is to cut off the backbenchers of the House, members of the House who are not members of the government, members who represent people of varying opinions. In that respect this government is wrong and the House leader is wrong, and anyone who supports the government or its House leader is wrong: hon. members know that.

Some hon. members, as I look across the chamber, appear to feel somewhat badly about what has happened because they know how important this bill is and how strong the feelings are, but many of those members should have had some influence on the government House leader. What was so important that it could not, by natural attrition, have waited until Monday night—two debating days?

Mr. McRae: What is so great about Monday night?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member, as usual, does not know what he is talking about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. The hon. member should address the Chair.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): May I say, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member does not know what he is talking about, as usual. The proof of that was in the speech he made a little while ago.

An hon. Member: Are you speaking ex cathedra?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I heard something from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane). I expected something of greater significance. I think there is an extremely important aspect of the bill which should not be forgotten by members of the House when they rise to vote on this measure, and that is the matter referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, namely, the clarification of these guidelines at long last. How these rules were going to be applied was only clarified to the extent of the debate of the House, and we have had only 3½ hours of debate.

An hon. Member: And eight speakers.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Whether there were eight, nine or ten speakers, there were only 3½ hours of debate, and I think this is a travesty of the rules. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, it has set back the business of consultation perhaps by a session with respect to the rationalization of the rules of this House. A shameful act has been committed today and this government, as well as those who support it, should be ashamed of themselves.

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will try to avoid responding in kind to the type of argument or lack of argument advanced by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I will try to resist the temptation of discussing the merits or demerits of whips and other personalities in the House. In fact, I will try as best I can to stick to the procedures and methods of debate which have characterized this House for some time.

First of all, I would like to relate very briefly the history of the bill. I gave notice of the government's intention to introduce the bill on January 23—11 months ago. A ways and means motion was put before the House by the then minister of finance on April 17. Second reading started on May 8. The subject matter of the bill has been before the House and the people of this country, at least formally, for 11 months. Today, we are on the seventh day of debate. We have had 47 speeches. All that the motion before the House today does is to move this bill forward from second reading to committee stage.

I find it rather hollow to hear the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton talk about what was said or was not said in the discussions between House leaders, and I find it rather hollow to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) talk about there being a better way. The fact is that there were discussions. This government made it absolutely clear that our preferred route was Standing Order 75A—an agreement amongst all members of the House. In fact, we did not get that agreement, and this is what the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) said. We then went to Standing Order 75B, and we could not get agreement on that either. I find it rather hypocritical for members of the official opposition to talk about the debate ending on Monday or about five o'clock this afternoon, or about some mythical date for which at no point yesterday was there any support and of which there was no mention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: I also find it hollow in the extreme to hear hon. members such as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton talk about the rights of parliament as though somehow that sanctimonious individual was any more concerned about these rights than are members on this side of the House.

● (1620)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: In fact, if the government had not tried to use the Standing Orders of this House—and they are not rules for the government; they are Standing Orders approved by the House and they are available to the House—and had not moved after all this time, given the range of other pieces of legislation before the House and pending legislation dealing with housing, government annuities and a range of other questions, I would say we would have stood, if not condemned then at least criticized for an irresponsible waste of parliamentary time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are condemned now.

Mr. Faulkner: This bill is simple. It has been around since at least 1961—since at least the royal commission. I find this extraordinary. Here I am, a rather new member of parliament, implementing the recommendations of the O'Leary commission. He is a well known Tory and a distinguished defender of civil rights and the right to free speech—and I am accused of censorship by the Tories.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: The debate has been long and repetitive. We heard hon. members like the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) quoting editorials from Belleville or Sudbury papers. I am not sure of the names and I apologize, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has never read those papers before, but yesterday they were the cornerstone of his debate and suddenly oracles of truth. These papers are relatively unknown; he certainly never reads them.

The principle behind Standing Order 75C, the issue before this House today and the vote which will take place in a few minutes, is whether an important public bill can be killed by debate rather than by a vote. That is the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: Hon. members opposite know perfectly well that no responsible government could go on forever debating Bill C-58.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who says it is a responsible government?

Mr. Faulkner: They understood that, and their tactic was not to let it come to a vote, which is essentially what this chamber is all about; their tactic was to kill the bill by talking it out. That is what the issue is all about.

Mr. McRae: Filibuster.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: What makes it all the more puzzling and what makes the position of the official opposition all the more difficult to take seriously is when one recalls that the spokesman for the official opposition, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), stood in the House and asked me this question on October 8, 1974:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State. In view of the financial difficulties of Saturday Night and several other Canadian publications, when does the government intend to keep its promises and remove tax exemption from Time and Reader's Digest?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We thought you would bring in a sensible bill.

Mr. Baldwin: What were you saying about controls at the same time?

Mr. Faulkner: That was not just a fly-by-night, sort of sporadic happening by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, because he was representing the official opposition, speaking on behalf of them and declared by his leader to be the official spokesman for the party on matters pertaining to the Secretary of State. So like any good spokesman, he came back to the issue on October 22. He was not satisfied with the answer he received from the Secretary of State, so he asked the then minister of finance the following:

> Has it been brought to the attention of the minister that if these privileges for Time were ended sufficient advertising dollars would be available to enable a Canadian magazine to go on the market immediately on a weekly basis? Has the hon. gentleman been in touch with the Secretary of State with regard to studying the question of tax privileges for Time magazine?

Then we came into 1975 when there was the announcement in January. What was the official position of the official spokesman of the official opposition in response to my proposal that we remove the exemptions? Let me quote from page 2527 of Hansard for January 23. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), who is noticeably absent today, said:

> —in responding to the statement just made I would first like to say, on behalf of the official opposition, that we are pleased the government has clarified this matter at long last. We believe that the move to eliminate the income tax advantage shared mainly by two magazines, Time and Reader's Digest, is a good one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: A year later we are accused of invoking closure, arrogance and denying the right to free speech on a bill which they themselves over the period of a year have supported. Mr. Speaker, you will understand it if from time to time we on this side of the House have difficulty taking the official opposition seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: The final point I wish to make is this. This issue does not just affect hon. members of this House; it affects a whole range of people outside who are advertisers, publishers and owners of television stations. I submit that they have a right to know where parliament stands on Bill C-58, they have a right to a decision from this House, and all we are asking today is that this bill be moved into committee where those who have interests involved and those who have ideas on this subject can meet before the parliamentary committee and make their views known. This does not seem to be such an unreasonable request. This seems to be totally consistent with the very best practices and traditions of this House, and I suggest that to follow the route proposed by the official opposition would be tantamount to a callous indifference of the rights of people outside this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat discouraged and saddened to be rising at this time.

An hon. Member: So are we.

An hon. Member: Then sit down.

Mr. Dick: I was going to support, and perhaps will support, the government in this proposed legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: I noticed last night, when reading all the speeches to date and before deciding to partake on this, the fifth complete day, that of the 11 speakers on the government side fully one-third of them disagreed with the policy of the government. I wonder whether the government is imposing closure today in fear of losing more of its backbenchers than it can afford, and therefore losing the measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: I have listened to the sanctimonious Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) who, with great oratorical prowess—or he thought it was—tried to say that the Conservative party had always stated it was supporting his proposal. He tried to say many things, but in fact he forgot to tell the people that he was supporting a royal commission which advocated the following:

—in an area as vital and sensitive as that of the press, whatever is done should be positive rather than negative, with the goal the promotion of the Canadian periodical, not the suppression of the foreign.

● (1630)

He did not quote that, but he should have. It is my judgment that the bill is headed in the right direction, one in which I happen to believe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dick: I hope my hon. friends on the government side will be as quick to applaud when I point out that there are many errors and omissions in this bill. If they had the courage of their convictions and the courage of good government and would listen to other people, they might introduce measures to strengthen the bill, such as the Canadian-owned distribution system recommended by the Davey committee and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). They might also consider a review of the postal rate structure as it affects small Canadian magazines. This cannot be done in committee. The only thing this bill deals with is the Income Tax Act; if the hon. member who is interjecting would read the bill, he would know that. It has nothing to do with distribution and postal rates. Read the damm bill!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacFarlane: That's rude.

Mr. Dick: It is not rude when the stupid member happens to say he can amend it in committee. If he can tell me how that can be amended in committee, he can stand up and I will sit down.

The Secretary of State should not have tried to speak to the present motion on this bill he was putting through the House. It would probably have been better had he let the thing run its course. I am afraid the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) has inflamed emotions in this country. We will now have more editorials than ever, and I dare say this subject has caused more editorials in the last 12 months than anything other than prices and income controls.

I believe members of this House have received more correspondence on this subject in the last 24 months than on any other topic. My own mail on it runs twice as much as on capital punishment. Yet we will deal with capital punishment in 15 or 20 days. If abortion were brought in, we might deal with that in 15 or 20 days. We always have ten days for a budget, and we will go on for a long time on prices and income controls. A lot of people feel that this bill is a type of censorship and that there is control of or interference with a free press. They are writing letters to that effect. Why not let this House have full discussion of the subject, rather than closing it down?

I abhor this procedure. I think it is unfounded and unnecessary. If the President of the Privy Council had his wits about him and knew what was going on in this House, he would know there are maybe six people still to speak from this side. I want to say that I abhor the use of closure on a bill dealing with civil liberties and an area of the Bill of Rights. A lot of people perceive it as such, and that is good enough for me. This bill cannot be amended effectively in committee, and I think it is a mistake to bring in closure.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, when a motion such as this one is under consideration, we must not forget a quite important concept of our parliamentary system.

When some provisions are practically never enforced and are at a given moment, one wonders why a debate is unilaterally restricted. And when we look for the reasons prompting the government to restrict the debates at a given moment, we find that it is always due to the evident unpopularity of a bill or still an excessive haste to enforce a bill to which Parliament sees no urgency.

Mr. Speaker, this is a consequence of an inconsistent system and the basic reason of that inconsistency is the following: we are not free to vote and this fact must be mentioned. The vote is not free. This is so true that from time to time a motion is moved to indicate that the vote will be free, which means that at other times, it is not.

When time came to vote on maintaining capital punishment or against the abolition of capital punishment, we were told that the vote was going to be a free vote. This means that, usually, a vote is not free. There is nothing more stupid in our parliamentary system than this lack of freedom about votes, since it is known in advance that the voting machine will be started on the other side of the House, that it will say yes because the government said so, regardless of the consequences in every electoral district represented by the members on the government benches.

Mr. Speaker, there is no use denying it, it is a fact, that is how it happens here, that is what I have seen for the last eight years. When you are stuck with such a system, the only thing left to do is to try, even then, to force the government to find measures that people will approve, and only those which promote emancipation and development of the whole of the country.

We have no other solution to force the government to change certain things we consider inappropriate or improper; all we can do is talk about it, insist upon it and repeat it so that at some point the government may change because we contend that it must be changed. Striking, the last resource, is the only way workers have in the present system to try to solve their problems.

The parliamentary system forces us to that. That could be remedied however if Parliament were changed. Evidently, each member would first have to recover the basic freedom we fundamentally need if we are to respect and reflect the opinion of those we pride ourselves on representing. But, Mr. Speaker, that would require at least that every vote be a free one. All we need do is get rid of established precedents and traditions whereby no government bill may be defeated. That is why our hon. colleagues on the government side make a point of voting always against their opinions, sometimes against their conscience and against their own constituents. If we were to establish the balance sheet of all these contradictions, we could end up with surprising results.

A free vote, therefore, would be the initial step to take if we want to do away with debates which last unduly. Only then could we be sure that at the time of the question, the result would reflect the opinion of the majority, while we know now that the number of votes in favour of this bill will be that of hon. members of the Liberal party present in the House. The result will not depend on the value of the bill, but on the number of members in the House. That is a question of party strength and not of opinion, which is quite unfortunate. This could be remedied by a free vote. Then, it could be easier to limit the debates if we had what our party has been advocating for a long time, fixed sessions; when we know when the session is beginning and when it is going to end, it is a lot easier to determine within this time frame how long it will take to discuss the government's legislation. In those circumstances, we, from the opposition, would not object to the government setting a well established schedule enumerating the pieces of legislation the government would put before the House. Then, we would know exactly when a legislation would be put before us and we would be a lot less inclined to discuss it at long length, whereas presently we never know what will be put before us the following week, the following day and even the following hour.

Now, all those ambiguous and equivocal situations bring us, that is the government, to try and play tricks on us by rapidly passing controversial bills, and so on. We play hide-and-seek instead of being serious and discussing objectively the intrinsic value of a bill. This is not really serious when we see that it is the way it goes. So, I take advantage of this motion to ask all members of the House to stop some time and set up to change what is wrong in the parliamentary system and sometimes brings the government to use unilaterally what it is agreed to call coercitive means to pass a bill. This is not normal. And being serious people, we could remedy this.

To conclude with, I repeat my suggestions: first, we should have a really free vote from each hon. member in this House; second, we should have sessions at a determined date so that the debates are not unduly extended; and third, we should have in advance a determined agenda of the government's intentions with the order they want to follow for the study of the different bills during the session. So we would not need this Standing Order 75C any more which whether we like it or not cannot be accepted by people who are really serious.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the debate is starting to turn and transform itself into a general debate on our Standing Orders, the procedure, the rights of the members to speak about democracy, and finally all our institutions. To my mind, those who are endeavouring to steer the debate in that direction are merely trying to create a smokescreen to hide the real issue. And that is, that 47 speakers have already spoken for 19 hours on a two-clause bill. Which brings up this question: Is it not enough that 47 hon. members spent 19 hours speaking on two clauses? My answer is this: That is quite enough. And that is the first reason that led the government to have recourse, for the first time, I believe, to Standing Order 75C.

The other reason is that no other agreement was reached between the parties of the opposition and the government. A while ago we heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) say that we could have come to an agreement. But that is crying over spilt milk. Although it has been impossible to come to an agreement for at least two weeks, we know that House leaders are meeting to discuss this topic after systematically refusing to give at least summary indications to the government House leader as to whether or not it would be possible to come to an agreement.

Having precluded all possibility to come to an understanding, they now come to the House to say: "If only the government were not so rigid and did not demand the implementation of Standing Order 75C! They even go so far as to say: If the government had not been so stupid, we could have reached an agreement. If this could have been done, it would have been before, but that did not come to pass. Now clause Standing Order 75C is being implemented and it seems to me that it is very useful. I contend that hon. members of the opposition who are against it and who are trying to put democracy on trial should conduct opinion polls in their constituencies just as we do on the government side of the House, they would then realize that the people have had debates which drag on and on in the House of Commons, and that they, the taxpayers deem inefficient.

I have been told so in the course of the seven years that I have been a member. Never has a week gone by without a voter telling me, especially now that we are a majority government: I wonder how you, the majority government, cannot pass such and such measures? Then, Mr. Speaker, we have to spend minutes and hours explaining the Standing Orders of the House of Commons to these persons, trying to convince them that the government does not control Parliament, but that in fact the members do, and that the opposition often decides when such measure will be passed, because of the number of members it wishes to have heard. The truth is that we use Standing Order 75C because it is about time, because enough is enough and because we have to reach a decision.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, I wanted to be heard, because I wished to give some details. Canadians are looking forward to see this bill go further and I am in a good position to know it, as chairman of the committee.

And I can tell you that there are 22 witnesses, I have the list here, who are waiting to appear before the committee and who have been calling me for months every week to ask what is happening in this House or how come we cannot stop those interminable palavers. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we will indeed do it through Standing Order 75C. I should like all members to note that those who rose on the other side against the motion are not members of the opposition who sit on the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts because these members are also asking me when the bill will be referred to the committee.

And yet hon. members of the opposition who sit on the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts are certainly most interested to see that this bill receive fair treatment but they are the first to understand that after 47 speakers and 19 hours of debate it is time to refer the bill to the committee. They are eager to see the witnesses appear before them. The people who are most interested, those who are affected by this bill and who wish to appear before the committee, the members of the opposition, the members of the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts ask me if they will have the opportunity to meet those people and talk to them in person. Let us stop making this seem like a debate on democracy, let us be honest and realize that some filibusters must stop and that time has come to put an end to this one.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—Housing—Request for assurance no interference with installation of infrastructure to service development in southwest part of city; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Communications—Alleged deterioration of telephone communications systems—Suggested denial of rate increases pending improvement.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME ALLOCATION MOTION WITH RESPECT TO BILL C-58

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp:

That, in relation to Bill C-58, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, five hours shall be allotted to the further consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and

That, at the expiry of the fifth such hour, Mr. Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding before the House, if required for the purpose of this order, and shall forthwith put, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the bill.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), the chairman of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, suggested that this legislation will affect most directly the witnesses who are to appear before the committee. It is obvious that he has missed the mark completely. It is the people of Canada who will be the most affected by this legislation. It is they who will suffer or benefit from it.

● (1650)

The May 9 committee minutes which the hon. member mentioned record the comments of a government member who coined a phrase when addressing those comments to the minister, "culture paranoia." That is a good term; it is descriptive; it describes perfectly the government's mental health, not only about culture but also about open debate. The government cannot stomach sustained 3½-hour opposition. It cannot stand open debate which examines and displays to the public view the inadequacies and fallacies of this legislation.

The minister made some very specious and fatuous comments about the procedure of the House and his respect for that procedure. What has not been pointed out is that it is his lack of respect for procedure in the House that has brought us to this pass. The minister has mentioned outside the House that the deadline for this legislation is January 1. The effect will then be felt by the Canadian people. That is why the government has to impose closure. If the government is going to save face for the minister and for itself, it will have to see this debate through, and through in a hurry. Otherwise, the minister will have to backtrack—and that is some thing he cannot do; at least, he does not enjoy it.

Two weeks ago the minister was interviewed over CBC radio. He was asked whether there was a lot of opposition to this bill. His answer was something like this, "Oh, no; just a few insignificant members." That quotation may not be quite accurate, but it is the essence of what the minister said.

Mr. Faulkner: It is not even close to accurate. It is a distortion. Let us see the transcript.

Mr. Friesen: I have been wondering ever since if some of those "insignificant members" are on the government backbenches. That is an indication of the minister's respect for parliament and the parliamentary process.

This is an issue we cannot avoid. It is censorship not only in the legislation but now in the process by which we come to this legislation. I am waiting to meet the 22 witnesses who will come before the committee. I trust there will be a lot more who will be added to the list. I am thinking of some who I am sure are not on the list. I hope the government is open enough to accept suggestions and will include witnesses who may not yet be on the list. I hope it will extend the courtesy of open debate and examine this legislation in that light and spirit so that we will have the best possible legislation for the people of Canada.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) to muzzle this House and bring in closure, notice of which he gave yesterday just prior to Your Honour recognizing me to speak on Bill C-58, one or two points have again to be drawn to the attention of this House. Members of the House have a responsibility to present the views of their constituents. This might be regarded as insignificant by some. However, I am surprised at the number of people who have written to me, and I understand other members have had similar responses, to specifically express their viewpoint on Bill C-58. The viewpoint they have expressed overwhelmingly is that they do not favour government interference in the existence of Reader's Digest or Time Canada.

The government says that all this closure motion will do is to take Bill C-58 from second reading in the House of Commons to the committee stage for examination. I must point out that the only way we can get the government to react is to keep on hammering in the House on a specific issue. When a matter comes to committee, the majority that the government enjoys is used in the same way as it is used in the House of Commons: they do not necessarily look at amendments to improve legislation but view them as a mad means by which the opposition is trying to embarrass the government into substantially changing legislation.

The government reminds me of the story of the farmer and his mule. One day he loaned the mule to his neighbour. The neighbour could not get the mule to work. The owner said there was no problem. He picked up a fence post which was lying nearby, hit the mule over the head, and it immediately started to work. When the neighbour asked why he did that, the farmer replied, "First you have to get his attention". That is how we have to handle this government. It seems we must make speeches for days and days before we can get their attention. Thousands of letters from ordinary citizens must be sent to this government before it will respond, if it responds at all. The way it is responding in this case is to muzzle parliament by bringing in closure.

We have questioned the government about the manner in which Reader's Digest and Time must become sufficiently Canadian in order to survive in this country. The government did not give us the details until just a short while ago when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) tabled them in the House. We have had 3½ hours of debate. The real reason this legislation is now before us is that the President of the Privy Council and the government whip cannot guarantee how many government members will abstain because they would like to vote against Bill C-58. I know they have been receiving the same correspondence as members on this side. Therefore, the muzzle is not only on parliament as such; it has been placed on members of the government.

As my colleague pointed out, of those members on the government side who spoke, one-third spoke against the bill. What about the minister? He says it is 11 months since the bill was given first reading and, therefore, placed before the people of Canada. It almost seems that he believes if a bill is on the order paper long enough, even though it is not debated, it should be passed simply for that reason. That is the conclusion that can be drawn from that statement.

● (1700)

The real issue is that almost everything the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has touched has gone bad. Consider the criticism we hear today about the CRTC and Canadian content and the meddling of the CRTC not only on Canadian content on television but on the cable question. The minister has touched on all those areas.

The same thing with the CBC. The minister, again, has made many Canadians take notice of what is happening in the CBC. But I am sure what has really happened is that the minister has come on hands and knees, grovelling to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and saying; Let's bring back Bill C-58 because my personal reputation is at stake." That is why he had to get the use of closure, to show that he is tough, that he has clout within the cabinet when in fact he is just a lightweight. Maybe he is also one of the nobodies the Prime Minister described us as being some time ago. That is why he wants to have closure brought in. That is why he wants to show Canadians that the cabinet must now support him. Because it was my understanding about two weeks ago that it was very likely Bill C-58 would not be brought back to the House, that there was a lot of cabinet opposition to the bill and the cabinet would just as gladly like to see it die and not see the light of day any more.

However, that would have brought into question the reputation of the minister and it would have brought into question the guarantees he has given to various Canadian associations, not least of which are Maclean's magazine and the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association. So he had to come to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and he had to go to the Prime Minister and literally beg for his political life. That is why closure is upon the House.

There are issues which are important, and this is one of them. When Canadians speak, I believe parliament should listen, and the government has not listened. They have muzzled us. It is not as important that they have muzzled us as they have muzzled those people who have responded to the issue of Bill C-58. It is a sad day and what I said yesterday I repeat today: I hope members of the government party, the backbenchers who are opposed to the bill, and especially those who are opposed to the methodology by which it is being rammed through the House, will get up and speak not only in the House of Commons by their vote but also in the inner councils of their party and say to the members in the front row that the method used is wrong and more freedom should be granted in the expression of the Canadian will, which I believe the government at this time is not doing.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise and speak for this motion with respect to Standing Order 75C, although I think the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) in his speech this afternoon has more than justified any reason for the use of that Standing Order. However, I am astonished at the tone of this debate. Having spent six days on this subject, and in particular yesterday, to say that little has been said by the opposition is quite true. The statement of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) has been publicized for at least two weeks, but nothing—or very little—was said about it yesterday. In fact, it was a repetitive session of listening to editorials which we have all received from the people who sent them to the official opposition. Again, I think it has not been clarified here that Standing Order 75C is not closure; it is a motion to allocate time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Campbell: We have already heard one hon. member saying where closure comes from; it came from the Rt. Hon. Sir Bobert Borden sometime in the past.

An hon. Member: A rather obscure Tory.

Miss Campbell: Actually, section 75C has two conditions to its use; one is in section 75A where unanimous consent to allocate time is not arrived at, and section 75B where a majority decision is not arrived at to allocate time. It has been well said here this afternoon by members opposite that there was no going around to find about allocating time. I know this for myself, I checked with each party as to how many speakers there would be, as parliamentary secretary to the minister concerned with Bill C-58, and was told there would be many. There was never any indication as to when debate would be ended.

Limitation on debate is something many members have been asking the government to impose in the past. Certainly it is being used effectively under the British system and no one cries "Closure". In fact, it can only lead to better debate within the time allotted and better use of the time of the House. There are no individual rights involved respecting members being cut off, because most members of the official opposition have spoken or have had an opportunity to speak on the bill. I feel, therefore, it is time the House began to use some of its Standing Orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Order. It being 5.08 p.m., the two hours allotted for consideration of the motion before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. It being 50 minutes from the time arranged by special order to be the expiry of private members' hour, I assume the House will now proceed to private members' hour and will begin debate on the order of business we have been dealing with at eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I put in a good word for that distinguished member of the House, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), whose motion will be before the House in private members' hour dealing with an attempt by the government not to produce certain documents?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: In order that it be granted full time, I suggest it would be in order for the government to consider the continuation of the debate on this motion next Thursday so that the motion can remain at the top of the list.

Mr. Speaker: Is that understood and agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the business of the House for tomorrow. A motion has been put down by this party, tomorrow being our allotted day, under Standing Order 58(9), which means that it will come to a vote. However, there have been discussions among the House leaders and it has been agreed that the vote, instead of being taken tomorrow evening at five o'clock, will be deferred until 9.45 p.m. on Monday. In other words, the debate will continue until five o'clock tomorrow and the vote taken as I have indicated.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner (London East)).]

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the terms of that motion. Is it agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-30, an Act to incorporate Continental Bank of Canada, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

I understand that we are able to dispense with the calling of all the motions on the order paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

COPIES OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SUNSET CREST LTD. AND EMPLOYEES OF AIR CANADA

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of correspondence and agreements between Sunset Crest Ltd., now a subsidiary of the Barbados Shipping and Trading Co., and any employee of Air Canada or its subsidiaries.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must say that it is of utmost significance that this motion should follow the debate which just took place this afternoon, the debate on closure, which I believe illustrates that the government not only wishes to muzzle members of parliament and deny them the right to speak in this House on important issues, but here we have a motion which clearly illustrates the refusal of the government to provide information on a very important issue, an issue which is very timely, and the House is entitled to be provided with this information.

The reply to motion No. 36 was given by the former parliamentary secretary to the former minister of transport. This reply is similar in nature to many replies we receive from time to time on motions of this nature. The former parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac), pointed out the following:

The requested documents are of a proprietary nature and Air Canada believes this information should not be made public for competitive reasons. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

That is recorded at page 4650 of Hansard for April 9, 1975. That is the standard stock answer which is peddled by this government every time we attempt to elicit information on this most favoured, pampered pet of the government, namely, Air Canada.

Air Canada has become a corporate disgrace. The former parliamentary secretary at page 4650 indicated that information was withheld for competitive reasons. This answer is similar in nature to the one provided to me by the former parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) on February 19 at page 3362 of Hansard when I requested copies of all Air Canada documents relating to an Air Canada contract. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River at that time pointed out the following:

> The Air Canada contract contains considerable confidential information relating to the organization, operation and maintenance of the Air Canada lines. Air Canada's competitors are not obliged to provide such information or expose their contractual arrangements to similar scrutiny. To place Air Canada in such a disadvantageous position would not be in the public interest.

The fact of the matter is that upon further investigation this contract was found to be available at the public archives, and when we proceeded with the debate, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley agreed to table the documents, having regard to the fact that I had already procured a major portion of them. However, I think it is of significance to note some extracts of his speech because I think the feeling he has expressed is shared by many hon. members that the parliamentary secretary does exercise good judgment, and I am sure many hon. members will agree with the statement he made in response to my request for this documentation. At page 5606 of Hansard he stated, and I quote:

> I do not mind telling the hon. member that I agree in a general way with the spirit of his remarks. Some of the problem and perhaps misunderstanding with regard to Air Canada and other Crown corporations could be prevented if there were more agreements to the kind of request made by the hon. member. There is no reason, in my mind, why there should be any tremendous security surrounding Crown corporations such as Air Canada.

I could not agree with that statement more. It would be very interesting to know then how the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River could justify making the remarks he did. The sort of approach the government takes is all part of a formality. It seems to be a form of stereotyped ploy to shroud Air Canada in a cloak of secrecy.

There have been many other motions of this nature. I will not take the time of the House to go into them, but they have been of a similar nature asking for pertinent and important information regarding the operations of this Crown corporation, its management, and some of its dealings, which have been somewhat suspicious, but in every case the government has treated hon. members in the same cavalier manner.

The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, in response to my request for this information stated, and I quote: "Air Canada believes this information should not be made public for competitive reasons." I ask, Mr. Speaker, competition with whom? We all know that Air Canada is in a monopoly position in providing Air Transportation services in this country. We all know that there is no price competition per se between Air Canada and CP Air. We know that from the hearings which took place at the CTC here just a few months ago, so what is all this ballyhoo about competition? Even if it was a matter of competition, should the public interest not prevail in a matter which is so important and where there is a shroud of suspicion involving some very questionable dealings? Surely when suspicions and suggestions of wrongdoing, such as have been advanced in this particular transaction, are brought into the fore it is mandatory that the government exercise its responsibility and encourage and, indeed, persuade this Crown corporation to provide the information to which we as members of parliament and the public are rightly entitled. We know that Air Canada's position is such that it refuses to give the information because it considers it to be proprietary and not in the interests of the airline, but what is the position of the government? It obviously must agree with the position that this kind of information should be suppressed.

When the parliamentary secretary rises to respond, I hope he will tell us why the government sees fit to concur with this position. Surely under the provisions of the Financial Administration Act the government is ultimately responsible for the conduct of its Crown corporations? Surely the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is also responsible for accounting to the country through parliament. If the government is a party to this suppression of information, who is it trying to protect? Parliament is justified in demanding to know what is going on inside this corporation. We are entitled to know the details of some of the Mickey Mouse transactions which have been taking place within Air Canada, if we are to make a valid assessment and judgment of the operations of the upper echelons of its management.

This particular transaction raises many questions. The central figure involved in this transaction is a gentleman by the name of Mr. Yves Ménard, who was the vice president of marketing. Mr. Ménard has resigned. We do not know whether that was for personal reasons or whether it was because of a blatant conflict of interest. We do not know whether it was because he overstepped the bounds of his authority. We do not know whether he was the victim of other instances of mismanagement or whether it was simply sloppy administration on the part of the gang at the top. It is interesting to note that the chief executive officer of the airline, Mr. Yves Pratte, said that he regretted the circumstances surrounding Mr. Ménard's departure and indicated that he would be sorely missed.

We are all aware of what transpired thereafter. The Estey inquiry was set up, but to date we have had no report although we suspect it is in the minister's hands. We do not know why we have not heard about it and I hope the parliamentary secretary can offer us some explanation. Surely a matter as important as this should receive immediate attention. It cannot simply be a matter of the translation because the government had no difficulty with the translation of the documents relating to the anti-inflationary program. The Minister of Transport has offered us nothing but excuses in this regard.

We now find Mr. Menard's name linked with the Sky Shops affair. This is another issue which was brought to the surface by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). We are getting the run-around. Who is in control of this corporation? Who is ultimately responsible for carrying out the operations of this major airline? Whoever it is has failed to exercise their mandate in a proper and orderly fashion.

Let us look at the background of the issue, Mr. Speaker. On February 28, 1975. Mr. Yves Menard, Air Canada's vice president of marketing, resigned from his position upon learning that two very astute investigative journalists, Mr. Kendall Windeyer and Mr. Bill Fox of the Montreal Gazette were going to publish details of his purchase of a Barbados villa and his subsequent signing, 11 months later, of a $1 million air line rental contract with the same company that built his villa, Sunset Crest Limited.

In May, 1973, Menard had signed a purchase agreement on the villa with Sunset Crest Limited. The original sales agreement had stipulated that all moneys were to have been paid within 15 days of completion of the villa and approval of the Barbados planning board.

By November 28, 1973, the latter two items had been completed, but as of March 1, 1975, Menard had not made a mortgage payment on his $43,000 villa.

Eleven months after signing the purchase agreement with Sunset Crest, Air Canada negotiated a leasing agreement with the same company at the suggestion of Mr. Menard. Air Canada eventually leased 104 condominium apartments, 25 privately owned villas, and 72 other apartments for its Sun Living package tours to the Barbados. The lease agreements cost Air Canada approximately $1 million per year. The actual Sun Living package tours to the Barbados lost an estimated $100,000 per year.

The former minister of transport, reacting to the story, refused to have a public inquiry into this matter. Instead there was an internal inquiry which came to the conclusion that there was no wrongdoing, a not too surprising verdict considering who was conducting the inquiry.

On July 1, 1975, Air Canada announced that it was severing all relationships with Sunset Crest. According to an Air Canada communique, it was done because "it was not to the economic advantage of the company to continue leasing these properties."

It was not until the Estey commission hearings were held that a few more shreds of information concerning this deal became public. Mr. Vaughan, president of Air Canada, testified that he gave permission to go ahead with the leasing deal prior to approval by Air Canada's board of directors. He also added that he did not know of Menard's villa at the time.

In March, 1973, Menard proposed that Air Canada make a leasing agreement with Sunset Crest. Mr. Vaughan agreed, although Air Canada had never been involved in the leasing of rooms in the Caribbean. The board of directors was not consulted. The agreement was only sent to the board for approval one month after it had already been consummated. In effect the board was presented with a fait accompli.

Furthermore, the agreement was between Sunset Crest and Venturex, a subsidiary of Air Canada. The Venturex board of directors were not consulted until May 10, 1973, when they were asked to transfer the already signed leases to Air Canada's marketing division. It has been suggested, even this afternoon, that the Estey inquiry has explored this particular issue. We do not know that at the present time because the report has not yet been made public.

The Estey commission was set up primarily to investigate the McGregor travel deal, although it did touch upon the Sunset Crest deal. However, it failed to bring out the reasons why Menard felt compelled to resign since, according to him, he was innocent of all allegations. The Air Canada-Sunset Crest correspondence, documents, and agreements were not presented. Instead, Menard was asked many questions of fact and interpretation about the events and reasonings behind this deal. This questioning brought forth such enlightening answers as "I don't know", and "I can't remember". Therefore, considering the circumstances under which Menard resigned, considering the limited nature of the Air Canada and Estey inquiries, and considering Menard's evasive answers to the Estey commission's questions, I would think it mandatory that all documents relating to the Air Canada-Sunset Crest deal be revealed in order to determine the amount of Menard's influence in the consummation of this deal.

This is not the first time that members of parliament have been denied information which I believe they are entitled to receive. It seems there has been a constant effort to inhibit members from obtaining information which is important not only to the future of the air line but is important to this House. This is a Crown corporation and is ultimately responsible to the government and to parliament. Surely in a case where there are so many loopholes, gaps, and questions, it is important that we have all the facts before us. I would earnestly solicit the support of all members for this motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the mood of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) in attempting to get to the bottom of some of the problems he sees in Air Canada. I think many of these requests should be granted as time goes on. There is always a great danger of secrecy overcoming governments when there is really very little to be secret about.

At this point, however, we do have a board of inquiry which met under Mr. Justice Estey, and I think it would be as well to wait until the report of that board is produced.

In the three years that I have been in this House, and in most of the discussions in committee concerning transport, I have noticed that the Conservative opposition has a strong tendency to speak out against Air Canada and CNR and to be protective with respect to their main competitors, CPR and CP Air.

I should like, in the few minutes I have, to make some points on behalf of Air Canada, to defend Air Canada, because I know it as one of the finest air lines in the world. Canadians have every right to be proud of Air Canada, and when the Estey commission reports I think we shall see that all is well with Air Canada.

● (1800)

Forty years ago the air line began life as Trans-Canada Air Lines, the air carrier which was to move freight, people, and mail in this country. It is most difficult to establish a transport system in this country as distances are vast and populations thinly spread out. Air Canada has provided air service to many parts of the country. It serves not merely Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver; it serves all kinds of smaller communities. CP Air serves Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec city, Halifax, and one or two other large centres. Air Canada serves these centres as well. It also serves smaller centres like Saskatoon, Thunder Bay, Timmins, Sudbury, Fredericton, St. John's and other similar communities which, but for Air Canada, would not enjoy national air service. My own community would not enjoy national air service if it were not served by Air Canada. These are facts we must recognize.

Let us consider Air Canada's economic structure. The average stage of Air Canada flights is about 600 miles.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret interrupting the hon. member. I have listened carefully. I think we ought to confine debate to a fairly narrow subject. With the greatest of respect to the hon. member, who is my friend, I suggest that he should confine his remarks to the motion before the House. Surely we ought to be considering the government's refusal to provide information relating to an agreement between Air Canada and Sunset Crest Ltd. That has nothing to do with the Air Canada rate structure, or service to Fort William, Regina, or any other place. I am sure the government has a legitimate reason for not complying with my request. If it has, I want to hear it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member's point is well taken, and I hope the hon. member who has the floor will pay closer heed to the motion now before the House.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, from my reading of the motion it implies some wrongdoing on the part of Air Canada. I am trying to show that Air Canada, as a company, is basically above such kinds of wrongdoing. For that reason I think it is relevant to paint a true picture of Air Canada. We must consider routes and distances, because they have a strong bearing on the air line's cost and mode of operation. Surely we cannot debate this matter properly if we are to confine our remarks simply to the motion for the production of papers.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Surely that is the essence of this matter. We are considering a narrow point. The question is: will the government produce the documents requested, or not? The motion has nothing to do with the length of routes or anything else. I think hon. members of the House would appreciate the hon. member's addressing himself to the motion before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Although I do not necessarily agree with what the hon. member just said, as I think the hon. member himself might at times object if the Chair were to give a ruling to limit debate in the way he suggests, I think we must allow hon. members fair play in developing the subject matter of the motion. I will listen to the hon. member for a few minutes and note the drift of his remarks.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to show why Air Canada functions in its present way and why it is not as profitable as CP Air. I think this is very much the question. This has been the debate in committee.

I am talking about distances in this country, about an air line that has an average flight of 600 miles, the cost of taking off and landing and so on under these circumstances. Compare that to CP where we are talking about average flights of 1,100 miles. I do not see members opposite questioning whether or not the rates of CP are correct. That is the reason why I have raised this question. It has been said that Air Canada is not competitive and is not a good air line. This is at the back of the question raised in this motion.

Let us look at Air Canada service for a moment. This too is part of the question that has been raised. One measure of service is how often an airline is on time. For years Air Canada was tops in this field, one of the top ten in North America. It slipped a bit in the early seventies when it went to flexible timetabling. It has now regained its position and is in the top three in this area.

I enjoy my Air Canada flights. The meals are excellent. I defy anyone to show me that any other airline feeds its passengers better than Air Canada. With regard to baggage, many people say that every time you take a flight you lose a piece of baggage. In the past three years I have taken off and landed about 400 times. I have only lost baggage three times, and this I got back within a day or two. In my opinion in this area Air Canada is very good.

In terms of employee relationship with the public, and I am not talking about the relationship with management because there are some bad relations there, I believe that Air Canada employees are as fine as can be found anywhere. I have always been treated well and I believe that is the general situation.

At the present time, it appears as though the future for all air lines is rather grim. Air Canada will and is having difficulties. It showed a profit in ten of the past 12 years. Last year it did not, nor did many air lines in North America.

There are some serious problems that air lines will have to face. Like other air lines Air Canada will have to cut schedules. In fact it has already done some cutting. It is important that the short-haul hops be cut because these involve very high cost. It takes a lot of energy to get a plane to 20,000, 25,000 or 30,000 feet and, once there, the air is rare.

An hon. Member: It's rare in here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: The cost per mile is much less on long routes. On a mileage basis it is much less costly to move passengers from Toronto to Vancouver than from Toronto to Montreal. What this amounts to is a need to develop alternative means of transportation, and if this is done there may be no need for a second airport in the neighbourhood of Toronto. Indeed, I maintain we do not need one.

● (1810)

The answer is to move traffic by rail, to develop an alternate type of transportation for short haul traffic. I would prefer to spend $1.5 billion of $2 billion, the amount it would cost in the long run to build another airport near Toronto, on short haul rail services in the corridor between Toronto and Quebec City.

These are some of the problems the air line will face. I also believe, that when the Estey report is brought in it will show that Air Canada is a very sound operation, that it is one of the world's best air lines. We shall await that report.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you for or against the motion?

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to support the very logical request of my hon. friend from Vegreville for documents which, as usual, the government has refused to produce. The government invariably goes into a defensive crouch when asked to produce anything which is relevant, or controversial, or in the nature of an accounting to the country.

We have a new Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I hoped he would be a little more liberal than his predecessor in terms of providing information. This goes to the very credibility of the government and of Air Canada. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) opened up many interesting areas in the course of his remarks and I hope I will be allowed a similar latitude in discussing the motion.

Air Canada has in the past been the victim of the government's transport policy, or rather lack of it. This is true with regard to the production of documents and otherwise. Only a few days ago the new minister was quoted as saying in the course of a newspaper interview that no one really expected the Liberals to make good immediately their proposals to improve rapid transit and commuter service in major urban areas. He went on to say that many of the election promises would only be carried out over 15 years or more. So once more we are reminded how much credence one can attach to policy promises made by the government particularly during a campaign. This is also very true when it comes to the production of documents.

Air Canada, of course, suffers along with the rest of the minister's portfolio from the secrecy syndrome. One might well ask whether Air Canada is really a unique, peculiar corporation, a proprietary Crown corporation as opposed to a departmental one, or agency one, as set out in the Financial Administration Act, which attempts to describe the various types of Crown corporations? Or is it a mutant in its present form, because of the way in which it has been allowed to develop under a management which cannot control it, to a point at which it may defy classification at all?

The lack of frankness in connection with Air Canada's operations as exhibited by the government's refusal to comply with my colleague's request is obviously a cover-up as is its reluctance to bring forth the Estey report—I will mention that in a few minutes.

Air Canada's performance, or lack of it, can be attributed not only to its management but to the vagaries of politics. Again, because of the government's lack of frankness, as well illustrated again today, I am sure, in denying my colleague's motion, we must speculate on the reasons for certain decisions. For example, the decision to purchase the Lockheed L-1011 jet instead of the rival Douglas DC-10 is said to have been heavily influenced by political pressure. It seems that Air Canada took options on the DC-10 and the L-1011 in the late sixties when both aircraft were in the pre-production stage and quoted substantially the same characteristics and price.

[Mr. McRae.]

In 1971, when Lockheed was on the brink of bankruptcy because of the L-1011, Air Canada announced it would reconsider the matter because aside from the uncertainty about the future of the L-1011 the DC-10 was proving itself a better aircraft in Air Canada's analysis. It had better range, was compatible with Air Canada's largely Douglas fleet, and had become cheaper. We have never been told why the priorities developed as they did.

The air lines executive committee pondered the selection for months while Lockheed worried and other air lines watched, but finally the decision was made to stick with the L-1011. Again we have never been told why, in the same way as we have been told today why in the government's eyes these documents are so vital that they cannot be produced in accordance with the hon. member's request.

As stated in the Ottawa Citizen May 23, 1975, issue:

> It is widely assumed in the industry that the influence of another department (External Affairs) was one of the main reasons for the decision.

So that is likely why they took the L-1011 instead of the DC-10.

As the hon. member for Fort William said, Air Canada does have problems that are not of its own making, but it has a lot of problems that are strictly attributable to its own management.

The more types of aircraft an air line owns, the larger the spare parts inventory it must keep, and the greater the number of machinists it must hire to maintain the different engines. Until 1969 Air Canada had an almost entirely Douglas fleet with many parts interchangeable from aircraft to aircraft. It now flies Douglas, Boeing, and Lockheed equipment, and certainly this has contributed to rising costs to which the hon. member has referred. We can only wonder how and why this policy was followed.

As I said earlier, we have a new Minister of Transport. Has he shown any initiatives, any "new broom" tendencies? Not as far as we can see so far. He has not even brought in the Estey report because he claims it is not yet translated. One wonders why this was not done when it was written or a few days thereafter, by dividing it among several translators, as any good newspaper would have done.

Our Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications has not been made operative since parliament resumed after the recess. We have not had a look at Air Canada in committee since November, 1973, and at that time we were considering the 1972 annual report in the context of the CN financing bill. There is still no word from the Chairman of Air Canada concerning his oft-repeated statement that if Air Canada did not perform he would go. The only word I have heard, and my sources are pretty good, is that he has stated he will not resign in any case, and if they want to get rid of him they will have to carry him out kicking and screaming.

If the Minister of Transport wants co-operation from this side of the House he ought to consider bringing the Estey report forward quickly and acting on it. We must make changes to restructure Air Canada, refer its annual report to our standing committee and tell Mr. Pratte that, kicking or screaming or whatever, he has had his opportunity to run Air Canada and now it is time for someone else.

It must be as obvious to the Minister of Transport as it is to the country, and in particular the knowledgeable people in the air line industry, that by practically every standard or test by which an executive is measured, the chairman and chief executive officer of Air Canada has struck out, and if the chairman remains it will be even more obvious than it is now that he is remaining only because of his relationship as a sycophant of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau); he is willing to be exactly that in return for whatever personal prestige he imagines there may be in his present position as head of Air Canada while it heads for a second deficit.

The government's attitude through failing to comply with information requests underscores the fact that this air line has become a convenient refuge for would-be entrepreneurs who can attempt to wheel and deal in wine, or sugar, or what have you, while still having the security of our national air line to fall back on for their pay cheques.

Let us consider Air Canada's experience with Mr. Alfredo Laforet of Sunset Crest Villa in Barbados, which is right on target, you will no doubt be glad to hear, Mr. Speaker, with the topic with which the motion of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) deals. Mr. Laforet is a man about whom a good book could be written. He really took Yves Menard and Air Canada to the cleaners in a most direct and casual manner, leaving the Barbados shipping and trading company with a large debt, doing the same with Air Canada and its subsidiary, but doing very well for himself. The details will be most interesting to the people of the country if Air Canada is honest enough to bring them forward for analysis.

Let us consider the firm of Caribbean Sales and Leasing Incorporated which, by the way, has the same postal address as the solicitor for Sunset Crest Limited but has no permanent staff or offices.—Rather strange! This company, which attempted to engineer a $100 million sugar deal at a time when our country was experiencing real shortages of this vital commodity, has as its principals several Air Canada executives, including Mr. Ray Lindsay.

The traces of Air Canada's ineptitude in extracurricular activities manifest themselves in particular ways. For example, they linger on. If one were to call Air Canada asking to be booked into Southern Palms Hotel outside Bridgetown, their computer will indicate that this is a substandard hotel, which is very ironic since Air Canada once tried to buy it. The owner, you see, is the recipient of this type of classification for this hotel because of a grudge carried over from dealing with Air Canada and Yves Menard. The computer had been adjusted accordingly.

I hoped that the Minister of Transport when he assumed the portfolio would be a reformer, a man who would have the courage to clean house and make decisions. If he does this then I can certainly pledge my support in this House and in committee for his efforts to rationalize our transportation policies and, in the case of Air Canada, clean out the Augean stables which exist in its structure. As a beginning, Mr. Speaker, let us have the documents requested by the hon. member for Vegreville. Let us have some action to improve Air Canada immediately before it suffers irreparable harm under present policies and under the present management.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak at this time, first to reply to the motion requesting copies of correspondence and agreements between Sunset Crest Ltd., now a subsidiary of Barbados Shipping and Trading Company, and any employee of Air Canada or its subsidiaries; and secondly, to reply to some of the criticism that has been directed to Air Canada.

On April 7, 1975, the minister replied to the following questions:

1. What are the details of the various contracts entered into by Air Canada with Sunset Crest Ltd. of Barbados?

2. Who approved the contracts and what is the length of each?

The minister said that the management of Air Canada had advised him as follows:

The information requested is of a proprietary nature and Air Canada believes it should not be made public for competitive reasons.

The advice of Air Canada's management in respect of the notice of motion for the production of papers requiring copies of correspondence and agreements between Sunset Crest Ltd. and any employee of Air Canada or its subsidiaries is that in the interest of staff relations and for competitive reasons such information should not be made public.

I believe there is an inherent danger every time a government exempts certain papers or documents from production. The danger is that there will be an increase in public skepticism of government, a skepticism which has been growing in the past few years in most western democracies. When a document is exempt from production, regardless of the validity of reasons given for its exemption, the government leaves itself open to charges that it is trying to hide something which may be politically embarrassing or damaging.

In most cases the only defence against these kinds of charges is the production of the papers and, conversely, the only means to substantiate the charges is the actual publication of the documents in question. As a result, without being able to see the information which has been requested, we are left in a sort of daisy-plucking situation in regard to the government's motives; are they based on the expected criteria for the exemption of the production of papers or documents required for the effective functioning of government, or are they using the criteria merely to avoid political embarrassment?

I believe this kind of situation in the long run undermines the trust on which our democratic and parliamentary system is based. There are many arguments for greater accessibility to information, not the least being simply that both members of parliament and the public require as much information as possible if they are to make a meaningful contribution to the decision-making process.

Still, I feel the most complete argument is that publication of the papers requested eliminates that situation which I have described, where the motives of the government are questioned, and the harmful consequences that brings with it.

This government, and indeed any government, when deciding whether a particular document should be made public must carefully weigh not only the effects publication of the document will have on the effective functioning of government, but also the effect that not publishing the document will have on the public's trust of that government. Nevertheless, in the particular case we have before us there is an important consideration to be borne in mind, a consideration which I feel removes any suspicion that the government may be withholding information for political reasons.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that the Estey report was received by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) during the latter part of last month. The contents of the report are being studied by him and it will be some days yet before the minister will be able to make public comment on it.

The Hon. Mr. Justice Estey, a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario and a member of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, was appointed commissioner under the Inquiries Act to inquire into matters pertaining to financial controls, accounting procedures, and other matters related to the fiscal management and control of Air Canada. Public hearings were conducted from April 30, 1975.

Hon. members will no doubt agree that the government took effective action in order to bring to light the true facts. A number of witnesses testified before the commissioner, and these included top executives of Air Canada. Full opportunity was given to private citizens and to Air Canada's management and other employees to state their case, and there was also opportunity for cross-examination.

The matter which the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) brings before the House is among those matters which have been the cause of the Air Canada inquiry, and no doubt the commission of inquiry must have addressed itself to the details of the transactions between Sunset Crest Ltd. and Air Canada.

The minister needs time to digest the contents of the Estey report. Printing of copies of the report will take a few more days. I am sure hon. members would wish the minister to give an explanation of whatever comment and recommendations Judge Estey might have made. I am sure that any debate on the Sunset Crest Ltd. Air Canada transactions would call for explanations of other matters in relation to financial controls in Air Canada. Frankly I do not think that we are ready to debate these issues and I feel that our time will be more usefully spent in debating this and other issues arising from the Air Canada inquiry when the Minister of Transport informs this House of his impressions of Judge Estey's report.

I would like to take the opportunity which this debate affords me to speak briefly on a point which has been of some concern to me. In general terms it is the effect which sometimes specific, well meaning criticism of a department, agency, or Crown corporation has on the vast majority of competent, hard working, and loyal public servants.

While there can be no questioning of a member of parliament's right, indeed his duty, to examine closely the performance of national institutions such as Air Canada, care must be taken to avoid the tendency of looking only at the weakness and shortcoming of such an institution.

Air Canada is a large company employing over 20,000 persons in many categories of work. There are hundreds of managers in various levels of the hierarchy, and thousands of employees with valuable skills in many professions. Hon. members are, of course, aware that the employees of Air Canada are men and women who have worked hard over the years to build an air line that has earned its place as an important contributor to national unity and social prosperity, and one that "earns it keep" in that it has not been necessary for over two decades for public money to subsidize Air Canada. Even with biting inflation and a general depression in most parts of the world, Air Canada's performance has been good.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time appointed for the consideration of private members' hour having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

REMOVAL OF PROVISION ALLOWING DEDUCTION OF EXPENSES FOR ADVERTISING IN NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-58, to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, yesterday at this point in my remarks I was trying to indicate that in the constituency I represent there is a choice of listening to radio or watching television, and a choice between a relatively uncontrolled source in the United States versus virtually a totally controlled source in Canada. When that choice has been offered, the predominant number of people in my constituency choose to watch the material which comes from the United States. I am therefore very hesitant to give favourable consideration to any structure which further extends control over any portion of the media which may in any way affect the citizenship of the people of Canada. Let me give a specific example of why I say this.

There has been a multitude of programs produced by the CBC and those who work for it or supply it. There have been many new series of programs started, and as one program started I chose to watch one of the presentations.

It was a play. I enjoyed it. It was Canadian until it came to, shall I say, the epilogue, although it was not referred to as an epilogue. It was a story about the committing of a crime. The criminal had been apprehended and proven guilty.

The closing of that story came out in such a way that, after the trial was completed, society was to be ashamed of itself because a criminal had been improperly treated by society, and it was because of society that he had committed this crime. He was virtually excused of being guilty of anything, but society was guilty.

Second, these closing remarks indicated that the police work had been cumbersome, slow, and incompetent, and that young people, old people, or people of any age in Canada should really not have respect for that police force, or at least that section of it which presumably participated in the solution of the crime.

The third conclusion one would have to draw was that the crime had been committed against a party who had been a successful individual in life, and that he was the guiltiest of all because he had been successful and had accumulated some of this world's goods, perhaps a little more than the average. The victim of the crime was guilty of success. The police were downgraded in the eyes of the public who might have been viewing, and the criminal should be excused because of that attitude of society. This is not the kind of story which is going to create a strong and law abiding Canada.

If the philosophy of some part of that producing structure, CBC, is going to be imposed in virtually every story, every play, produced by that organization, and if the total structure of our society is to be continuously under attack by people who do not approve of our present society, then I submit that control has been an extremely bad thing in the television field.

I should like to see respect for success, respect for the police, and no excuse for the criminal. That is the type of philosophy that I think we have to disseminate if we are to develop a strong, law-abiding, co-operating society in this nation. Is this what we will get if we continue to control the pen as it moves across Canada? I submit it may well be.

When you exercise control you create a structure which must use what is available to fill its books or its time slot. When you create a captive structure you become subject to those who philosophize mostly against the things for which this House stands. That has been demonstrated for many years in the structures already controlling and influencing our society.

I think it should be known, and I do not think anyone has said it in a definitive way, that in the income tax sense or corporate tax sense no special concession has been extended to Time and Reader's Digest in Canada. They pay exactly the same tax on their earnings as any other corporation in any field which functions in any form of business anywhere in this country. These two companies have been extended a privilege in the field of publication, and have acceded to the request for a percentage of Canadian content. By the guidelines set down earlier they have earned the right to publish in Canada under identically the same tax structure as any corporation operating anywhere in this nation.

I submit that the government and the minister responsible have tried to sell this proposition to Canadians on the basis that there is a special tax concession granted to Reader's Digest and Time. That is a myth, Madam Speaker. It is untrue. They pay the same rate of tax as any other corporation in Canada. Does the government deny that? They have been granted an opportunity to publish in Canada under terms not granted to publications from other foreign countries, but have not been granted a special tax concession, as the public seems to think. No matter what the company may be, they pay the same tax, so let us be honest about it from here on. Let us say that these two firms have met certain Canadian standards, which gives them permission to publish in Canada. Forget about the special tax structure.

We have heard the requirements, so-called, of the media and the magazine industry discussed in this House and outside. It seems that there are problems in respect of Canadian copyright in regard to the international scene. Canadian authors apparently do not get the protection which Canada extends to foreign authors. This not only affects their livelihood but is a disincentive for those who write.

Authorship in Canada is certainly not as attractive as in other nations. Surely the government could negotiate this firmly with other nations so that we get for our authors the same privilege we grant those from other countries. If we cannot arrange this perhaps we should cancel the copyright privileges we have extended to international authors. Our authors should not be expected to publish without pay. This is important to writers who publish at home or abroad, and surely it is important to the publishing companies. The government should be encouraging our writers to have their first publication in Canada rather than have their first publication abroad where the syndicated copyright laws would work for them.

I am concerned about the type of public affairs broadcasts on radio and television where politicians, dignitaries, church people, all sorts of people are interrogated by representatives of the media. In the United States such programs give the public an opportunity to hear the opinions of people who are outstanding on a particular subject. Usually, not always, but usually it is a straight interrogation, a fact finding or opinion finding program. The comparable programs in Canada could practically all be titled "Under Attack" because they are usually an interrogatory inquisition of an individual whose opinions do not coincide with those of the interviewer.

Is every publisher in Canada going to continue on the road he has taken in the past two years and publish his own philosophies? Is he going to screen his writers so that they will reflect his philosophies? I submit, Madam Speaker, that if a newspaper or periodical is to be acceptable to the reading public it should take note of what is happening along our border with the United States. As it is they do not care what the public thinks because the public purse will pay, regardless.

Those who have relied upon the public purse in the radio and television structure along the border are now complaining that the system south of the border is going to eliminate them. Basically that is because they do not produce what the people of Canada want to watch or listen to, and there is a lesson in that for the publishers of periodicals. I think they must look inward and find out why 30 or 40 years ago Canadians read Maclean's magazine from cover to cover but now it lies on the table gathering dust while Reader's Digest becomes dog-eared. Is that because of the advertising or because of the privilege extended to Reader's Digest? Madam Speaker, I think it is because they found out what people want to read and that is what they print.

If we exercise control as it is proposed here, the publisher who wants to publish his own philosophy will have no competition. Over the years I have heard criticisms levelled at newspaper and periodical owners. Some people say that such owners only publish their opinions. On the other hand it can be said that writers who do not agree with the owner's viewpoint refuse to write for him. But a publisher is somewhat different. He cannot always employ only those who reflect his philosophy and publish material reflecting his philosophy. On the other hand, if he publishes his own opinion, his own philosophy, and Canadians do not buy it, he runs crying to the government and says, "For goodness sake, ban other publications; make it impossible for them to compete with me, so that I can publish my own philosophies." In a sense, Madam Speaker, that is what this bill is about.

Not long ago a little magazine was started not far from my home town. It attacked everything, every church, politician, political party and philosophy held dear and true by my constituents. After the magazine folded the publisher went to the Canada Council with tears in his eyes and said, "We had to fold; people would not buy our magazine." People buy only those things to which they are attracted, not those things to which they are not attracted. This holds equally true of a suit of clothes and of a periodical. No matter what hon. members opposite think, we cannot legislate what Canadians shall read. But that is precisely what we are trying to do.

Let us consider how certain regulatory structures or bodies have affected radio and television service in the little constituency of Carleton-Charlotte. Sometimes when driving about in my constituency I will turn on the radio and, sometimes but not always, I can listen to the CBC. Yet as I drive a few miles down the road from my home I no longer receive it and will not again pick up the signal in my constituency. For example, when I drive on the road connecting St. Stephen, St. George and St. Andrews, I drive out of the range of the CBC radio transmitter. Anywhere in that part of my constituency people cannot receive CBC radio. That shows the sort of service we get.

One can listen to other radio programs. For example, I like to listen to news, information, and public affairs programs, but they are not available to me from the CBC. And what happens if I want to listen to sports events? If I want to listen to how the Maple Leafs, the Expos' or Canadiens are playing, I can tune in to Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago and Detroit. Usually I can receive one or more of these stations. I can get New York and Boston any evening, but I cannot get Montreal, Toronto or Saint John if I drive in a particular part of my constituency. That will show you the kind of service a regulatory body has made possible in my constituency. It is not a service, for there is no service.

Let us consider television. The first television station installed in New Brunswick was located in Saint John and served southern New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Program material proliferated and, in my area, on our screens we could get a little picture and a little snow. Many similar areas have had comparable experiences. Then they built a television station at Presque Isle the signal of which, unfortunately, I do not receive as well as I would wish. It is much better than the signal from Saint John. Later a satellite station serving Saint John was installed, which I receive very well.

As I watch these two channels within my range I see New Brunswick firms advertising in the state of Maine market, and Maine firms advertising over the New Brunswick media. Both sets of advertisers seem to satisfy their respective communities fairly well. The bulk of the advertising material comes from the Maine source. That prompts the serious question I am about to raise. If Canadian firms operating near the border cannot get coverage from CBC radio, are they to be denied the privilege of advertising on a station which is located across the border in the state of Maine? If the rates on Canadian broadcasting stations are beyond the means of small businesses, are those small businesses to be denied the right to cheaper advertising from a source near the border?

I suppose the minister will say that private enterprise will provide the service. Private enterprise tried. It wanted to install a television station to serve the town of Woodstock, but the regulatory body refused the licence. I do not know with whom the television station was to compete; at any rate the regulatory body refused to grant a licence to the television station which wanted to serve the town of Woodstock and the nearby population.

Considering what regulatory structures and bodies have done with respect to the air waves I cannot support this further regulatory encroachment into the area of the printed word. I do not think the regulatory bodies serve us well. For example, consider cablevision.

At present there is an application before this country's regulatory body for the installation of cable service, the service to extend from Grand Falls in the constituency of Madawaska-Victoria to a portion of the constituency of York-Sunbury. But the regulatory body so far has said no. I ask, why? It says that there is no second station in the area. There is not a second station, I know. The regulatory body therefore says, "You cannot have cablevision." That will show you what our regulatory bodies are doing. I assure you, Madam Speaker, if there had been demand for a second station in the area, private enterprise would have provided it. As it is, there is room for cablevision service.

Let us look at the other side of the coin and consider what happens in Maine. In that state I know of at least one community which is served by cablevision. There is no regulation there. That cablevision structure will pull in all the Canadian stations within range; it will bring in a French language station to the state of Maine, and in southern Maine it is not needed. But our regulatory body will not permit the installation of cablevision facilities in the area I mentioned. There is no service.

I bring out these fact to show what happens when you introduce certain types of regulations. In the present instance the government seeks to interfere further in what people want to read. How can you legislate people into doing what they ought to do? That is what this law seeks to do. In a sense, is that not what our criminal law is all about? Yet you cannot legislate crime out of the window. Similarly you cannot legislate what people shall read.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. McCain: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's lack of patience is only equalled by the lack of favourable response this legislation will receive.

We cannot legislate what people shall read. We cannot tell them to read what they do not want to read. We cannot legislate people into reading a particular Canadian magazine if it does not print material they want to read. People will not read a Canadian magazine if it does not present diversity of opinion. I do not mind listening to or reading an opinion with I do not agree, but I want the opportunity to read material with which I do agree. I submit that this new law will affect what people can read. As I say, legislation cannot force people to read something they do not want to read. Therefore we are chasing ghosts in the name of nationalism, and we cannot catch them.

We shall only encourage Canadians to read Canadian magazines if our magazines encourage writers to produce articles which reflect all shades of opinion. Publications must give equal space, or equal opportunity, for the expression of diverse opinions. That is not to be the case under this legislation. I regret very much that Maclean's is no longer the sort of magazine which my family used to read years ago.

I sincerely hope the Government of Canada will change its position with respect to this bill. It should give consideration to the story opportunities that are exploited by other areas of the world whose television programs we watch and whose magazines we read. We should undertake to use our history, tradition, and morality as the source of those stories. We should stop in a regulated CBC structure, trying to philosophize continuously against those things for which members of this House stand. We should determine what it is that Canadians want to watch. Those who are going to publish should try to determine what Canadians want to read. That is what they are going to watch, listen to on radio, and read when the opportunity presents itself.

Legislation may be introduced into this House on a daily basis, but nothing will change the desire of people to read, watch and listen to those things that appeal to them. It may be opera, football, baseball or drama. In turn they will take their choice of what is offered. However, those examples have to be presented to Canada.

I could not conduct an orchestra. I would not know one note from the other. However, I can enjoy sports properly and intelligently presented. I can enjoy some music and I can enjoy drama. However, you cannot legislate to make me watch opera because I do not have the background and knowledge to appreciate it. I am sorry that I do not because basically I enjoy music. Nor can you legislate the opera lover to want to watch baseball, and I propose you should not. What the government is trying to do here is as ridiculous as trying to legislate that everybody watch opera. In no way can it succeed.

I submit that Canadian publications may suffer more than they benefit by regulating what people want to read. People will not be able to afford to buy a foreign publication and a Canadian publication. It might just be that on the reading table, particularly in the border areas of this nation, we may find Time and Reader's Digest that were wholly published in the United States. The Canadian publications may no longer be there. That is the risk we run when we try to dabble in affairs of which we know very little and over which legislation has virtually no control.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Madam Speaker, I thought for a moment that the hon. member was never going to give us a rest from the dissertation of dismal forecasts that he prepared for us this evening. I am a Canadian who, ten years ago, was dismayed when Time and Reader's Digest were made exceptions to the income tax amendments that were passed at that time. In my view Bill C-58 is ten years overdue.

In order to encourage the Canadian magazine industry, the 1965 amendments were essentially that Canadian advertisers who advertised in foreign magazines could no longer deduct those costs as a business expense, and they excepted the two major magazines, Time and Reader's Digest. That certainly made me very unhappy. I know that it made a great many Canadians very unhappy.

Yesterday I listened to Conservative after Conservative get up and talk foolishly about censorship, legislating Time and Reader's Digest out of existence and legislating what people can read, particularly the amount of foreign news carried in Canadian newspapers. I congratulate the House leader for having taken the courageous step under Standing Order 75C to end this silly discussion and send the bill to committee.

Obviously Bill C-58 has nothing whatever to do with censorship. We are not legislating Time and Reader's Digest out of existence. Canadians are civilized people. They want to know what goes on in the world. That is why Canadian newpapers carry foreign news. That seems to be a perfectly normal activity of a Canadian newpaper. I do not think that has been made very clear to the Canadian people by the opposition.

I know that latitude must be and is allowed in the House of Commons, but does it really mean that we must have expensive day after expensive day of the Commons of Canada tied up with repetitious windbags making speeches ten times and taking the entire subject completely out of context? If ever this place has the misfortune to be televised we can expect the Canadian public to come charging through the door on my right and to hand us all out of here to the telephone poles.

I remind the Conservative members that their instructions from the Time and Reader's Digest lobby to attempt to filibuster in favour of those magazines not only costs valuable House time but also the $250,000 a day in taxpayers' money that it costs to keep this House open. Therefore I again congratulate the House leader on limiting the debate. Possibly he should do that more often.

According to the cover on Reader's Digest magazine, it is published in 30 countries and in 13 languages. It says on the inside that it is published by the Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Limited. According to their flyleaf, this is considered an international edition. It says that the English edition is the United States, British, Australian, South African, New Zealand, India and Asian edition. This is the so-called Canadian magazine that should in fact be exempted from the income tax laws and made a special case, this magazine that is published in 30 countries and 13 languages.

I have information that there are eight editions to Time magazine published by Time Incorporated in various parts of the world. I do not think that many people consider that Time or Reader's Digest are Canadian magazines. That would really be stretching a point. Obviously they are not and never were Canadian magazines. There has never been an attempt to pretend that they were Canadian magazines.

In 1965, in the spirit of encouraging Canadian culture, the government of the day decided to act to encourage the Canadian magazine industry. We are all aware, ten years later, of the paradox of the situation when it undertook to encourage the industry and then excluded the two most flagrant foreign magazines operating in Canada, taking I don't know what percentage of Canadian advertising revenue, though I know it was a very high one. I think it is offensive to most Canadians that of all the foreign magazines selling in Canada from Newsweek to the Model Railroader, only Time and Reader's Digest enjoy a tax advantage. Most Canadians ask why they should be excluded from the application of the law.

What has censorship got to do with those two magazines operating in Canada on an equal basis with all other publications? What makes Time different from Newsweek? Why should Newsweek have to compete in Canada and be unable to offer a tax advantage to potential advertisers while Time is able to offer a tax advantage to Canadians who advertise in it? Why should Canadian institutions, banks and so on, which advertise in the Economist of London be unable to get a tax break, though if they advertised in Time they would?

The idea that anyone is excluding Time and Reader's Digest from Canada is not true. Those publications will be selling in Canada just as long as there is a profit to be made in Canada by the parent publishing companies. They are international publishing institutions and they will be in business here just as long as they can make a profit here. This should be made clear to people who have been persuaded by fuzzy arguments that they will not be able to read Reader's Digest or Time magazine. Why should Reader's Digest be given a special tax advantage over, say, Good Housekeeping which is a very popular magazine in Canada? What makes those two publications so special?

What makes it particularly offensive to Canadians was the personal intervention of Henry Luce through the U.S. State Department—this is the understanding which was made public—when he threatened Canadian sovereignty back in 1965, a year in which Canada was presumably in a weak position with regard to some kind of trade agreement. That kind of activity and lobbying on the part of the U.S. State Department, of the very fibre of the United States government—obviously Henry Luce at that time was a very powerful man—would make any Canadian angry when he thinks about it.

The tax advantages enjoyed by foreign periodicals, the hope for the Canadian magazine industry, all of this, when all is said and done, are part and parcel of Canada's cultural policy. This is an interesting area and topic. I think this has been expressed by members opposite in an odd sort of way, because this is a very subjective area. Culture is a very subjective subject. As William James once said, it lives by sympathy and admiration, not by dislikes and disdain. I think that is an important point. It is easy to be disdainful of culture because it is a subjective thing.

Culture has a profound value, and one that until only recently Canadians sold cheap. For one thing, our cultural geography made it pretty rough, living as we do, between the two English-speaking giants, Britain and the United States. What has often occurred to me is the unusual way in which cultural values in Canada have alternated between U.S. provincial and English provincial. We did not develop our own awareness until the sixties when an attempt was made to assist Canadian culture, of which this bill is part and parcel.

Obviously, culture is of fundamental importance to Canada. Without culture we are not a country. If we do not have it we do not exist. If we do not develop our own artists, our own writers, our own cultural vehicles—and in order to do that we must have vehicles to do the job such as magazines—it really means there is nothing here in Canada worth expressing. And I believe we do have opinions, that we do have distinct values worth expressing as Canadians.

Surely in the House of Commons of Canada I should not have to emphasize our unique Canadian experience—two founding peoples pioneering a country on the very edge of the habitable world in spite of snow and ice and everything possible against us, and succeeding in establishing Canada. Canada is a remarkable country because it should not ever have existed. You just have to look at a map of Canada to see the towns which run along the coast or around the shores of a couple of lakes or along a river. Here is a country defying history—two founding peoples, my goodness, read Francis Parkman and realize how the early French settlers lived on moss in order to survive the Canadian winter; it is not surprising they did not have time for culture; they were just trying to stay alive.

I am not a cultural nationalist. I do not believe in cultural nationalism because it is introverted and I am too much of an internationalist for that kind of approach. But I believe that we in Canada have distinct values to offer the international community, and in order to do that we must have vehicles to do the job. Canadian magazines, in spite of all the arguments against them, in spite of the lousy job they have done so far, are important vehicles which the country has to develop.

An hon. Member: But not through legislation.

Mr. Stollery: Yes. If we have to legislate, if we have to pass laws to encourage the industry, that is definitely the way we should go about it. I differ from the hon. member who says "not through legislation". The legislation the CRTC brought in on Canadian content vis-à-vis American programs has been very successful. We live in a country that is squashed up against the United States; we have all the pressures historically from the United Kingdom which I mentioned earlier, so I certainly believe there are times when we must legislate to assist the industry.

I think something that has been a little bit missed in all this argument—and there is reason for it because the magazine industry has been so poor—is that somehow it looks as though we are sitting here trying to sell Maclean's magazine. It is a pretty fair comment really, because at the moment I suppose it is one of the few national magazines we have.

I should like to point out to members opposite what I hope will happen with this kind of legislation. What I think would happen is that in the next five or ten years we would see magazines in Canada, particularly English Canada which has the biggest problem, that we do not have today. I have no way of forecasting what entrepreneur or what person may decide to go into the magazine business over the next decade, and I do not think anybody else has, but I think we make a mistake if we presume that Maclean's magazine is suddenly going to replace Time. It will not, because Time will still be on sale. The president of Time magazine has said as much, and presumably he knows what he is talking about.

I think we must remember that we are trying to encourage a new industry, one that we have not had before. Who would ever have thought 10 or 15 years ago that the city of Toronto would be an important producer of animated cartoons for the advertising industry, or for that matter, a recording centre for the musical industry? Many performers today come from New York City and do their recording in a Toronto recording studio. We have some of the best facilities in the world in Toronto, and it has become a very important industry. I do not think anyone foresaw this when we decided to develop the Canadian music and entertainment industry.

If there is another point to be made in all of this, Madam Speaker, I think it is this. We have the Canada Council, and we have done quite a lot for artists, painters, and those who are the backbone of our culture. We talk about a few writers and mention a few names of painters, photographers and so on, but really we have done nothing. I hear an hon. member opposite laughing; obviously he does not appreciate culture. As I said, it is a subjective thing. If he personally does not find any value in it, it is perfectly all right with me, but I think it has value.

I remember as a boy that during the war the people to whom we first looked to raise national and patriotic feelings were people of culture—writers, painters, and people like that. I do not think we do enough for them in this country. Many members of this House older than I will remember the surge of patriotism that there was during world war II and much of this was kindled by writers, painters, and other people in the cultural arena.

I was recently looking through the WPA work projects under the federal relief policy in the United States during the early thirties and at the rather unique way in which they considered artists, writers, and those kind of people to be so important that they had projects they were paid to do. This was at a time in the thirties when money was hard to get. They did an enormous number of projects under that relief program. The United States administration during the time of President Roosevelt certainly recognized the value of artists and culture. It was a war against poverty in those days, yet it was appreciated that without those people upon whom a country depends for its identity there was no way in which such a program was going to work.

As the minister mentioned in his speech this afternoon, what we are talking about today are the recommendations of the O'Leary commission made in 1961. This was a commission established by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who spoke so strongly this afternoon and gave us the balance sheet of the Maclean-Hunter Publishing Company. He conveniently, I thought, forgot to mention when he gave us those figures that Maclean's magazine as an entity has been losing money for years. I do not carry any brief for Maclean's magazine, but I found it a little contradictory that the right hon. member, who established the O'Leary commission in the first place which made the recommendations that we are acting on today, felt so strongly about Mr. Newman and Maclean's magazine.

Mr. Saltsman: He wrote a book about him.

Mr. Stollery: Yes, I understand that. I thought that was a little unfair because, after all, it was Senator O'Leary who first suggested that a genuine Canadian periodical press can exist only if it has access to a fair share of the advertising revenue.

I do not think any more remains to be said, Madam Speaker. Until Bill C-58 is passed, the Canadian periodical press will not have a fair share of the advertising revenue in Canada.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Madam Speaker, may I say at the outset to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) that if his assessment of this entire debate is simply related to Reader's Digest and Time magazine and to the length of the debate, then I want to tell him that I will be brief. I want also to tell him that I have no intention of discussing Time and Reader's Digest; I want to discuss the more fundamental principle of concern to me and to other publications which will be affected by this legislation. They have been mentioned in the past.

I have grave concern with this legislation because of what I interpret as editorial interference, or inteference in the editorial policy of periodical publications. Unfortunately this is frequently done in the name of cultural sovereignty, Canadianism, Canadian spirit, or whatever happens to be the appropriate word on a particular day.

I listened very carefully when the minister spoke in this House on May 8. He implied, as I understand it, that there would be no government interference with the editorial policy of periodical publications, yet on that same date there was a news release from the minister's office. I should like to quote from it:

> The amendments mean that if certain foreign periodicals now being published in Canada expect to continue to benefit from the provisions of section 19, they will have to meet the criteria outlined in the law, which has been in existence since 1965. These criteria relate to ownership, control and content.

I should like to emphasize the word "content". The press release went on to say this:

National revenue officials, who administer the Income Tax Act, can provide an advance ruling on the eligibility of a periodical for the benefits of Section 19 in the case of uncertainty on the part of a publisher contemplating the publication in Canada of a periodical with a certain format and editorial content.

My fears were rekindled when the recently appointed Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Cullen) announced the new content regulations, indicating that Canadian editions of foreign parent publications must have more than 80 per cent difference in content or lose tax exemptions for advertisers. As I understand the government's position, to qualify as a Canadian publication a magazine would need to be 80 per cent different from a parent foreign publication and, indeed, even a Canadian-owned publication cannot be recognized as Canadian if its contents are substantially the same as printed elsewhere.

The issue in my view is not the loss of Reader's Digest, Time magazine, MD of Canada, Modern Medicine or the Medical Aspects of Human Sexuality, and there are other publications which will be affected, all publications which I have personally enjoyed for several years. The issue in my view in this debate is the principle of editorial freedom, which I truly believe is being attacked and eroded by this particular legislation.

I have no difficulty in accepting that the minister and the government, whether their decision is right or wrong, and whether I agree or disagree with it, have the right to define for income tax purposes Canadian ownership of a publication. I recognize that the government has a responsibility in enforcing laws that deal with libel, obscenity, contempt, sedition, etc. However, when Canadian ownership is determined by the government then it should make it absolutely clear it will absolve itself from further interference.

Perhaps the most overworked and misunderstood word in this entire debate has been censorship. I have listened to the charges and countercharges over this particular word and this particular issue. The minister and the government in defending the bill have repeatedly stated that censorship is not being employed as part of government policy.

The government is correct in saying that the regulations in the strictest terms are not censorship, and yet it is their attitude and their response to the charge of censorship that alarms me and, frankly, should alarm all Canadian people.

The minister knows perfectly well that he is legislating a mechanism for government interference in the decisions of a publisher. Indeed the Minister of National Revenue has indicated unequivocally that the effects of the new legislation will undoubtedly destroy Time's Canadian edition, which will probably go out of business under these regulations. If the government deems it necessary to deceive the public with a play on words in this particular instance, and in particular when we are discussing the very fundamental principle of editorial freedom, I have severe reservations as to what the government's response will be in future if it is confronted with criticism or adverse editorial comment by future Canadian publications. This situation to me smacks of authoritarianism and, of course, authoritarian government has no place in our democratic society.

As one who has trained in a science discipline I have recognized for a long time, and would defend, the importance and the necessity of the free exchange of knowledge and views. This exchange of information is not solely for the benefit of those who are involved in scientific endeavours. I should like to suggest that this scientific exchange is really to the benefit of and has a salutary effect on the larger community and citizens of Canada.

When I was thinking about this I wondered how many individuals in this Chamber had taken, or even had the opportunity to review world literature. I can assure you that I have done this on at least one occasion; it is a great experience, and underlines the importance of this type of exchange of knowledge and information. I have a permanent appreciation of this fact and it will have a lasting effect on me. I may say that it influenced my comments in this particular debate.

The major part of this debate has been concerned with Reader's Digest and Time, and I can state, as I am sure other hon. members can, that my correspondence on the subject in respect of Reader's Digest and Time has been heavy and overwhelmingly in support of their retention. I do not want to reiterate these arguments at this time as they have been well outlined by other members in the House. However, I should like to raise the issue in respect of the impact this legislation and the regulations will have on medical publications in Canada and, indeed, on other technical journals which will be confronted with a similar fate.

As I indicated sometime earlier, MD of Canada, Modern Medicine and the Medical Aspects of Human Sexuality will be affected by this legislation and I have no doubt they will disappear from the Canadian scene.

I want to take a few moments to discuss the specific publication MD of Canada. I have picked this particular journal for three reasons, recognizing that it does have a unique editorial concept. First, in many ways the problem which have been created for Md of Canada by his legislation are similar to those experienced by other medical journals and, indeed, other technical publications presently in Canada. The second reason is my personal knowledge and interest in reading this journal since its inception in Canada. Of course this does permit me to indicate that the information I have can be received as reliable and authoritative. Thirdly, I think it is important to review one of these so we can assess the impact this legislation will have on other scientific publications. I believe this will demonstrate unequivocally the seriousness of the legislation not only as it relates to MD of Canada but to other publications.

MD of Canada is dedicated to serving physicians by giving them a publication that reflects the highest ideals of the medical profession and by presenting features related to the universality of medicine and man. It was founded in January, 1960. MD of Canada is a monthly controlled circulation magazine that is sent free of charge to more than 25,000 physicians in Canada. It is published by MD Publications (Canada) Ltd., with offices in Quebec and at Oakville, Ontario. It is published in two editions, one in English and one in French and English.

The editor of MD of Canada is the internationally distinguished Canadian physician William C. Gibson, M.D. and Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. He is a professor of medical history and research professor of neuro-psychiatry at the University of British Columbia, where he was also special assistant to the president on development of the university.

I want to point out that Dr. Gibson was invited to become the editor of MD of Canada in April, 1973, following a world search for an editor after the death of the most renowned Felix Marti-Ibinez, the founder and original editor of MD of Canada. Dr. Marti-Ibinez, an international medical historian, physician and writer, was a colleague of Dr. William Gibson.

Dr. Gibson is also the international editor of MD, the medical news magazine USA, which is among the leading medical publications in the United States. In addition, he is the international editor of MD en Espagnol, which is published in Spanish for physicians throughout Latin America, and MD Pacific, which is published in Hong Kong for physicians in the Far East. Essays by Dr. Gibson appear regularly in the "Mirror of Medicine" section of MD of Canada.

MD of Canada is a staff-researched and staff-written publication, and all the articles are conceived, researched, and written for physicians. The in-depth research is intensive and broad, thus giving the articles a great deal of intellectual and literary value.

The news section is written by a professional journalist who is in the Montreal office, and among the medical news included in MD of Canada is the coverage of all major Canadian meetings of physicians.

MD of Canada's editorial content provides a unique, humanistic concept which combines the cultural and historical interests of the physician with his professional interests. This is the striking difference between MD of Canada and other medical publications to which I referred earlier. Dr. Marti-Ibinez said, "It is an integration of medicine, society, and humanity translated editorially into a magazine of medical culture and cultural medicine".

● (2110)

MD of Canada's editorial content is, therefore, directed to the physician who deals with mankind, which he must understand in a broad sense in order to be a good physician. It is an understanding which encourages the physician to treat patients as people rather than as impersonal disease entities.

The basic editorial concept of MD of Canada is as inherently universal as medicine itself. The unique concept conceived by Dr. Marti-Ibinez recognizes the physician not only as a professional but also as an individual member of society. To quote from one of his editorials:

As a professional he (the physician) is interested in the art and science of healing: as an individual he feels the need to increase his general cultural knowledge; as a member of society he wants to understand ... the public health problems of his community, his country and the world in general. A physician is not only a social person, he is also an historical person. The interests of the world are therefore his interests.

Non-Canadian Publications

From the above it can be said that the MD concept recognizes all physicians not only as members of their own country but also as members of a professional community which is truly international. Any other view of physicians would be too narrow to embrace this professional segment of society. Feature articles, then, if they are to reflect this concept, must be basically universal in their appeal. Please note that the expressed aim is to stimulate "medical culture" and" cultural medicine". These are not idle aims or phrases. Any issue of MD of Canada will quickly convince a reader how fully each feature article embraces this doctrine. The Report of the Royal Commission on Publications in 1961 stated:

... Cultural publications, and literary and scholarly journals, are a part of our national heritage, reflecting something else than our concern with the market place, keeping alive among us the deeper, sweeter and more spiritual things of life. In the opinion of the commission, their encouragement and preservation cannot be put aside.

Laymen find it startling to learn that a magazine designed exclusively for a medical audience devotes a major share of its editorial content to the arts, yet this is a cornerstone of the MD concept.

To any physician anywhere articles in MD of Canada are designed for consumption in this country yet they are conceived, researched, and written from a more universal point of view. The historical aspects of a subject, for example, are basically of universal interest to all physicians, yet there are often more local aspects of the subject which are of special interest only to Canadian physicians. Thus these features are in themselves exponents of "cultural medicine".

It is of fundamental importance to understand the MD concept because when it is understood one will understand why MD of Canada is no more a facsimile of MD, the medical newsmagazine USA, than MD, the medical newsmagazine USA is a facsimile of MD of Canada. Both are truly independent magazines, completely different in material and integration; each caters exclusively to physicians of its own country and shares only the basic MD concept which is founded on the universality of medicine.

The news section of Md of Canada completes the editorial picture. Most of the news contained in this section is unavailable to Canadians in any other single source. Reportage includes highlights of medical and scientific meetings in Canada, most of which are not reported in a single source to all physicians in Canada. In the MD's clinics section important new findings in the world of medicine are reported. Only in MD of Canada can our physicians get this type of news, which is so helpful to them in keeping abreast of clinical problems essential in today's fast moving field of medical advancement.

Finally, MD of Canada performs one further editorial function. Important Canadian medical news is reported in MD, the medical newsmagazine USA, and is also reported in MD en Espanol. Similarly, feature articles of wholly Canadian subject matter are originally prepared by MD of Canada and later re-researched for readers of MD the medical newsmagazine USA, and for MD en Espanol.

From its first issue, MD of Canada has been printed in Canada, on Canadian paper, from typesetting and plates manufactured in Canada. MD of Canada is mailed through the facilities of the Canada Post Office utilizing mailing lists provided by a Canadian mailing house. All advertising is solicited in Canada by the sales staffs located in Montreal and Oakville, Ontario.

The free flow of medical information, regardlesss of its source, is vital to public health in this country. It is a matter separate and distinct from the problems of publications for the laity. MD of Canada has received favourable comments from thousands of physicians across the country illustrating the very real and important contribution that MD is making to the practice of medicine by presenting information of medical value to physicians throughout the world.

In summing up the position of MD of Canada I would point out that MD of Canada is a controlled circulation magazine with no subscription revenue. Paid circulation magazines might have the alternative of sending non-Canadian editions into Canada for sale to readers, but MD of Canada does not have that choice. Its only source of revenue is advertising. If MD of Canada, an important medical publication which has been sent to physicians in this country for more than 15 years, ceased to publish in Canada as a result of Bill C-58, the MD concept would be lost and could not be replaced.

MD of Canada is not a Canadian edition of a parent magazine. It is neither a split run edition nor the result of overflow circulation of a parent magazine. It is a fully integrated Canadian medical publication whose editorial content is based upon the MD concept.

MD of Canada purchases, and always has, all of its mechanical production from Canadian suppliers. These include typesetting, printing, labelling and mailing.

By definition, MD of Canada is a "magazine of medical culture and cultural medicine". MD of Canada carries a completely Canadian medical news section. MD of Canada prepares original features which, when re-researched, appear, along with Canadian medical news, in MD, the medical newsmagazine USA, in MD en Espanol and in MD Pacific. MD of Canada reworks editorial feature material prepared internationally before it appears in MD of Canada. MD of Canada publishes an English edition and a combined English and French edition.

The physician readers of MD of Canada identify strongly with this magazine for many reasons. The first of these reasons is the fact that the magazine is researched, written, and edited for physicians. Another reason is that MD of Canada is always responsive to the requests of its readers. Thousands of reprints of essays appearing in MD of Canada have been distributed to physicians who have requested them. These reprints are free and there is no charge for them to the physicians in any way whatsoever.

The contents of MD of Canada are not the same as in any of the other editions of MD, namely, the US edition, the Latin American editions, or the edition for the Far East. There is no simultaneous publication of contents in any of the four magazines. All articles that are published in MD of Canada are especially scheduled and edited for that publication.

MD of Canada plays an important role by serving a numerically small but professionally highly important segment of the population with a magazine which responds to the full range of the physician's interests.

[Mr. Holmes.]

I would hope that the contents of this brief, which has been prepared by MD of Canada, and indeed of other similar briefs, will be very carefully assessed by the standing committee at the completion of this debate on second reading, and I hope that their importance is discernible to hon. members.

In conclusion I wish to reiterate that the principal issue in this debate is editorial freedom. I would simply say that if that objective is not realized before the passage of this bill, then I have no doubt that the minister will be remembered in the annals of history for his infringement on one of the basic freedoms that we have observed in the past, namely, editorial freedom.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, in some ways I should like to begin where the previous speaker left off. I do not really see that the great issue in this bill and in the debate we are going through has anything to do with editorial freedom. I think it has to do with the question of money and how much money people will make by either having advertising as a deductible item or not having it as a deductible item. It is on that basis that I think it has to be viewed.

I am supporting this bill, but I am doing it with enormous reservations because, frankly, I do not like the kind of reasons which have brought us to this point. In some ways I think we are dealing with two different problems when we talk about Reader's Digest and Time magazine. It seems to me that this bill is really directed against Time rather than Reader's Digest because Reader's Digest, in a way, is unique, and if the government could have found a way to let it off the hook it probably would have done so. However, in the interests of consistency they have probably both been put into the same bag, because it is really a question of a news magazine rather than something like Reader's Digest.

I do not pretend to be an expert on Reader's Digest, and I will just leave it at this point because I have not been a great reader. Its endless optimism really gets to me after a while, and there are so many medical articles about rare diseases that when I read them I become sick and think that I have those rare diseases.

Let us go on to talk about Time magazine. As most people do, I realize that that magazine has an enormous advantage because of the fact that it is an international publication and can afford all kinds of things which no national magazine in any country can afford. The problem with Time magazine is that it is too good, and if we are trying to build up some kind of national magazine and to foster our own journalism and culture, we have to hobble those that are too good. That is the real problem.

I had a little experience with Time magazine. By a strange coincidence I ran a campaign pamphlet which bore a startling resemblance to Time magazine's own journal. I received a letter from Time's lawyers on election day suggesting that I cease and desist from the distribution. Of course I complied with this. However, it is a magazine which in many ways cannot be matched by any other magazine which has to rely on the resources of one nation. I am sorry that is so because in many way both Time and Reader's Digest have tried to be good citizens in this country. I do not feel that the way these magazines are being hobbled is any fault of their own, unless it is the fault of being too good in the work they do.

In many ways I have a good feeling for Time magazine because as far as I am concerned personally, and I think as far as my party is concerned, we receive as fair a treatment in Time magazine—perhaps a fairer treatment with regard to events in the House of Commons than we receive in Canadian journals and Canadian magazines, and therefore I have a great deal of regret at what is being done. I think I am not alone in this and that many people feel exactly the same way. I do not think anyone wants to do this. We have reached a point in our history where we feel that it has to be done in order to encourage the sense of nationalism which has developed in this country, and a longing for a national culture and identity.

There is an irony to this present government bringing in this legislation. I was in the House when the then minister responsible, Hon. Walter Gordon, brought in the exemption for Time and Reader's Digest. My friend and colleague, the then hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, Colin Cameron, was privately assured that under no circumstances would that great Canadian nationalist, Walter Gordon, ever grant the exemption to Time and Reader's Digest. I am sure that, if it had been the decision of Walter Gordon alone, that would not have been done. To our surprise Walter Gordon stood up and announced the exemption, and it took quite a bit of effort on my part to restrain Colin Cameron from charging across the aisle and doing physical violence to the then minister.

At that time we felt that we had been betrayed, that in fact the government of the day had sold out and knuckled under to the pressure which it had been subjected to, not only from Time magazine but also from the U.S. government. We tend to forget this. There is a kind of lesson there when we consider all the favours Time magazine has done for the Liberal Party and how in two elections it virtually acted as the advocate of the Liberal Party. The Liberal Party shows no gratitude at this time, which demonstrates that parties are not reliable. After all the things Time did for the Liberal Party, look at the gratitude and reward it is reaping from the association. Perhaps it is an irony, but it is heartening that loyalties like that do not last forever; but when everyone says, "what have you done for me lately?"

It looks as though the time has come when the Liberal Party is more concerned about what the Maclean's publishing company is going to say about it than what Time magazine is going to say. Liberals know who is on the way up and who is on the way down, and there is no sense hitching your future to a falling Star. They might as well see where the rising rockets are going and tie on to them, especially if some propulsion can be added to that rocket.

As I said, I am not really proud of taking the position I am taking. I feel I must take it, and I take it with some regret because it is a sad thing for a country to do this. It is sad for a country to admit that it has failed to create its own culture, and then to blame this on someone else.

Mr. Blais: Oh, come on.

Mr. Saltsman: I feel that this is what in fact has happened. It has been much too easy for this country's so-called intellectual establishment to admit that the reason we cannot get ahead, and the reason we cannot produce this excellence is that we have Time magazine, Reader's Digest, or something else hobbling us.

I made a speech recently at a Commonwealth conference in which I said to some third world countries which were complaining about their present state that for a long time they could blame it on colonialism; that they could not get anywhere because they were being colonized. They got rid of the colonialists. Then they started to blame multinational corporations and got rid of them. I asked them who they would blame it on now.

One of the reasons I am supporting this measure is that I want to see whether our intellectual establishment is really going to come through, because it is going to have to come through now. It has been given every single advantage possible. In my view Time magazine will not go away. I know that the president of Time says he cannot operate, and that the president of Reader's Digest says he cannot operate under this legislation, and just recently we heard that MD of Canada magazine cannot operate under it. I have the feeling that despite the 80 per cent content and the Canadian ownership rule they will find a way of operating in Canada, because they cannot afford not to. What does it mean to them? It means that their profits will not be as fat. Their profits have been very fat in this country, but I do not think a magazine of the international stature of Time can afford to have itself pushed out of a country.

What are the other Canadian magazines going to do? They will still have to compete. I hope they do, and I wish them well. There are encouraging signs that Canadian magazines are in fact competing, but there is a problem, and once we pass this legislation let us not blame anyone else for what are essentially our own failures. From here on we must be very critical of our own intellectual establishment.

● (2130)

We realize that in many ways we are going against public opinion in this debate, and we must be frank about that. It is not the first time we have gone against public opinion, of course. We have done it with the CBC, with films, with cable, and with our bilingualism program.

We in this chamber have a responsibility to think about not only what is immediately popular but we have a responsibility for the development of a sense of Canadian nationalism. Even if public opinion is not entirely with us on this issue, we have to take our chance.

In many ways I regret that the government brought in closure to halt this debate. I think it was on its last legs anyway. I am not opposed to closure in principle; I voted against closure and I voted for closure, so I am inclined to view it in light of the specific circumstances.

In some ways the Liberal party has never learned to understand the role of the opposition and why the opposition opposes. Unfortunately Liberals have not spent enough time in opposition over the years to give them a sense of what an opposition tries to do. The whole point of an opposition digging in its heels on an issue—even when debates have nothing further to consider in some new and sparkling way that would get the attention of the press—is to help form public opinion, to give public opinion a chance to jell.

It is unfortunate that closure was brought in at this time when the postal strike is on. Time and Reader's Digest must be operating under a dark cloud right now. The postal strike could not have come at a worse time for them. They mounted an extensive campaign among their readers asking them to write to their members of parliament, and of course they are free to do this. I am sure we would have received many more letters at the height of this debate telling us their opinions. Perhaps we would still have done as we are doing now, of course; perhaps not a single opinion would have been changed as a result of those letters. Nevertheless the public was entitled to have its views known.

Under these circumstances this was a bad time to use closure. Those who oppose this measure—and I am not one of them—have a genuine cause for grievance. The government would have been well advised and would have shown some sensitivity to have postponed this—not put it off indefinitely but to reach some agreement with the opposition and bring it back when the mail starts again. It might not be the greatest criticism in the world against the government to say this, but it shows the kind of insensitivity that exists on the government side.

Members of the opposition are no more foolish than members of the government. They know that if they talk too loud and long the public will turn against them. Debates cease in this House when the public says "Enough", and most of us are sensitive enough to listen. But the government does not have enough confidence in that kind of sensitivity between members of the opposition, members of the government and the public at large. I am not an opponent of closure and I think there are valid occasions for it, but this is not one of them.

I sometimes fear that my country is in danger of becoming an incestuous, intellectual ghetto. More and more the writers in this country seem to be talking about themselves rather than the events they are describing. I sometimes look at what is written about this country and wonder whether we see the same world. It is almost as though it is a village with a repertory company when seen through the journals and television that we have.

When we talk about providing stimulus and opportunity for people in the arts we are in fact talking about maintaining a very well kept but very small intellectual establishment. Perhaps I should not say this, but sometimes I wonder to what extent their nationalism is a self-serving way of maintaining their own positions and jobs. How many of them are living off their nationalism rather than off their talent? Politicians have many of these faults too, but they run the chance of being defeated; writers, good, bad or indifferent, go on forever. As much as anything else it seems to depend on who you know in this country rather than how good you are.

We have been very accommodating in this country to people in the arts. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) said he does not care how much money we spend. Well, we spend a hell of a lot of money on support of the arts and I have not seen much return. Maybe that is the way the arts are; maybe you have to put a lot of money in to get a little return.

It seems that nobody in this country does anything unless they have a Canada Council grant in their pocket, or a LIP grant, or an opportunities for youth grant. Maybe artists should not be struggling, but it seems to me we have done a hell of a lot of pampering of our artists as a whole and it has not had much effect. We may only be raising a generation not of talents but of people who know how to fill out application forms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: We may be the most talented "application form filler-outers" in the whole world. Some people graduate through all the stages—they start with the Company of Young Canadians, go to Opportunities for Youth, then into LIP, and I presume if we wait long enough they will show up in the New Horizons program. Somewhere in between it would be nice to see them get their hands dirty. I am old fashioned enough to think that people should be working in the jobs that exist, rather than insist on creating their own jobs or otherwise they do not work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I am getting the wrong support over here. I will have to look at my notes again.

This debate will decide whether we can survive or cannot survive. From here on we do not want any more excuses about excellence in this country and about whether we can do something. I think we are entitled to be more critical of our people in the arts, and I for one intend to be more critical. We have coddled them in this country—and perhaps they needed it. It is like our manufacturing industry where we have done the same thing. We believe that you have to shelter our infant industries, but then the problem is that they never grow up. In some ways this has also been true of the arts.

We have some good writers but they are few and far between. There is a kind of self-consciousness, a kind of coyness, a kind of determination to be different amongst them. If the country wants to go one way they have to go another way. There is almost a presumption that if the majority of people in the country think one way, they have to be wrong. Some think the artist must be right and the people wrong. Often the artist does not fight on behalf of the people, but against the people. Perhaps that is the traditional role of the writer, thinker, poet, painter, and musician. All the same the people are entitled to have the intellectual establishment understand their viewpoint some of the time. People do not want to be treated contemptuously by those on the top.

● (2140)

The trouble is that a certain group has consciously made itself into an opposition which opposes almost everything, and thinks it must be supported. In a sense, oppositions need people to oppose them. They say, "How can we oppose you if you do not oppose us?" In a sense we must provide the opposition. We have been made too comfortable culturally, and this must stop.

I shall conclude, as I am sure others want to participate in the debate, by recalling something written by Arnold Toynbee, the historian who died recently. The one thing in his theory of history which impressed me above all else was his theory of challenge. He explained the rise and fall of civilizations in terms of meeting a challenge or being overcome by it. Some civilizations are created in response to a challenge, but others succumb when overcome by too strong a challenge, a challenge they are not strong enough to withstand.

Recently we said that multinational corporations are challenging us too strongly, and their challenge is more than our young country can stand. We reacted by passing legislative measures which will prevent our being challenged too strongly and smothered by superior or stronger forces. But Toynbee also said that civilizations decay because they face no challenges, because they grow soft, complacent, and are over-protected. In some ways our civilization is in greater danger from the second kind of challenge than from the first. I therefore hope that after this measure is passed we shall see evidence of a more vibrant and vital approach on the part of our cultural and artistic people than they have shown in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, all through the debate, strategically interrupted for a few months, the mood in the House has been changing, to say the least, and the enthusiasm expressed by the spokesmen for each party represented here, when the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) announced the long awaited amendments to sections 2 and 4 of the Income Tax Act, turned by some transmutation mysterious to me into an almost general outcry, mostly from members opposite.

Hon. members will remember what the hon. Secretary of State said on January 23, 1975:

[English]

The proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act will, as of January 1st, 1976, restore to section 19 the force and intent which its authors had in mind. I am confident that the enterprise and skill of the Canadian magazine industry will seize this opportunity. It is my hope and expectation that this decision of the government will result in the creation of a Canadian news magazine.

[Translation]

The spokesmen for the three other parties replied in perfect unison that they agreed in principle with this government undertaking. Thus the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) stated:

[English]

. . . in responding to the statement just made I would like first to say, on behalf of the official opposition, that we are pleased that the government has clarified this matter at long last. We believe that the move to eliminate the income tax advantage shared mainly by two magazines, Time and Reader's Digest, is a good one.

[Translation]

As for the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (M. Symes) he expressed the feeling of the New Democrats as follows:

[English]

The NDP welcomes, at long last, the announcement by the government to end the special tax concessions for advertisers in Time and Reader's Digest.

[Translation]

Finally, on behalf of the Social Credit Party, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) made the following statement:

Non-Canadian Publications

On behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada, I should like to thank the Secretary of State for his statement which has finally given birth to his long awaited policy. It would seem that a breath of cultural nationalism to protect Canada's integrity animates the minister and finally incites him, after many hesitations, to now abolish the fiscal advantages granted the magazines Reader's Digest and Time.

I wonder what may have happened over the past few months which causes the government, through its Secretary of State, to be seen as a big bad wolf which is trying to eat the three nice little pigs, namely freedom of the press, freedom of exchange of ideas and freedom of enterprise?

The answer, Mr. Speaker, can be summarized in one word: lobbying, and very strong and tenacious at that on the part of the firms directly affected, but more specifically the pressure imposed by one of them which has used every means at its disposal to postpone as long as possible, if not indefinitely, the adoption of Bill C-58.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing against lobbying. This is an institution which, under some regimes, is even officially established and which sometimes provides priceless services in making the legislator aware of certain aspects of a governmental measure which could have been forgotten or underestimated. But when lobbying is unduly pressing, one has to stop and react strongly.

I have myself been submitted to Reader's Digest's lobbying, but I have tried to react and understand the real meaning of the problem, the one Reader's Digest is deliberatly trying to hide to delight itself in mostly accurate though overly emotive considerations without any direct relations with the object of our discussions. Unfortunately, it would seem that some members have not made the same intellectual process, and this is very regrettable since it is at the root of the imbroglio we are floundering in today.

But what is the real dimension we are all seeking, and how do we settle, in all fairness, a debate whose origins stem from some obscure fiscal concession which should never have been made and on which we must now base ourselves.

The question is not new. The debate did not spring from the sudden need to improve the Income Tax Act; nor was it suggested by some illustrious unknown in the office, on the right, on the sixth floor of the head office of the Secretariat of State who wished to play the amateur archivist and dug up a nice little scandal to seek the limelight. No. Foreign publications have been in our midst for a long time. The degree of influence they have exercised on Canadian culture is not an academic question. In fact, the debate was born when Reader's Digest appeared on the scene, in 1942; it became concrete when a royal commission of inquiry was created, on September 14, 1960, under the chairmanship of Mr. Grattan O'Leary, and given the mandate of looking into the situation of periodicals in Canada. The main conclusion of the O'Leary Commission follows, and I quote:

[English]

A nation's domestic advertising expenditure should be devoted to the support of its own media of communications, and that a genuinely Canadian periodical press can only exist if it has access to a fair share of domestic advertising.

[Translation]

And the recommendation was to prohibit the deduction of the advertising cost in a so-called "foreign" magazine. In 1968, faced with the decline of the periodical industry in Canada, the government of the time established a special Senate committee—if the NDP members have no objection, the Senate is still useful sometimes. The main conclusion of this committee was a reiteration of the recommendations of the O'Leary Commission, namely the removal of the extravagant tax privileges which two foreign periodicals had and still have so that the periodical industry in Canada would have a fairer share of the revenue from advertising and of the overall advertising budget which amounted to more than $35 million in 1973.

But what is the real nature and scope of this Section 19 of the Income Tax Act? It defines in substance what should be considered as a Canadian magazine and enables announcers in these magazines to deduct their advertising cost for tax purposes. The original idea was to give a push to the periodical industry in Canada by helping them motivate the announcers which happen to be their main source of income.

But the addition of subsections (2) and (4) dilutes Section 19 to the point that it lost its incentive value. The exceptions to the general principle provide that, for legal purposes and within the general context of Section 19, some foreign periodicals are considered as Canadian periodicals and that their announcers are entitled to the tax deduction. Bill C-58 precisely aims at restoring section 19 by giving it its full force of incentive to the Canadian industry, by deleting subsections (2) and (4). The aim is praiseworthy, and as it is hard to justify an exaggerated privilege of common law for the benefit of a few individuals, I think it is far more difficult to defend and justify the retention of such a privilege, especially when it is exercised to the disadvantage of the local industry.

The main idea which the lobbyists of Reader's Digest tried to convey to us was the following: this publication, being a good Canadian citizen as an employer, an investor or a cultural vehicle, it was unthinkable that it be penalized this way because it had become practically a Canadian. I must say this first argument—retentionist, if I may say so—does not hold any water and that lately Reader's Digest also gave up that argument, thus separating from Time—by a very simple syllogism. If indeed Reader's Digest is a foreign publication—American in this case—no argument will convince me that it is a valuable and distinctive Canadian entity and, therefore, there is no reason to perpetuate an anachronism which has already done too much damage to our own interests. Therefore, the privilege involved is nothing but a fiscal loophhole that only turns to the advantage of the magazine and of the advertisers and which we must fill as soon as possible. If on the other hand, Reader's Digest is indeed a Canadian publication, it then falls under the general provisions of section 19, and needs no particular privilege to allow it to operate in accordance with the general law, to enjoy the same standing as the other Canadian magazines and to compete with them with the same weapons.

So, one way or another, rescinding the privilege is not only advantageous but necessary to the exercise of free enterprise which is so dear to my colleagues of the other side—and to me also, I do not want to try and conceal it.

[Mr. Lachance.]

● (2150)

I have on several occasions mentioned the magazine Reader's Digest and only this one. That is because, as far as I am concerned, it is the only entity which deserves our attention in this debate, as Time does not happen to be Canadian, is not in process of becoming Canadian and has no desire to be "Canadianized." Therefore, in the case of Time which is the second most important magazine to be affected by Bill C-58, not only is the repeal of income tax privileges desirable, it stands to reason and is undisputable morally and economically.

As for Reader's Digest, the situation is basically different, we must admit. I would like to point out some of the features which—as some hon. members have very aptly explained before me—make Reader's Digest an entity, shall I say Canadian and almost Quebecoise.

Reader's Digest has 460 employees in Quebec and provides over 1000 more indirectly with jobs; 60 per cent of the yearly income is spent in Quebec, that is about $18 million. Four out of the six administrators are from Quebec; each word printed in its two Canadian editions is read, edited or written by its copy-writers in Montreal; $8 million are invested in Quebec, and I will not linger over all the rest.

In the light of this information, what prevents Reader's Digest from meeting the requirements of section 19 of the Income Tax Act?

To solve this problem, we have to go back to the sources, namely to section 19 and consider each appreciation criterium to see if Reader's Digest comply with them or not.

We hear about control of editorial policy. In this regard, and even if we could argue for a long time and if the court alone could make a definite decision, we should, in my opinion, give the benefit of the doubt to Reader's Digest which openly declares, through its management, that it carries its whole business in Canada, be in the choice of its policies, of the publishing or of the broadcasting mechanisms.

We are also told about beneficial ownership. Reader's Digest already clearly indicated that, provided it is given a certain time to reorganize its financial structure, it could eventually meet the 75 per cent requirement. We also hear about the Canadian content and the publication under license, and this is where things go wrong, because Reader's Digest, with the best will in the world, will never be able to meet this third requirement because of the very nature of its publications.

We should stop here for a while and reassess the status of that magazine.

Let us suppose for a few minutes it is a foreign magazine. Some journalists have accused us of intending to hinder the circulation of ideas by trying to expel magazines which presently benefit from the special privilege under section 19 (b). Are they not overreacting to a certain point? Our intention is not to turf out those magazines. They can abide by the law if they meet the specifications mentioned in section 19 and become Canadian magazines. Otherwise, like hundreds of other very popular foreign publications, which in fact get no special treatment from government, through a wide circulation they can nevertheless benefit from advertising revenues and be sold in Canada, so that no Canadian will be deprived of the right to read them. This applies to foreign magazines, for instance Time.

But is Reader's Digest truly a Canadian magazine? For reasons rapidly outlined earlier and other reasons already dealt with at length by my colleagues, I will answer through a double negation which almost amounts to an affirmation in the present case, for the rigid laws of mathematics are not always applicable in politics. Reader's Digest is not a foreign magazine, but it is not a Canadian magazine proper either, at least within the meaning of section 19. In fact, it is Canadian in soul if not in right, and to me this is sufficient justification to dig deeper and explore the avenues which would enable it to comply with legal requirements and even more. We have to make concessions if there is an element of sincerity in our wish to see the publication of Reader's Digest continue in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO INTERFERENCE WITH INSTALLATION OF INFRASTRUCTURE TO SERVICE DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTHWEST PART OF CITY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on July 30, 1975, I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) questions with regard to certain assurances that I wanted from him as the spokesman in this House for the National Capital Commission. The questions are set forth at page 8069 of Hansard. They had to do with the attitude of the government with respect to the crossing of federal lands by infrastructure which might serve development in various parts of the national capital region outside the green belt. I suppose the question would equally apply to areas adjacent to other federal lands.

The matter arose in the House as a result of a newspaper article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on the same day. That story attributes a number of rather startling statements to "an official NCC spokesman" who was subsequently identified to me as the commission's public relations officer.

We can take it for granted that there is a difference in view between the NCC on the one hand and the regional, municipal, and provincial authorities on the other with respect to the priorities to be given to development. I think that is a matter of which we are all well aware. This is a difficulty we shall have to resolve by consultation, I suppose, as time goes on. My respectful submission to the minister and to the NCC was that the difficulty clearly could not wait for a decision by the parliamentary committee. I suppose that in terms of the needs which have to be met, particularly with respect to housing, it will need to be resolved before the parliamentary committee can reach a conclusion.

Aside from all that there is a direct quotation in the story attributable to the spokesman which concerns me. The spokesman is quoted as saying that the NCC would have to "consider the use of the green belt land for trunk sewers and other facilities that would be required by private developers in South Gloucester and South Rideau". This clearly evinces the attitude of the Commission. It shows the Commission is giving serious consideration to doing exactly what the Minister of State for Urban Affairs said on the same day in the House he would not do. This conflict must be resolved by a statement which indicates that in fact when the minister was speaking in the House he was speaking for the Commission. The dates of the conflicting statements are just too close to be ignored.

The minister's answer in the House reads, in part: "I can assure the hon. member we certainly will not be obstructive in any Draconian sense". This implies to me that there could be obstruction in some sense and I would like to have this aspect cleared up by the minister.

The story in the paper contains the following statement:

> The NCC spokesman did not deny that this (referring to the statement) was a thinly veiled threat that private development might be left high and dry in South Gloucester and South Rideau with their access to sanitary facilities in the capital blocked off by the NCC green belt.

Frankly this conflict, the two types of answer on the same day, one by an official of the NCC and another by the minister in the House, even the rather veiled answer which is not uncharacteristic of the minister, cannot be allowed to stand.

I raise the matter during the adjournment debate in order to give the minister the opportunity to place the position before the House, not just the position of the NCC but the position of the Government of Canada with respect to the use of the green belt and other land for the provision of the infrastructure necessary for the development of land, whether private or otherwise, in the national capital region. In conclusion I would say it is important that nothing be done or said by the government, by any member of the House or, indeed, by the National Capital Commission which could in any way interfere in what I hope will be a good relationship, a relationship of mutual trust. I am afraid that the statement which was made, coming as it did on the heels of the statement by the minister in answer to my question, did nothing to clear the waters and I would be glad to receive an assurance from the minister in a specific way.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am rather interested in the hon. member's concern for housing in the national capital area. I thought he was only interested in parkland which would not be used for housing. What we are looking for now is more housing, moderately-priced housing and again, in another area, not to use what could be excellent recreational land for housing purposes.

I believe the policies of the NCC and other governments in the past involving purchasing land in advance have served this region exceedingly well. Consider the great development of the capital area as a result of these far-sighted decisions. The hon. member mentioned the need to make a decision before the parliamentary committee makes its report. I would expect that the committee would be some time before it makes a final report, but if it has anything to say in an interim report that, of course, would be exceedingly helpful.

I did use the words "will not be obstructive in any Draconian sense". I have to be perfectly honest and fair; it is necessary to state what my position is. I meant Draconian in the sense of trying to force an issue in a way that is distasteful. That we would not want to do. We are looking for co-operation and for a good, on-going relationship. I have really searched my soul on this one and sought the advice of many for whom I have great regard professionally, whose integrity as far as I am concerned is beyond question.

I strongly believe that if anything is done to delay or inhibit development of the southeast part of the city we will again be in one of these ever-repetitive situations. We will continue to have urban sprawl if we do not get the planning that we want or the housing at the cost we want.

If the hon. member asks me for a specific explanation, I put it in the terms that I am not at all inclined to recommend those things that would inhibit in any way the process of improving the situation and getting the southeast city project moving as quickly as possible.

COMMUNICATIONS—ALLEGED DETERIORATION OF TELEPHONE COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEMS—SUGGESTED DENIAL OF RATE INCREASES PENDING IMPROVEMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the question I am debating tonight has to do with one that I placed before the Acting Minister of Communications, and I am glad to see his very capable parliamentary secretary here tonight. Naturally, as is usual, I got the continually evasive answer that the matter would be looked into, which never is the case; so thankfully I have this avenue of approach tonight.

The problem I have presented is, to my mind, basic and reasonable. It is to request the Department of Communications—and also remind them of their responsibilities to Canadians—to provide normal, adequate telephone Communications on the premise that every Canadian, regardless of where he lives in Canada, is deserving of this normal, expected service.

The province of Newfoundland is usually the last to get any type of communications service. I could mention the neglect and utter disregard of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in fulfilling its responsibility to all Canadians who, even at this date, do not have the normal television service. And what is most disgusting to me and to the Canadians I represent is that that corporation, with all its high-priced officials, could not care less about its duty to all Canadians.

The question I am debating tonight shows that nobody cares about Canadians who live in remote and isolated areas, and who are continually being ignored by such organizations as Canadian National Telecommunications and Bell Canada. Why the government cannot see the phonyness that exists with regard to these two agencies is beyond me; but again the Canadian Transport Commission is just as neglectful and anti-Canadian as the agencies it is supposed to direct.

As a result of the persistent postal strike it should be incumbent upon the government opposite to ensure that Canadians can use the only alternate service available, the telephone service, and the companies that have a monopoly on that service should also ensure that Canadians everywhere are able to utilize it, are able to contact not only their members of parliament, some of whom are conscientious enough to try to serve them, but also contact someone in the case of emergency.

Not only are these companies incapable of providing this service in order to cope with the breakdown of the postal service, they cannot even fulfil their normal service responsibilities to all sections of Canada. What is more depressing is that the Canadian Transport Commission continues to grant these companies increases in rates, at the same time ignoring the service that they are supposed to be providing.

These agencies should not only be condemned. It is strange and ridiculous that whatever agency is responsible to provide on Parliament Hill enough lines for members who happen to serve remote areas of Canada and want to serve their constituents cannot do so. Members must go literally through torture to make a normal phone call to those they are trying to serve because there are not enough lines available. I have gone through this cancerous situation now for far too long, and while I have tried to be reasonable in my requests it is obvious that the bureaucratic disease persists to the point of no return. I can only say it is a sorry state for Canada that this disease continues to persist while nobody cares.

I can only condemn those elements I have mentioned, and I can only hope again, that perhaps someone will take some notice of the ridiculous situation that exists with regard to all these communication agencies for which this government and parliament are responsible, and either investigate the neglect, insisting that the agencies prove their capability to cope with their responsibilities, or have the guts to deny them any increases in rates which they request until they do so.

If I had the time I could give you almost verbatim the tales of woe and excuses I will receive in reply, the excuses, and the declarations of planning to improve the service, but nothing will be done because there is no justice and no consideration for those Canadians who need the normal services these organizations are supposed to provide. I know I will be just as disgusted after the answer is given as I now am. I hope the very capable parliamentary secretary will be able to give me some responsible answers and that I will see an improvement in the services to those Canadians who seem to be denied the services they deserve.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I only wish when the hon. member opposite mentions so many serious situations which deserve thoughtful and lengthy answers I could, within the restricted time available to me, reply to them all, giving him some satisfaction. I am sure he appreciates it is impossible for me to cover all these areas in depth. I intend to try in the minute or two available to touch on one or two of these areas, not by way of excuse but by way of explanation.

We have a problem of divided jurisdiction, of which the hon. member is well aware. That is not to say there are not real problems that need correction within the area of Newfoundland where jurisdiction is divided between the CNT and the province itself.

As an example, only a few months ago a United States base closed down in northern Newfoundland with very little notice, and the telephone system in that area was placed in serious jeopardy. Although the Department of Communications had no specific program, with the granting money available it did find $50,000 in order to give assistance on an emergency basis, allowing continuation of service in that area.

There are programs under way to improve communications services in Newfoundland. Telephone systems are extremely expensive, however, especially when long distances are involved.

Of course I cannot answer the criticism of the hon. member concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which is the responsibility of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner).

I would point out that the Canadian Transport Commission only a week or so ago ordered a reduction in the rate increase application by B.C. Telephone. I personally, as one member of the House of Commons, was encouraged by that, and I am going to watch with interest to see how Bell Telephone is dealt with by the CTC in those hearings now under way.

I do know that the hon. member in trying to get through to his constituency from Ottawa has had some difficulty.

In conclusion I simply want to note that partly because of the use made of the telephone system by the government telecommunications agency, the long distance network serving the Ottawa area has been working at close to capacity in recent months. The telephone company is currently installing additional equipment to relieve this situation, and when this work is completed there will be a safety margin of excess capacity for some time to come. I sincerely hope that will be of assistance to the hon. member in communicating with his constituents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow 11 o'clock a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

POSSIBLE LOWERING OF AGE OF ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSION TO 60—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the great many unemployed young people in the 18-25 age group are a problem which causes serious concern in this age group, because the country is thus deprived of their energy and talents, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to introduce in the House as soon as possible a bill for lowering the old age security pension entitlement age to 60, for those people who are willing to retire to make room for our young people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion therefore cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POST OFFICE

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BACK TO WORK LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. One week ago today the Prime Minister said in the House that the government would not then introduce legislation to restore postal service to Canadians and it was a matter of judgment as to when the public disservice outweighed the freedom of the right to strike. I ask the Postmaster General, since the strike is now nearly four weeks old, the longest in our history, how long, in his judgment, will the people be forced by government inaction to endure the hardships created by the postal disruption?

● (1110)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister indicated, what is too much harm is a matter of judgment. Fortunately, the business community is adjusting nicely to alternate methods of communication. Postal workers themselves are helping by setting up their own private couriers, which relieves a lot of the pressure. If I were to judge by the mail, I have had 3,810 telegrams of which three have been adverse, I shall be able to stand by my prediction that, possibly, at any time between now and Easter, depending on when the government feels it is in the best interests of the country, the strike will be resolved. But let me say this: this question would be better directed to the leaders of the union who, if they were to give their workers the democratic right to vote by secret ballot, would probably find that the workers would be back to work the next day.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—ACTION TO ENSURE VOTE ON GOVERNMENT OFFER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On Wednesday the Prime Minister also said that our proposal for legislation under which a government-supervised vote by Post Office employees could be held was worth considering at a later date. I ask the Postmaster General to tell the House what plans the government now has to ensure such a vote, in the public interest and the interests of democracy, of which he spoke?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, because of our views on democracy, we hate interfering with recognized organizations. As the hon. member knows, I received a telegram from the Canadian Labour Congress, which was highly publicized. I sent the following answer which, as it is short, I shall read:

I suggest you—

Meaning the Canadian Labour Congress:

—use the influence and prestige of the Canadian Labour Congress to convince the Canadian Union of Postal Workers that it is in the best interest of their members in particular and of the labour movement in general to conduct a secret vote, permitting the members of CUPW to accept or reject the government's final offer. This would eliminate charges that the trade union movement is an undemocratic structure. It would be further useful if the Congress would supervise this secret vote in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the House to judge that, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the government should refuse to take any action whatever to bring this postal disruption to an end?

Mr. Mackasey: No, Mr. Speaker. This is a matter of judgment. I could easily judge that the hon. member is trying to make political hay out of an embarrassing situation. People are bound to be hurt by strikes and this has never been denied. It depends on the value you place on democracy, and I place a greater value on it than the hon. member does.

STRIKE OF INSIDE WORKERS—PROPOSED DEBATE ON GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister? Notwithstanding what the Postmaster General just said, since neither the Postmaster General nor the postal union will protect the public interest, will the Acting Prime Minister bring the government's position before the House for debate as soon as possible, since parliament is the last refuge of the public interest?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the question posed by the hon. member. I believe the Postmaster General is acting in the public interest, and I think public support justifies my statement. There will be opposition days when the official opposition can put down a motion of this kind, if they wish.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not accept the Acting Prime Minister's answer. It appears that the Postmaster General is playing games at the expense of the public. The strike has continued for 25 days, millions of dollars have been lost and small businesses are affected adversely. Does the Acting Prime Minister not think that the public interest and the maintenance of essential services take precedence over the myth of collective bargaining as practised by the Post Office and the theatrics of the Postmaster General?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said and the Postmaster General confirmed, this is a question of judgment. I think it is very much in the public interest for the union involved to make the offer made by the Postmaster General and the Treasury Board available to its members, for voting. I think that would be the more democratic way of dealing with this issue. Unfortunately, so far that has not been the view of the union leaders. I think they should be given time to reflect.

Mr. Alexander: At the expense of the public.

HOUSING

ALLEGATION NO HOUSES BUILT UNDER AHOP PROGRAM IN TORONTO THIS YEAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs arises from the report on housing published yesterday in the city of Toronto. According to that report, not a single housing unit was built in Toronto under the AHOP program for the second year in a row. In addition, the limited dividend program has been largely ignored by private developers. Considering that the minister's so-called new AHOP program amounts to simply tinkering with some of the details, how does he expect the housing needs of the people in that and other cities to be met in the coming months?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, figures in my files indicate that some 832 units were built in Toronto under AHOP between January and September of this year. I think that is pretty good. We want to see an even better record in the coming year with the new program. With regard to the limited dividend program, I am sorry that I do not have the figures with me. However, it has been a considerable success in Toronto. Indeed, a high percentage of the rental accommodation being built in the Toronto region is on the assisted rental program. We want to see an increase in that as well.

Mr. Broadbent: I suggest with respect that the minister has probably confused the figures of metro Toronto with the city of Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: That is not an insignificant distinction, and I think the minister would agree. I am basing my statements on the report of the city of Toronto. During the first nine months of this year, only 1,068 units were started in the city of Toronto as a result of the initiative provided by the private sector. In the province of Saskatchewan, in particular, where there has been the greatest success compared with other provinces in meeting housing needs, a shift has been made to the non-profit sector. The city of Toronto, for example, has been appealing for assistance in the non-profit sector. Why, then, does the government not do more for non-profit housing?

Mr. Danson: I can understand the leader of the NDP dreaming of Saskatchewan all the time, but the fact is we are working closely with the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario in trying to accelerate non-profit programs. There have been some delays, but some very active consultations have been going on. The fact remains that construction in the major cities for new residential accommodation has not reached the level we would like. Naturally, such construction has taken place where there has been more land available. We fully expect that our new program, with the incentives to higher density forms of housing and lower cost housing, will indeed encourage construction, if not right in the core, in the major cities. This will be medium density and in some cases high density housing. It will make the best use of the land and the city will receive a $1,000 grant per unit built under that program. I think it will assist the city of Toronto and, indeed, many other municipalities across this country.

EFFECT OF LAND SPECULATION ON HOUSING COSTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Has the minister had a chance to look at the report prepared by Mr. Lorrimer on the effect of land speculation in the metro-Toronto region? He has estimated that some 24 per cent of the average price of a new housing unit in metro-Toronto during the past year is as a result of profits from land speculation. If that is the case, what does the government intend to do to stop this speculation in land?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my view that a lot of the heat, not all, has been taken out of the speculation sales. The biggest factor in land costs now is the delay in approvals of bringing in serviced land for housing production. I share the hon. member's concern. I am asking the housing ministers to meet in Ottawa on the twenty-fifth of this month. This is one of the subjects to which we want to address ourselves in a very substantial way. It has been a matter for discussion at all of our meetings so far. We all recognize that it is one of the major areas of concern, even with the additional incentives which we are providing of $1,000 per unit and the additional sewage treatment and water treatment programs we have proposed in our new set of housing policies. We want to do all in our power to work with the provinces to see that this land is brought on stream as soon as possible without undue bureaucratic delay and that the concerns of the municipalities are taken into consideration.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

SUGGESTION REGIONAL OFFICES BE INFORMED OF NEW POLICY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to put a question to the Minister of Urban Affairs.

On November 3 last, the minister announced a new Canadian housing policy. To date, the regional offices of the CMHC have had only the newspapers as a source of information on that policy. Can the minister tell us why he has neglected to inform those offices, and whether he intends to do so in the near future?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): We have been advising regional offices as rapidly as we can. Indeed, on the day of the announcement the regional officers as well as the district officers were all advised by Telex where possible. Otherwise, local management was to come in for as thorough a briefing as could be arranged. The hon. member will understand that much of the detail cannot be given until the legislation passes through the House. However, the fullest possible information is being given to the regional officers; this was arranged as part of our initial planning, but if the hon. member knows of some offices which have not yet been informed I would be interested to have particulars; I would urge him to send me a note or drop over to see me because I shall be meeting later today with the President of CMHC.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC AND FEDERAL GUIDELINES SIMILAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who told us a number of days ago he would have to read the Quebec legislation concerning controls within the area of jurisdiction being preserved by the government of Quebec before he could inform us whether guidelines would be uniform or would vary from province to province. Has the minister satisfied himself that Quebec is following the same guidelines as the federal guidelines?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Bill No. 64, I think it is, is virtually identical to the federal bill.

While I am on my feet perhaps I could deal with another matter. Yesterday the hon. gentleman asked me about the budgetary deficit. I responded with regard to the figure concerning cash requirement and perhaps I could correct my answer. The figure of between five and six billion dollars represents the government's cash requirement and not the budgetary side alone.

Mr. Stanfield: Now, Mr. Speaker, in which direction do I go?

An hon. Member: Hang in there, Bob!

Mr. Stanfield: I will deal with the deficit later in the question period. The minister has not answered my original question. I was not asking whether the terms of the legislation are the same. I was asking whether the guidelines with regard to salary increases, for example, are the same as the federal guidelines. I would like a specific answer to that question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): At this point all we have before us is the Quebec bill, just as we have before us Bill C-73. Quebec has, of course, chosen to set up its own administration in this regard. I have no reason to believe that, having adopted almost a mirror image of the federal legislation, Quebec will not be making every effort in the application of that legislation to follow the same principles as we are following.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POSITION OF EACH PROVINCE ON GUIDELINES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not surprised that the minister tried to create a diversion, but I am surprised that he cannot tell this House even at this date, many weeks after the announcement of the government's program, about the position of the provinces.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will be able to assure the committee before the anti-inflation bill is reported out of committee what is the position of each of the ten provinces, or those that are coming into the program and allowing the federal government to administer it totally. In the case of a province such as Quebec, which is preserving its own jurisdiction, can the minister tell the committee precisely what guidelines the province of Quebec, or a province taking a similar position, will be following? It seems to me that both the committee and the House are entitled to have this information before the government proceeds.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. gentleman will not try to misrepresent the situation. We have put before the House a legislative proposal which enables the provinces to make a choice whether they come in or stay out. Some provinces have made that choice and made their announcements. It would not be our intention to make their announcements for them. Those provincial governments will have to indicate what their position will be, and presumably they will want to indicate it to their legislatures.

As to whether a province will come forward and announce this by the time—I hope a matter of a very few weeks—the bill receives royal assent, I cannot be sure. I cannot be sure if the remaining provinces will take a position and announce it. I think it would be desirable for themselves and for the program to do so but, after all, that is a matter of provincial decision making. We have gone back to them with this option. We have provided them with the full background. We hope they will soon make that decision.

As to the guidelines that a particular province will follow, we have had the assurance from Quebec that they will be closely paralleling the federal program. I invite the hon. gentleman to examine Bill 64 and to compare it with Bill C-73. Inevitably this will happen where a separate tribunal considers these matters, but the application will have to be decided by the tribunal to be created in Quebec in accordance with the judgment of those involved. I cannot give the hon. member the assurance that everything that the Quebec tribunal does will be exactly identical to what the federal tribunal will do. I think that surely speaks for itself.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY WHETHER UNION MEMBERSHIP COMPULSORY—REQUEST THAT RIGHTS OF NON-UNION CASUAL EMPLOYEES BE PROTECTED

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It has been brought to my attention that postal union members returning to work are being threatened with expulsion by their union. My question is: Is it compulsory to be a member of the union to work in the post office?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this is not an isolated incident; it has been happening in Vancouver, Moncton, Hamilton and other places. It is not necessary to be a member of a union. If the union suspends a worker, then within the collective agreement there is what is known as the Rand formula, which permits a non-union worker to get all of the benefits of working in the post office, job security and all the rest of it, providing equipment and union dues are deducted and paid over to the union in accordance with the Rand formula.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Alkenbrack: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Postmaster General see that the rights of casual non-union employees are maintained in this dispute?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, this is a little different question concerning casuals who are not members of the union. Casuals were always used to provide service when there was a high volume of mail. This right has not been eroded. Management has maintained that particular right, even though it has spelt out certain situations that limit the use of casuals.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I express satisfaction at the fact that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who underwent very serious surgery yesterday of a cardiac nature, has recovered, and I think I speak for both Houses when I wish him God speed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF CANADA'S CONTINUED PARTICIPATION IN UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I have a question for the government House leader. Will the government agree to an order of reference by this House to the Standing Committee on External Affairs, that the committee immediately begin hearings to review the future prospects of the United Nations and Canada's present and future participation in that organization, in light of the adoption in the United Nations of the despicable resolution which was unanimously condemned by this House in a motion it agreed to earlier this week?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will give this suggestion consideration.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS ON EMISSION STANDARDS APPLICABLE TO SYNCRUDE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment, and it again concerns the Syncrude project. Yesterday in the House in answer to one of my questions the minister said that this problem in respect of emissions is mainly a problem for Alberta, and therefore we do not have national guidelines or standards relating to that specific type of industry. The minister then went on to say that any such activities should themselves fall well within the standards established by the Department of the Environment. I am wondering if the minister would like now to clear up that somewhat lethal fog she left over the House following those questions yesterday?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was speaking of two kinds of standards; the standards relating to emissions in the atmosphere from industrial stacks, and, in the second part of my answer, I was speaking about the standards or government policy, to the effect that any major development or project in which the federal government is involved would have to fall within that policy, which means it would have to be subject to environmental assessment.

VALUE OF TEN-YEAR STUDY OF ENVIRONMENTAL HAZARDS OF SYNCRUDE TO THOSE WORKING ON PROJECT IN 1979

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in addition, when answering the same series of questions, the minister indicated there was a $40 million study into this problem which would take place over a ten-year period. In view of the fact that the Syncrude project will be on-stream in late 1978, and all the predictions are for late 1978, what assurance can the minister give to those who may be suffering health hazards in 1979 that the study which is going to take place over ten years will work ex post facto to help them in terms of the cancer and like problems which might develop?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows a great deal about the health problems which can flow from developments of this sort than I do. Our research and assessment does not allow us to say there is this kind of danger which would be identifiable at this time. We do have concern, though, because we know these developments will have some considerable impact on the environment. That is why, in preparation for that development over a period of several years, and the hon. member certainly knows this development is not going to occur overnight—we have embarked on this very important and comprehensive study of all the impacts on the environment. We are preparing ourselves, getting the data and information we need in order to be in a position to assess the situations as they present themselves.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACTION TO MAKE CLEAR CANADA'S ABHORRENCE OF VIOLENCE BY PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the terrorist act which took place in Zion Square in Jerusalem yesterday, killing seven people and wounding 34, and considering the fact that the Palestine Liberation Organization through its news agency WAFA has officially claimed responsibility for that action in commemoration of the first anniversary of its leader, Yasser Arafat's visit to the United Nations, and his waving of the olive branch, will the minister advise the House what instructions if any were given or are to be given to our ambassador at the United Nations that Canada's abhorrence of terrorism by the PLO be clearly demonstrated, at a time when the PLO is about to be invited by the government of Canada to participate in the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements in Vancouver?

Mr. Hees: That's a very good question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the Canadian government toward terrorist activities is very well known. Like the hon. member, we deplore them and we have protested in most vigorous terms. We have stated Canada's position on many, many occasions, and as to whether it would be appropriate for us to make another protest on this particular occasion, I will take this suggestion under consideration. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, and his position has been confirmed by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, that at the Habitat Conference representatives of observer bodies such as the PLO will be permitted providing they are not terrorists.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED PROHIBITION OF ENTRY INTO CANADA OF MEMBER OF PLO EXECUTIVE TO ATTEND MEETING IN OTTAWA

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the Ottawa public affairs group of the Voice of Women has arranged for a public forum next Monday night at the Ottawa Public Library on the subject of how Zionism is a form of racism, to which meeting has been invited Mr. Shafik Al-Hout, director of the PLO delegation office in Beirut, Lebanon, and vice-chairman of the PLO delegation at the United Nations and a member of the PLO executive, will the minister indicate to the House what steps will be taken by the government to prevent the entry into Canada, for such purposes, of this leader of the terrorist organization, thereby acknowledging that this House's condemnation of the United Nations resolution is not just a matter of words, and thus preventing regrettable retaliation methods which, although not to be encouraged, can be expected?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as indicated by the President of the Privy Council, the policy has been clearly stated and no terrorist will be allowed in.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF HELSINKI AGREEMENT PROVISIONS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his absence, I will put it to his parliamentary secretary.

First, can the minister tell the House why the details of the Helsinki agreement, which has been signed by Canada last August, have not been made public yet, contrary to the provisions of the agreement? Second, when does the minister intend to make this agreement public? Third, what interpretation must be given to the clause recognizing the right of peoples to self-determination?

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I apologize, the Secretary of State for External Affairs intends to table the final document of the agreement of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. I understand that arrangements have been made with Information Canada to make this text also available to the Canadian public.

As for the other part of the question concerning self-determination of the peoples, the concept of equal rights of peoples and the right of peoples to self-determination appears in the final act of this conference, even if it was approved in an European context, and is the same concept which appears in the charter of the United Nations. Consequently, the states which took part in the conference must abide by that principle and always act in accordance with the objective and principle incorporated in the charter of the United Nations as well as by the standards of international law, including those concerning the territorial integrity of the states.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I gladly turn it over to the parliamentary secretary. It concerns the meetings this week of Canadian and Commonwealth Caribbean officials on important trade and aid matters.

In light of our long established special relationship with this area, can the parliamentary secretary advise as to the progress of negotiations and particularly as to the splendid suggestion from the Caribbean representatives that Canadian visitors to their area be allowed to bring back larger quantities of duty-free rum?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Monique Bégin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for his question, and to express our pleasure that members of the delegation, all of whom have met with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, are with us this morning. I can assure my hon. colleague that the consultations with Canada are continuing in—

● (1140)

An hon. Member: A spirited manner.

Miss Bégin: —the usual warm and forthright manner, which is characteristic of the relationship between our countries, and that progress is being made. We are to have a round of other economic consultations in the near future. As to the alleged possible international agreement on rum, I do not have any more details.

TRANSPORT

FERRY SERVICE TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ACTION TO IMPROVE SCHEDULING DURING SUSPENSION OF SECOND SERVICE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a brief question to the Minister of Transport. What action is his department taking to improve and further rationalize the scheduling of the one operating ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during this period when the second service is suspended and when there is a heavy movement of trucks, chiefly due to the transportation of farm products?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will look into that question and see whether I can provide an answer.

COMMUNICATIONS

CABLEVISION—REACTION TO UNITED STATES RULING BORDER STATIONS CAN STOP SENDING TELEVISION SIGNALS TO CANADA

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Communications. What is the immediate reaction of the government to the ruling of the FCC that it is reasonable and feasible for border stations to stop sending television signals into the Canadian area.

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the department has only just received the FCC statement and hopes it can have a few days to investigate and make a response which has been requested by the FCC. I would point out that at the moment the American stations in question are licensed according to their American audience and the revenue available from that audience. Also those stations could not act, for instance, with another United States community close by such as Buffalo or Rochester in the way in which Buffalo now deals with Canada. Over the past 15 or 20 years Canadian stations have lost almost a quarter of a billion dollars in revenue to United States stations. That is the reason the CRTC is as concerned as it is.

Mr. Speaker: One further supplementary.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, is the government making representations to the FCC under conditions of international law about barring the transmission of programs from this particular source.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, it is true, as I said earlier, that the department will want to respond to the FCC. There is also the question, aside from the FCC, of international regulations concerning broadcasting and whether they will be contravened. As well as that the Canadian courts at two levels have upheld the powers of the CRTC to allow commercial deletions.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS AGAINST DEVELOPMENT OF DOMESTIC TRAFFIC BY CP AIR

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In this new-found spirit of competition in the air industry is the minister considering the removal or the expansion of the 25 per cent ruling which curtails development of CP Air traffic in Canada.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there has been no consideration of any specific change of that nature.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence, but since he has left his seat perhaps I might ask it later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON POLITICAL GROUPS IN CANADA WORKING TO OVERTHROW GOVERNMENT OF FOREIGN COUNTRY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that yesterday Jean-Pierre Bourdouxhe, the secretary of the New Democratic Party of Quebec, confirmed that his party is, in his words, raising funds for the Chilean socialists in exile for the purpose of overthrowing the present Chilean government—and I see that the federal NDP approves this as well—could the Acting Prime Minister advise this House whether it is government policy to condone any political group in Canada working for the purpose of bringing down some foreign government and if not what steps is the government taking to bring this irresponsible precedent to an end?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily it would not be government policy to interfere in any way with groups which hold political views. I understand there are some on the other side who are working to bring down this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Our main concern in this regard is to discourage violence and terrorist activities of any kind.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED MISUSE OF MINISTERIAL PERMITS BY CHILEAN REFUGEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Following on my questions of two days ago regarding the misuse of the special ministerial permits issued to and signed by 55 Chilean immigrants admitted to Canada, some of whom are now taking part in international subversive political activities in this country, I should like to ask the minister first, why there were only 55 immigrants compelled to sign these permits when over 3,000 Chileans were admitted to Canada at that time? At the same time could the minister advise this House what steps he is prepared to take to overcome the illegalities as they relate to his department?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the only persons asked to sign those statements were the 55 signees who took refuge in the embassy at Santiago at the time of the coup and were let into Canada on minister's permits. If there is a contravention of the permits in that particular case we would want to look into that but I am not satisfied yet that this has occurred.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED EARLY INTRODUCTION OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the very strong statement issued yesterday by the National Council on Welfare expressing concern for the plight of the poor in Canada in light of the present anti-inflationary program and urging that income and support implementation programs are even more essential given the economic policy the government has announced, can the minister say whether steps are being taken to speed up the introduction of the guaranteed annual income or other programs of income supplementation?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to advise the hon. member that one of the fundamental objectives of the government anti-inflation program at the present time is precisely to assure the underprivileged in our society that their incomes will not be eroded by inflation. One of the real objectives of this program is to assist the underprivileged.

The success of this anti-inflation campaign will certainly have a great impact on the standard of living of the underprivileged. Concerning the program of income support and income supplementation which has been under consideration with the provinces for a few months now, I have just come back from a tour of the provinces in which I met all the ministers responsible for welfare at the provincial level. We are considering a meeting in early 1976 to discuss once again this matter.

I proposed a meeting for the beginning of December but the British Columbia government asked that it be held later.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the National Council on Welfare does not agree that the program is protecting the position of the poor and underprivileged, and in view of the fact that the government has found it possible without consulting the provinces to impose limits on wage increases, can it not also on a national basis raise the levels of incomes of those at the bottom?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is wrong on the two premises, I cannot answer the last part of his question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Have you read the statement?

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING ELIGIBILITY AGE FOR OLD AGE PENSION TO 60—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As a large number of young people are unemployed, which situation may be detrimental to their planning for the future, can the minister tell the House whether he might consider, as a factor towards solving that serious problem, the possibility of reducing to 60 the age of eligibility for the old age security pension for such persons as might wish to retire then?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The studies made of that subject, Mr. Speaker, seem to indicate that such a step would have little impact on the level of unemployment in Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Can the minister inform the House if anyone prepared a survey of the number of persons in the 60-to-65 age bracket and an estimate of what it would cost to pay pensions to these persons, assuming such action were taken?

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member's question is not very clear. If he wants to know whether we made a study on the cost of pensions paid to all persons aged 60 to 65 years, indeed we did and the figures are available. I already submitted them to the House several times.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ACTION TO STRENGTHEN NATO FORCES AND IMPROVE EQUIPMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. As Joseph Luns, secretary general to NATO forces, has added to the growing concern about our commitment to NATO by stating that Canadian equipment is inadequate, can the minister explain how the government intends to strengthen Canada's position in Europe without improving the quality of Canadian equipment? Further, will the minister elaborate on the position he intends to take at the NATO summit meeting in Brussels next month?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that Secretary General Luns has completely underestimated the Canadian contribution to NATO. He is also very well aware that a major policy review is under way, and that many of the questions to which he addressed himself are being answered currently. I will be in Brussels in December presenting the results of this review, and those results will answer all of the points which he has raised, at what I would say is a very inappropriate time.

POSSIBLE REPLACEMENT OF VEHICLES AND EQUIPMENT—DATE OF DECISION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Has the defence review concerned with replacing vehicles and equipment been placed before cabinet, or has the minister been informed by cabinet that no further funds are available to bring Canada's armed forces up to standard? To what extent is the government going to allow our forces to deteriorate before action is taken?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Those questions are before cabinet. There are major proposals for re-equipping the land force, purchasing long-range patrol aircraft and other equipment, and these decisions will be announced in the very near future.

CUSTOMS

RIVERPORT, NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EARLY APPOINTMENT OF OFFICER

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue, and I hope the Minister of State (Fisheries) is also listening because it concerns him as well.

In view of the fact that Riverport, Nova Scotia has been without the services of a resident customs officer since April of this year when the resident officer passed away, and since a fleet of over 20 deepsea fishing boats operate from this port, which require the clearing of bonded lube oil and other bonded stores, will the minister examine this problem and give consideration immediately to appointing a customs officer in this port in order adequately to service the deepsea fishing industry operating in this area?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into this matter. I thank the hon. member for bringing it to my attention, and I will discuss it with my officials as early as this afternoon.

FLOODS

SAINT JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID FOR VICTIMS

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment, and if I am allowed, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the flood situation in the Glen Falls area of Saint John, New Brunswick, what can the minister tell me about available aid for the flood victims?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if there is an emergency in that area, the province of New Brunswick may take the initiative to ask for help from the Department of National Defence, but it is up to that province to take such an initiative.

As to possible compensation for property damages, of course there is a program financed by the Department of the Environment ranging from 50 to 75 per cent of the costs, but there again the province must apply.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ASSISTANCE OF ARMED FORCES IN COMBATING FLOOD CONDITIONS AT SAINT JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John-Lancaster): My supplementary question is to the Minister of National Defence. Has the province of New Brunswick requested assistance from the Department of National Defence to combat the flood conditions in Saint John, New Brunswick?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received any request for assistance from the government of New Brunswick, but the armed forces will be ready to assist if they are required.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF BUDGETARY DEFICIT FOR CURRENT YEAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Finance now answer the question I asked him a couple of days ago with regard to whether he would tell us the estimated size of the budgetary deficit for the current year? I am sure the minister has this information. I have enough respect for him to believe he has this information, and I hope that I will have further respect when he gives it.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the current estimates are that the budgetary deficit for the fiscal year will be as set out by my predecessor at the time of the June budget. As an addendum to my response to an earlier question on another subject, the response yesterday of $5 billion to $6 billion was related to the cash requirements of the government, that is, both budgetary and non-budgetary.

BROADCASTING

PORTRAYAL OF VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications. I should like to commend him on the manner in which he has been handling questions in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I hope he will soon be the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In view of the statement made by the Solicitor General in a speech in Ottawa on Wednesday that his department had concluded a two year study and found a relationship between crimes of violence and violence on television, what response can we expect from the CRTC? Has there been consultation between the Solicitor General's Department, the CRTC and the Department of Communications on this very important and disturbing subject?

Mr. Jim Fleming (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I do not have full knowledge or an answer available for the hon. member at the moment, but I will obtain it. The hon. member certainly knows that I share with him a very real concern about this problem, as do hon. members on both sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

URBAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST CENTRAL MORTGAGE NOT BUY ASHBURN GOLF COURSE IN HALIFAX

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, whom none of us would wish to see become an urban vandal. Would he advise Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that it should not try to solve its need for land by attempting to buy such green land in Halifax as the Ashburn Golf Course, one of the aspects which makes my city one of the best in Canada in which to live?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that his city is one of the best in which to live. I do not know what the handicap is on the golf course—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: —but I shall look into it.

HEALTH

ALLEGED HARMFUL EFFECT OF ARTIFICIAL COLOURING AND FLAVOURING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that information has been brought to his attention about a possible problem with artificial colouring and flavouring of food, I wonder whether he could inform the House what action he has taken in the past few weeks to initiate purely Canadian research into this subject within our own country.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to the hon. member a few months ago about this matter. My department is studying all the literature on the subject, and particularly this problem, which is very complex and technically difficult. We are in regular contact with other countries, particularly the United States, where studies are in progress on the subject.

I must report to the hon. member that up to this stage there appears to be no scientific evidence on which we could act in support of the thesis he has been promoting.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF NATIONALIZATION OF POTASH INDUSTRY BY SASKATCHEWAN ON BORROWING POSITION OF CANADA—PAYMENT OF FEDERAL CORPORATION TAX BY PROVINCIAL CROWN COMPANY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the intention of the government of Saskatchewan to nationalize the potash industry, and in view of the fact that this will cost anywhere from $1 billion to $3 billion, much of which must be raised outside Canada, has the minister made any assessment of what this will do to the borrowing position of Canada? Further, will a provincial Crown corporation exploiting potash not be required to pay federal corporate tax?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that any substantial additional financing for any purpose in Canada, not generally contemplated at the beginning of the fiscal year, is going to have some impact on the ability of other Canadian governments and institutions to borrow abroad. I cannot advise the hon. member of the exact impact at this moment. He raises a very good point on the question of taxation of Crown corporations and that will have to be examined very closely in the context of the proposal.

WINTER CAPITAL PROJECTS—POSSIBILITY OF NEW PROGRAM

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister planning to introduce a scheme similar to the winter capital projects fund which ended in June of this year and which provided for a loan with a forgiveness feature?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Not at this moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion amongst House leaders in relation to a bill which appears on the notice paper in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), entitled "An act to increase the rate of return on government annuity contracts to increase their flexibility and discontinue future sales thereof". I believe there is a willingness on the part of House leaders and, I hope, of the House that the ordinary notice could be shortened in this particular respect so that the bill could be read for the first time today. I would ask whether that suggestion might be acceptable.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, when approached in the right spirit, we can be very co-operative.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That goes for all of us.

FBDB LOAN TO MOUNT BEECHER SKI SOCIETY

Question No. 3,137—Mr. Brisco:

1. Did the Industrial Development Bank provide a loan for the Mount Beecher Ski Society on Vancouver Island and, if so, under what terms?

2. Was this loan made to a limited company fronting for or representing the Mount Beecher Ski Society?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is the policy of the Federal Business Development Bank as it was the policy of its predecessor, the Industrial Development Bank, to not make public the identity of individual customers and applicants.

TREE NURSERY AT INDIAN HEAD, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 3,147—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. With regard to the tree nursery at Indian Head, Saskatchewan, did the government make a contribution to this operation and, if so, in what amount for (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 (d) first 6 months of 1975?

2. What was the income from this operation for the same years and what was the source?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: 1. Contributions of the federal government toward operational costs (Operations and Maintenance plus Capital) of the Indian Head Tree Nursery are as follows:

Fiscal Year	Cost
1971-72	$802,100
1972-73	685,100
1973-74	750,600
1974-75	837,000
1975-76 (6 months)	484,300

2. There is no income from this operation. The federal government funds the total operation of the Indian Head Tree Nursery. Recipients of the trees pay only the shipping costs for distribution. This operation is the responsibility of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

DETAILS OF BUDGETARY REDUCTION MENTIONED IN PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD SPEECH IN HOUSE

Question No. 3,170—Mr. Reynolds:

1. With reference to the President of the Treasury Board's speech in the House on July 2, 1975, what are the details of the budgetary reduction of (a) $13 million for the Department of the Environment (b) $5 million for the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs (c) $18 million for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (d) $4 million for the Department of the Solicitor General (e) $4 million for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (f) $6 million for the National Harbours Board?

2. Will the Minister advise what are the miscellaneous items totalling $41 million as stated in his speech of July 2, 1975?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Ministers were given discretion to choose alternatives as long as they maintained the same total. The items are now expected to be as follows: 1 (a) $13 million for the Department of Environment: Salmon enhancement program, $4.0 million; Additional resources for fleet operations, $3.4 million; Ocean policy implementation, $2.0 million; Public service staffing delegation, $1.1 million; Flood mapping, $1.0 million; Development of pollution abatement technology, 1.0 million; Acquaculture—fish farming, .5 million. (b) $5 million for the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs: Urban demonstration projects, $4.0 million; Reduction in operating expenditures, $1.0 million. (c) $18 million for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: Neighbourhood improvement and residential rehabilitation program,

$6 million; Housing research and community planning, $2 million; Granville Island, $2 million; Corporation Capital projects, $8 million. (d) $4 million for the Department of the Solicitor General: Staffing for two medium security institutions, $4 million. How many firms in Nova Scotia had loans guaranteed by DREE from April 1, 1973 to September 30, 1975 (a) what was the total amount of the guarantees (b) how many of the firms are not currently operating (c) what was the total amount of guarantees to the firms not currently operating?

Order Paper Questions

INCOME TAX RETURNS

Question No. 3,211—Mr. Howie:

1. How many persons filed income tax returns for each taxation year (a) 1968 (b) 1970 (c) 1972 (d) 1974 in (i) New Brunswick (ii) Nova Scotia (iii) Prince Edward Island (iv) Newfoundland (v) Quebec?

2. What was the average per capita taxable income in (a) New Brunswick (b) Nova Scotia (c) Prince Edward Island (d) Newfoundland (e) Quebec, each year (i) 1968 (ii) 1970 (iii) 1972 (iv) 1974?

Hon. Jack Cullen (Minister of National Revenue): The answer to both parts of this question may be found in the annual publication "Taxation Statistics". The total number of returns filed for the five requested provinces for 1968, 1970 and 1972 is contained in table 5 of each of the editions 1970, 1972 and 1974 respectively of this publication. The average per capita taxable income of these provinces for the required years may also be determined from table 5 of those three editions. The statistics may be calculated by dividing the total taxable income reported on all returns by the total number of all returns. Since 1974 data is not tabulated until all returns are filed, the information requested pertaining to 1974 is not available at the present time.

FIRE EXTINGUISHING FOAM

Question No. 3,243—Mr. Reynolds:

1. What are the peculiar characteristics of the liquid concentrate fire extinguishing foam that is purchased from Laurentian Concentrates Limited, Ottawa, Ontario, that make its costs justified?

2. Are there facsimilies available?

3. Has there been any effort to interest other companies to tender on this "qualified product" and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The liquid concentrate fire extinguishing foam purchased from Laurentian Concentrates is a concentrated homogeneous colloidal suspension of hydralyzed protein foam stabilizers and metallic salts with sufficient preservations to prevent decomposition of the foam while in storage. The liquid produces a heavy blanket of foam which lasts for several minutes (over 15) to permit safe rescue operations. The item has been classed as a "strategic" product and is manufactured in accordance with Specification CGSB28-GP-28.

2. Facsimilies are not available from any other Canadian manufacturer and in view of the "strategic" classification assigned, "off shore" supply is not considered.

3. The committee responsible for the preparation of the governing Specification CGSB28-GP-28 involved participants from the associated industry including, in addition to Laurentian Concentrates, representatives from Penwalt Chemicals of Canada, Ansul International of Canada, Fyr-Fyter Company of Canada, Levitt-Safety Limited, Pyrene Manufacturing Company and 3M Company. These firms have always had an awareness of the continuing requirement for the foam in question and of our objective to have additional manufacturing resources established in Canada. However, we have yet to have any firm submit samples for "qualification testing" or to explore the feasibility of setting up an operation for the production of this type of fire extinguishant.

Order Paper Questions

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—DISTRIBUTION OF BRIEF CASES AND PORTFOLIOS

Question No. 3,247—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Do the Department of Supply and Services Regional Supply Centres stock and distribute brief cases and portfolios that in turn are supplied to departments?

2. Are the brief cases supplied free of charge to employees and, if so, what is the annual cost to the government?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes.

2. Distribution is made against customer department's requisition and at an established price per unit. It is the general practice for departments in turn to make these brief cases and portfolios available to their employees requiring them on an accountable loan basis, or for use as and when required by the nature of their duties. The annual cost of reprovisioning brief cases and portfolios is approximately $150,000.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—RENOVATION AND REFURBISHING OF OFFICES

Question No. 3,279—Mr. Coates:

Has the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce recently selected a person whose main responsibility will be the renovation and refurbishing of offices within the Department and, if so, what is the (a) name (b) classification (c) annual salary of the person?

Mr. Marcel Roy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. Yes, main responsibilities are: (i) To advise on the planning and layout of offices and work areas in various branches of the department commensurate with maximum operating efficiency. (ii) To sketch, prepare plans and present colour schematics. (iii) To research and select furniture and furnishings available and prepare cost summaries for office accommodation. (a) Miss Louise McLaren. (b) Equivalent to GT 2. (c) Six month contract at the rate of $1,000 per month.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Do the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Crouse: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Again I must bring to the attention of the House the fact that on June 20 I placed question No. 2,833 on the order paper, asking what consultants had been hired in the fisheries and marine service of the Department of the Environment in the last two years, their names, salaries, duties, length of employment, and whether public tenders were called before they were hired. It does not seem an impossible question to answer, and I wonder why the government has taken this long to secure an answer.

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I can indicate to the hon. member that his question is being revised and the answer will be forthcoming in a short time.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO COMBAT INFLATION

On the order: Business of Supply—First votable motion for the supply period ending December 10, 1975.

November 13, 1975—That this House rejects the government's anti-inflationary program because it is totally unworkable in terms of controlling prices, because it provides no effective control over profits or professional incomes, and because it is completely unfair to wage and salary earners in Canada—Mr. Broadbent.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the motion, I note that at least to this point no point of order has been raised about it. The use of the allotted day, as we know it now, is of quite recent duration. To my knowledge, it is not, therefore, the subject of any precedents concerning the motion put forward on an allotted day in so far as it may conflict with the usual business of the House or relate to it. There are precedents, of course, that no motion ought to be put before the House which anticipates other business before the House; as well, that the House ought not to pronounce itself on any question upon which it has already pronounced itself.

There was obvious reference to this program in Bill C-73 which has just received second reading and is before the standing committee. That would raise some question, I am sure, as to whether or not, in voting on second reading of that bill, the House has already pronounced itself on the question. There is, of course, the counter-argument that this motion is of broader scope than that particular bill. That may be so. In addition, there is the reverse of that proposition, that when the House pronounces itself on this motion at the end of today, or at 9.45 p.m. Monday evening when the vote takes place, the question may then come up as to whether or not the House, having pronounced itself in that fashion, is precluded from taking any other kind of vote in respect of Bill C-73. That becomes an even more interesting question if one reflects that this motion is broader in scope than the bill.

The fact is that the opposition prerogative, as I think all hon. members would agree, is very broad in the use of the allotted day and ought not to be interfered with. It certainly is not the disposition of the Chair to interfere with it except on the clearest and most certain procedural grounds. I feel it only fair to indicate that the closeness and similarity of the subject matter of this motion and the bill require a caveat from the Chair that under no circumstances could the consideration of this motion or the vote upon this motion at 9.45 p.m. Monday evening be taken in any way to prejudice the progress of Bill C-73.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved:

That this House rejects the government's anti-inflationary program because it is totally unworkable in terms of controlling prices, because it provides no effective control over profits or professional incomes, and because it is completely unfair to wage and salary earners in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for your highly impartial and, if I do not sound presumptuous, reasonable ruling on the legitimacy of the motion. At the outset I want to say, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, that the problem of inflation is unquestionably the major concern of the vast majority of Canadians at this time. It is the scourge of virtually every Canadian family. The majority of wage and salary earners who are not in the trade union movement are negatively affected by it. Those men, women and young people who are in the trade union movement are affected by it. Pensioners and all those who are dependent on savings are affected by the current, unacceptable high level of inflation.

Above all, the 20 per cent of our population who find themselves among the poor, whether they are trade unionists or not, pensioners or not, are seriously affected by inflation. It is, I repeat, a scourge affecting our whole population. This causes people to move from adequate, but not luxurious, accommodation into poor and substandard accommodation. It causes those who are already living on poor diets to switch to diets that are, quite literally, dangerous to their health. It causes families to give up plans for the most modest of vacations. It will cause, in the coming winter months, countless ordinary working families to abandon any hope of equipping their youngsters to play on minor hockey teams. It hits as directly and as movingly as that. It is something for which the present government is responsible at least in the sense of not taking steps in recent months to reduce it substantially if not eliminate it entirely.

● (1210)

The effects of inflation are not vague; they are specific. They affect countries differently. In 1975 the rate of inflation is different in different countries. Some industrial countries, which I will not take time to list, have coped with inflation much better than this country has under this government. In our view, it is crucial to understand where inflation is affecting us, as the wrong diagnosis of our problems may result in the wrong prescription being administered for their cure. We must consider the over-all effects of inflation. Understanding the typical family's spending pattern is also crucial, because it does not matter one whit if Cadillacs, for example, cost 300 per cent, 400 per cent or 500 per cent more if the average family is not in the market for a Cadillac.

If we consider where price increases are taking place and look carefully at the typical family's spending pattern, we must conclude, as the NDP has, that the principal areas of concern of Canadians are food, shelter and energy costs which account for about 65 per cent of the typical family's spending. The evidence shows that prices in recent years have risen disproportionately for food, shelter and energy. If we are to cure inflation as it affects Canadians we must concentrate on bringing prices down in these specific areas. That, precisely, is what the government failed to do before Thanksgiving, and it is precisely what its program announced that day will fail to provide for Canadians in the future. Nothing in the government's anti-inflation program, nothing in the most recent budget and budget bills will ease the burden or bring down one whit the cost of living in the areas I have mentioned. On the contrary, the increased excise tax on oil has meant a higher price for oil, whether in the form of gasoline for our cars, energy for heating our homes, or oil for our factories.

The failure to control interest rates and increase the supply of housing has led to increased rents and higher priced housing for Canadians. The failure to give the Food Prices Review Board authority to order the rollback of unjustified price increases has contributed to the increase in food prices. The failure to give the Anti-Inflation Board proper authority to order rollbacks on the spot of unjustified price increases will contribute to increased food prices in future. Surely these are the crucial questions, the decisive questions. The government knows where inflation has occurred and where it ought to act, but it has failed totally to take appropriate action for dealing with inflation.

I suggest the government has failed because decisive action in the areas I have mentioned would bring it into direct confrontation with three sectors of our economy dominated by a handful of corporate giants. In order to deal with energy prices, the Liberal government would have had to confront the multinational oil companies. In order to allocate investment to housing and bring down mortgage rates, the Liberals would have needed to confront the banks and trust companies. In order to regulate food prices in Canada, the Liberals would have been forced to confront the few food chains which control the grocery business in 75 per cent of the markets in Canada.

Of course, the Liberals do not confront corporations. On the contrary, they set up royal commissions whose purpose is to give corporations a thorough application of whitewash. The most recent royal commission appointed by the Liberal government, after concern expressed by this party last spring, is a prime example. That royal commission will not look into one substantial question or problem arising from corporate power or the concentration of such power in Canada. The answers given to the submission our party presented at the recent hearing in Ottawa made that abundantly clear. The government has not acted decisively in specific areas where inflation is of concern to Canadians because decisive action would have required it to confront key corporations in key sectors, and the Liberal party never does that.

What is our approach to this question? I notice the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) listening to what I am saying. I hope I can influence him to support our motion. I was interested to hear him speak on the government's anti-inflation bill. His party supported the bill. Yet after hearing Conservative spokesmen address the nation on the television program "The Nation's Business", I am under the impression they are preparing the ground for opposition to the government's anti-inflation program at third reading. Some parties have tried to face both ways in the past. I hope this will not be the case with the Conservative party. I have the highest respect for its leader and hope that in today's debate his party will make known its solid opposition to the sham program the government has put forward.

What, specifically, does the NDP recommend in the three areas mentioned? First, let us consider housing. We said as far back as the 1968 election campaign that a housing crisis was upon us in Canada and would continue. We said that the post-war baby boom is now exerting pressure on the housing market, and the increasing organization of Canada is creating more demand for houses. The government has known this for years. It knew there would be increased pressure on housing but failed to take corrective action even in 1968. It failed again last week when the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) announced his program which will do little more than tinker with existing legislation.

The government ought to introduce a comprehensive program which would include among its provisions rent controls. We need rent controls because the government in the past has failed to increase the supply of housing. That is the first step. Fortunately, rent controls are to be embodied in the legislation the government recently brought forward. We hope the provinces will follow the lead of British Columbia and establish good rent control legislation across Canada.

We concede that rent controls are a short-term solution, because unless housing supplies are significantly increased during the next few months the lifting of rent controls will result in a great mushrooming upward of rents. We say that it is absolutely essential to increase the supply of housing and we need many more than the paltry 20,000 units for which the government provided in last week's announcement. In our view, such a program can only be carried out if the Bank Act is changed to make it mandatory for banks to invest a certain percentage of their annual investment in low-cost housing. That must be done because the banks will not do it voluntarily.

● (1220)

Second, we must bring down interest rates. Mortgage interest rates must be separated from other interest rates. Again, the only way that can be done is for the government, through the Bank Act, to make changes, making it mandatory that banks and other financial institutions bring down mortgage rates to a substantially lower level. To rely on both of these points, either in terms of investment in housing or dealing with interest rates by voluntary co-operation of the banks, as the minister responsible for housing is doing, is to delude himself and the public. That has to stop. We need decisive action.

Third, we need action to deal with land speculation. Today, in the question period, I brought to the attention of the House a report done by Mr. Lorrimer of the city of Toronto which indicated that upward of 24 per cent of the price of a housing unit in the city of Toronto is due to profits in land speculation. Decisive action by the national government to deal with the question of land speculation is long overdue.

There are some basic steps that should be taken to bring down the cost of living, whether it is in the purchase of a condominium, co-operative housing, single family unit, town house or rental. If we do not take these steps, the rent control aspect, which is the only thing of short-run significance that the government has announced, will have no effect in the long run. The housing crisis which began at least as far back as 1968 will be with us until 1988.

On the question of energy, hon. members will recall that during the minority government, the NDP opposed the idea that we should move toward world prices for oil in this country. We opposed that idea then, and we oppose it now. The Liberal government was in favour of it then. We held them back somewhat in the days of the minority government. They now have a majority. They now have a public commitment to move toward world oil prices. We think it is both absurd and unfair to charge Canadians world prices for our own natural resources.

In terms of that resource sector, we believe it should be taken out of private control, private ownership, foreign control and foreign ownership and made a public enterprise. It is time to move in a decisive way in the resource sector with public capital so that we can make sure these resources are used for the benefit of the people of Canada, not to maximize the profits of multinational oil corporations.

This is not simply an ideological or philosophical commitment, although that is there as well. We say that the result of this would be concrete and immediate price benefits for Canadians. We could control the prices. We could hold the price of oil down for the average Canadian to drive his or her automobile. We could hold it down for the average family which has to pay energy costs for heating the home. We could hold it down for Canadian industry. This would put industry, and not only in central Canada, on a more competitive basis with industry elsewhere in the world. There is no reason why we should not be using our natural resources to put Canadian industry on a much more competitive basis. It is our view that the only way we can integrate all these social objectives, and particularly in this context the objective of reducing the cost to consumers, is to get effective public control of this sector of our economy.

The third basic concern of Canadian families is the matter of food. What do we recommend there? We say that the price gouging which exists in the food industry has got to be stopped. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) gave some examples recently of what seems on the surface to be blatant price gouging or unjustified price increases in the Nickel Belt area. I am sure that similar patterns of price behaviour could have been picked up in every community from St. John's in the east to Vancouver in the west.

Mr. Leggatt: No, not in Vancouver.

Mr. Broadbent: The hon. member correctly implies that because of the price freeze in Vancouver, that would not occur. We will exempt that part of the country. I will refer to some of the items and ask hon. members to think of their significance. Over a six-day period from October 27 to November 3 the price of a ten-ounce jar of Nescafé increased from $2.53 to $2.89, a 15 per cent increase. A tin of Habitant pea soup increased from 71 cents to 91 cents, a 30 per cent increase in less than a week. A box of baby Pablum increased from 56 cents to 63 cents, a 12 per cent increase. A tin of sockeye salmon increased from 33 cents to 37 cents, an increase of 12 per cent in less than a week. I could list another 12 to 15 items but I shall not take the time of the House to do that.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I know that Liberals do not like facts. Nothing disturbs a Liberal more than a fact. I do not want to upset that Liberal in the back row, so I will not give any more facts. The point is that the five items I have just listed were selected from a list that is much longer, all of which had price increases in the same percentage range, anywhere from 10 per cent to 30 per cent over the period of one week. What I and my party say is that we need a Prices Review Board with authority to investigate price increases of this kind and to order immediate rollbacks. Certainly, for the items I have listed there can be no justification for that kind of price increase.

Second, in the area of food the NDP had a central message in the recent Ontario election campaign as well as in Premier Barrett's campaign in British Columbia. It is that we stop prime agricultural land in Canada from going out of agricultural production and being used for other purposes. If you take prime agricultural land out of production, the inevitable consequence will be increased food costs. Third, we advocate an extension of the marketing board principle to other aspects of agricultural production than those currently covered. There have been some short-run problems with marketing boards; no one will deny that. However, in the long run orderly marketing is the best principle for farmers; it guarantees them reasonable prices over a period of time. This benefits the consumer in urban Canada as well. Those are specific suggestions with regard to food costs, none of which in detail or in principle has been implemented by this government. It could have been done in the past. It should be done now.

Quite apart from these specific proposals regarding food, housing and energy which we believe would be effective, if implemented now, in bringing down the cost of living very significantly in the months ahead, the government should recognize that in a good part of the Canadian economy there is no competition. Not only in the Canadian economy but in the American economy and that of western Europe it has been recognized for some time that the history of capitalist economic development has led to many sectors of each nation's economy being dominated by a handful of firms which do not compete. No serious economist would question that judgment today. What has the government done? In typical Liberal fashion, it has taken what I think is a good NDP idea, one which has been advocated for years—which is that in key sectors of the economy where there is no competition, there should be a price freeze and that any subsequent price increase would have to be justified by the corporations concerned—and turned it on its head.

● (1230)

The proposal which this party put forward would recognize economic reality. But that kind of thing is precisely what the Liberals have failed to do. They have taken what is basically a good idea, if I may say so without immodesty, and turned it upside down. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) has selected the 1,500 corporations, but instead of requiring them to justify future price increases he has said to them; "You can continue to increase your prices and we shall place the onus of responsibility for investigating those increases on the public." In other words, the government proposes to set up elaborate and detailed, costly machinery for investigating price increases after those increases have taken place.

If the government had come forward with a selective freeze in non-competitive areas and required the corporations to justify any increases, it would have been a lot more simple and a lot more effective in dealing with inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: As a final item in our approach to inflation, we would have been much more ruthless in that we would have acted with much more toughness in reviewing the work of government departments and cutting out specific programs. When the white paper was brought down there was an indication that the government was expecting all departments to cut back. We reject such an approach. As a party, we say there are some programs which should not be cut. On the other hand, there are some programs which are no good and should be totally eliminated. I shall not repeat the speech I made in the House just over a week ago in which I outlined, on behalf of this party, specific programs which we felt should be cut out entirely. It is time the government took a determined approach to some of its programs and cut out those which ought to be dispensed with. On the other hand, the nature of a number of programs is such that spending on them should be increased rather than decreased.

So much for our program. Very briefly, we reject the government's proposals, first because they do not deal directly and positively with reducing the cost of living in the areas of energy, housing and food, second because of the over-all approach to inflation is unfair and unworkable. The wage and salary control mechanism advocated by the government will no doubt be effecti ve in holding down wage and salary increases to the guidelines levels. It will not be effective, and the government knows it, in ensuring that the 65 per cent of Canadians who are not in the trade union movement will get even the raises to which they are entitled in the government's view. The poor worker, the non-unionized worker has absolutely no hope of getting even the minimum the government says he is entitled to.

Then, again, in terms of professional incomes the government's proposal is a hoax. If the minister wants to control professional incomes, the only way to do it is to apply a 100 per cent surtax, as he must know from experience. That is the only way in which he could build equity into the system, yet it is precisely this step the government has refused to take. On the prices side, I will simply repeat the point which I and members of my party have made in the past. The indirect method of control advocated by the government will not work; it is too complex, and chartered accountants acquired by the corporations can do a lot of shifty work even in a legal context to make it difficult to isolate profits. As if this did not provide a sufficiently large avenue of escape for corporations, the government took pains to list in the white paper a number of loopholes the use of which would exempt corporations from the guidelines entirely. For example, any corporation which shows unusual productivity gains is exempt; any corporation which enjoys what it considers to be a favourable cost development, one which it did not anticipate, is exempt from the guidelines; any corporation which reinvests its profits in capital expansion is exempt.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not the case.

Mr. Broadbent: I should have said "for export purposes"—any corporation which devotes profits from capital investment for export purposes.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, sir.

Mr. Broadbent: Well, the hon. gentleman may take up that point when he speaks. That is what another minister said.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Broadbent: I wonder if I might have permission to continue for a few more minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): That can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I shall try not to abuse the courtesy of my colleagues. In short, we believe the price control mechanism selected by the government will not be effective in any way in terms of holding down prices. Thus, what we have in the government's package is a program which will be effective in holding down increases received by average wage earners. It will not be effective in controlling professional incomes, and it does nothing at all in terms of controlling price increases. In short, it is an unfair and unworkable program and it is one which completely ignores the positive approach to reducing the cost of housing, the cost of food and the cost of energy. We think the analysis is wrong and that the detail is wrong. It will not deal with inflation, and it is a program which the New Democratic Party cannot support in any circumstances.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have only 20 minutes allotted to me under the rules so I shall have to speak even faster than usual.

An hon. Member: At least you have a sense of humour.

Mr. Stanfield: There are clearly many difficulties attached to the government's so-called anti-inflation program as presented so far to the House and to the country. It is undoubtedly weak on the side of the control of prices. The program as announced thus far has clearly carried very little conviction among the general public, and there is little confidence among the public so far that prices will be effectively controlled. There is also enormous confusion about many aspects of the program. That is not surprising, I suppose, because the government stumbled into the program a week or so after the head of the government declared that he would not touch anything like this with a ten-foot pole.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

I want to be fair to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) and recognize that in terms of the confusion which exists, he has had very little time in office as the responsible minister to engage in the kind of consultations with provincial governments and representatives of the various sectors of the economy that I am sure he would have liked had he had time before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that the program was in effect. I want to recognize his new, statesmanlike attitude and take a very statesmanlike attitude toward him this morning.

Obviously, the government was ill-prepared. As I say, there was no effective consultation with representatives of industry or labour about the program. We see the confusion regarding the provincial picture. Even now, several weeks after the program was announced, the minister does not know, for example, whether the province of Quebec will be following, within its own public sector where it has retained jurisdiction, the same guidelines as the federal government. It does not take very much imagination to recognize that if, for example, school teachers and public officials in Quebec proceed on different guidelines from those in place for the rest of the country, this will not exactly create contentment across our nation. Obviously, this is a matter that should be cleared up before the House is asked to take further decisions regarding the program.

The triumvirate that is supposed to administer the Anti-Inflation Board comprises Mr. Pepin, Mrs. Plumptre, and the other choice has not yet been made. I understand from what I hear, even with the mail shutdown, that it is virtually impossible for people seeking answers to questions to get those answers because of the confusion that has been created. On examining the complex apparatus that has been erected, this board and its administrators, I can only conclude that even Rube Goldberg at his best could not have designed a structure or a system as complicated and unwieldy as this. I am under the impression that the government is something like a thief who steals a box containing all the parts of a very complicated piece of machinery but is unable to put the pieces together to make the machine work.

With regard to control of professional incomes, I say to the minister—he must recognize this for himself—that the control mechanism he has announced to date is not convincing to the general public. As to salaried personnel, workers organized and unorganized, the disparities and inequities clearly are enormous. In any program of controls on income there are bound to be some inequities, but these inequities will be enormous in view of the rate of inflation, the different situations in which various groups in the country find themselves as a result of the rapid rate of inflation that we have had in the past year and a half.

Any program controlling incomes or inflation will of necessity involve very rough justice. The justice is bound to be very rough in a situation where the government has allowed everything to run wild for a long time and then attempts to introduce some order. I understand in my home city of Halifax last night the Prime Minister said people recognized that the economy was out of control. The Prime Minister seemed to say this with approval. However, we must ensure that justice is as even-handed as we can possibly make it. In saying that, we have to recognize that justice without controls has been very, very rough for a great many people in this period of rapid inflation that has been continuing.

Secondly, we have to recognize that a program of controls to bring some order to the present situation and to reduce the inequities that exist today will involve some injustice which will have to be accepted if the rate of inflation is to be brought under control. The fact that there is inevitably a good deal of rough justice involved for the Canadian people, particularly for the working people of this country—especially in a period of rapid inflation such as we have had—is one very important reason why the period of controls should not be too long. It is one thing to ask Canadians to accept controls for a year and a half; it is a very different thing to ask Canadians to accept a program of controls designed to last for 3¼ years, or perhaps a good deal longer since they can be extended on the basis of a three-day debate in this House, which of course amounts to nothing in the way of safeguards with a majority government.

Further, it is one thing to use controls on prices and incomes for, say, a period of a year and a half to try to restore order in the economy, to break the inflationary psychology, and to give time to put in place other more flexible tools to fight inflation on a longer term. But it is a very different thing to resort to controls on prices and incomes for virtually an open-ended period of time with a view to gradually bringing down the rate of inflation.

I say to you, Madam Speaker, very solemnly that there is no reason to believe that the concept of relatively long-term controls will work. There is every reason to believe, based on experience in our own country and elsewhere, that they will not work, that after a year and a half or so the controls will become more and more artificial and more and more out of touch with the underlying economic reality in the country. In addition, there is every reason to believe that controls in place for years—which is what the government is proposing—will result in more and more centralization of economic power here in Ottawa. I wonder why some of my friends in the New Democratic Party are not tempted to support the program, because what is likely to happen is that the program will result in a highly centralized economy with the main economic decisions being made by a few officials and a few ministers here in Ottawa. If such a program is in place for three to four years or longer, the trend toward centralization might well become irreversible. I am utterly opposed to controls for the period envisaged thus far by the government, and I hope it can be persuaded to adopt a more sensible period.

As I say, this longer term concept will not work. I am not prepared to delegate all that power to any government for an undetermined period of time; and this really is an undetermined period of time because the period can be extended beyond the 3¼ years very easily by the government. Furthermore, I say that this government, with its record, is not entitled to trust or to any benefit of the doubt in respect of its purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: There are many faults in the program as introduced. Let us consider the freezing of dividends. Why is there a freeze of dividends? That is obviously unfair to a good many people.

An hon. Member: What about the corporate citizen?

Mr. Stanfield: My friend asks about the corporate citizen. This is not going to worry the corporate citizen much because he does not depend on dividends. It is obviously very unfair to many retired people who need the income from the few shares they own.

An hon. Member: One-quarter of 1 per cent?

Mr. Stanfield: Apparently, it does not matter that this hurts only a few people or a small proportion. Apparently, we should kick them around as much as we like. I am not attacking my hon. friend; I am asking the minister what is the sense of doing this. Why not provide some guidelines in respect of dividends that are relatively fair and compatible with the rest of the program? Why should we have a freeze on dividends? Is this sort of gimmick an attempt to persuade the workingman that the government is trying to kick other people around? I think the actual freezing of dividends, as opposed to the establishment of sensible guidelines in relation to dividends, is stupid for umpteen reasons.

I do not want to carry on for too long, and I cannot; but I must say that I am by no means ready to continue to support the government's anti-inflation program. I do not demand perfection, as I have indicated, least of all from this government. I recognize, also, the urgency for definitive action being taken to curb the rampant inflation existing in this country today which is doing so much injustice to so many people. But I will not support the bringing into operation of a bad program. By a "bad program" in these circumstances, I mean one which is not only imperfect—and I expect any program to be somewhat imperfect—but one which probably would not work and would create new dangers and new problems. Due to its length, particularly, and other aspects that have been mentioned, this program probably will not work and probably will create new dangers.

I say this parliament ought not to be asked to grant to the government the extraordinary powers it is seeking for virtually an undefined or very ill-defined period of time, subject only to a relatively ineffectual period of review involving a debate in the House for three days. Such a review and debate would be virtually meaningless when the government has a clear majority in parliament.

In my view, the bill should be amended so it will terminate in 18 months. Just before the expiry of the 18 months, if the government felt it could make a case for the extension of the program, it could bring in a bill for that purpose. I want to say frankly to my friends in the NDP that I cannot support their motion. Without taking too much time, let me say that I find the NDP position on controls and in the fight against inflation rather confusing, puzzling and contradictory, depending on which part of the country you happen to be in at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I really find it a little difficult to take my hon. friends seriously on this subject. I cannot really believe, much as I respect him, that the leader of the NDP believes the program he outlined here this morning would bring under control the inflation that exists in this country today.

Mr. Broadbent: Why not?

Mr. Stanfield: I have to say, furthermore, that the motion is clearly premature. The bill is still before the committee. Our approach in this party is to be constructive, and the purpose of the motion, it seems to me, is to be destructive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It's a lot of baloney.

Mr. Stanfield: Somebody says this is a lot of baloney. I would not characterize the motion as a lot of baloney.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You called it destructive.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I did not want to excite the members of the NDP too much just before lunch. I do not want to create any indigestion.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are speaking to the Chair.

Mr. Stanfield: I am speaking to the Chair. I have kept a proper distance from hon. members in the NDP this morning. We will try, in our party, to persuade the government to modify this program so that it holds promise of moderating inflations, so that it appears to be based on reality, recognizing the limited utility of controls on prices and incomes, so that the program does not involve giving the government the power to impose controls for years and years, bringing about a change in the fundamental nature of our economy, making collective bargaining virtually meaningless because of the length of the period of controls, and arrogating to itself the important economic decisions in this country over that period of time, destroying not only the power of decision of co-operatives and corporations but possibly also emasculating the powers of our provinces over the same period of time. How could we willingly grant such powers for so long to any government, let alone a government which has such a record for opportunism as this one?

I oppose this motion because it is premature and, being premature, is purely destructive in purpose.

An hon. Member: No rationale at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: If my friends will look after themselves, I will look after myself. I am sorry, Madam Speaker, I really did not mean to excite those hon. members. I say to the minister that we will continue to try to improve the bill in order to produce a workable program that does not involve a blank cheque of the sort the government is now seeking. I will vote against the motion.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Abbott: Madam Speaker, perhaps I might call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I bring to the attention of the House the fact that at one o'clock when the House rose for lunch, the Chair recognized the hon. member for Mississauga (Mr. Abbott) because no member of the Social Credit Party rose. The minister, who was expecting a member of the Social Credit Party to seek the floor, did not rise although he intended to speak after a representative from each of the three opposition parties had spoken. I am sure the House would agree to listen to the intervention of the minister at this time, without affecting the right of the hon. member for Mississauga to speak in due course. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I express my thanks to you and to all hon. members for giving me the opportunity to speak at this time. I wish to respond briefly to a number of points made by the leader of the New Democratic Party.

An hon. Member: In his absence.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): May I say he had the courtesy to speak to me just before the House rose, indicating that he had a conflicting engagement which would make it difficult for him to be here right at two o'clock, but that he would be in the House shortly thereafter, so perhaps he will have an opportunity to hear at first-hand a part at least of what I have to say about his speech.

I think one of the most significant phrases of his speech was the important recognition—and this is a direct quotation—that inflation is the scourge affecting our whole population. Indeed, in all the arguments we have heard from the hon. gentleman and his colleagues inside and outside the House for the past four weeks, they have indicated what they were not prepared to do, what they were not prepared to support and what they were not prepared to give in relation to this program against inflation.

I think it would have been justifiable for one to have arrived at the conclusion that they were not concerned about inflation at all, and indeed that their principal motive was to oppose the present program. Therefore, I welcome that clarification on his part and the fact that he and his colleagues are concerned. I recognize that he has given himself and his party a rather difficult brief to carry in this particular regard, because he has had to start off on the assumption, not justified by any economic fact, that increased labour costs can in no way affect the cost of goods and services which people buy in the community. He has taken the position, of course, that wherever wage or salary increases might take place in respect of individual firms or the community as a whole, they will not in fact affect prices. He has had to look for villains or evils in other sectors of the economy to overcome the fact that, above all, labour costs, as is the case with many other costs, are important from the standpoint of inflation.

He has been unable to refute the argument which has been advanced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other speakers on this side of the House, that unless there are some restricted restraints with regard to the compensation side of our economy, not only will the inflation get worse, or not better in this country, but that indeed over a period of time our competitive position, and therefore the jobs of Canadians, will suffer as well. The leader of the New Democratic Party cited the three areas of food, shelter and energy costs as his party's explanation of why we have inflation, and he insisted that, in effect, nothing had been done to protect Canadians in these particular areas.

I think it is fair to say—the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has already referred to this—that there were a substantial number of contradictions in what the hon. gentleman had to say. At one point late in his remarks he was saying the government was spending too much and that certain programs had to be cut down. At another point he was saying that, of course, the government had done absolutely nothing in the form of its budgetary expenditures to deal with the problems of inflation affecting Canadians. I shall not again go into the various increases that this government has been responsible for in respect of old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, veterans' benefits and other payments for the purpose of enabling those particular groups of Canadians for whom we have a special responsibility to keep up with rising costs. However, I believe it is fair to point out to the two members of the New Democratic Party who are present at this time that this government, in its budgetary provisions, has made provision not just for hundreds of millions of dollars but for billions of dollars specifically for the purpose of keeping down the cost of food, shelter and energy for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Because we have had a recent debate on the question of housing in Canada I will not refer in detail to the various substantial programs—I think I would be correct in saying in the aggregate of over $1 billion a year—under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Secretary of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson), specifically for the purpose of providing additional housing for Canadians of low income. I refer to the most recent program announced both for the extension of AHOP and subsidized rental housing to provide Canadians, particularly those at the lower end of the income scale, with better and more housing at a price they can afford.

So I think it is a little disingenuous for the leader of the New Democratic Party to say that the government has made no budgetary provision, for example, to provide low-cost housing for Canadians when in fact even a quick examination of the Blue Book would indicate that over $1 billion has been appropriated for this purpose.

● (1410)

With respect to energy, the leader of the NDP took the position, again, that this government has done nothing by way of budgetary provision to provide for the higher costs of energy with which not only Canadians but all world consumers of energy have been faced in recent years due to the action of the OPEC countries in quadrupling the price of oil. Here, again, I suggest that the allegation that nothing has been done is unfair. I point out to the leader of the NDP that in budgetary terms and in terms of the current fiscal year 1975-76, this parliament in the aggregate will appropriate $1.5 billion for the oil subsidy payment, for example, to keep down the cost of fuel oil in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) and in other constituencies east of the well known Ottawa Valley line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Whether we are talking about Canada or any other countries in the world, there is a basic fact to be recognized: higher energy costs for the world in general are here to stay; these prices have to be paid, and no element of rhetoric and none of the old arguments about attacking multinational corporations or accusing the federal government, in its dealings with provincial governments, of causing the problem can get away from that fact which we should all recognize and take into account. That is, that we will have to pay higher costs for energy. This is inevitable for each of us when we go to purchase gasoline, fuel oil, to pay our hydro bill or whatever it may be. Therefore, it seems to me rather contradictory and inconsistent for the hon. gentleman to say to the House that the government has done nothing to restrain energy costs, when in the first place this government has been responsible for keeping down the price of oil for all Canadians at a price level $4 under the world price.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Especially when the NDP provincial governments of Saskatchewan and British Columbia, as much as the governments of any other energy-producing provinces, have sought higher prices for their own energy commodities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not disagree with the Premier of Saskatchewan when he goes to federal-provincial meetings and tells us not to expect Saskatchewan to take anything less for its energy commodities than any other province, particularly Alberta. I do not disagree with Premier Blakeney when he says that, and I do not disagree with the government of British Columbia when it says that natural gas is a scarce resource which can be replaced only by expending more money to find additional natural gas and it will need a bigger cash flow back to the industry for the purpose of finding these resources. I agree with the governments of British Columbia and Saskatchewan that for reasons of revenue to the province and for developing additional resources we are going to have higher prices for energy in this country.

However, it seems strange to me that in the face of the fact that we have these circumstances at the present time and that we have to find energy, the national leader of the NDP contradicts what the two provincial premiers say.

That leaves us wondering about the adequacy of the solutions he puts forward with regard to energy pricing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The third matter mentioned by the leader of the NDP was the vexed question of food costs. I have said before, and say again, that probably no transaction made by every Canadian family in the week is more a matter of concern for them than the amount spent at the corner store and the supermarket for the purpose of keeping them in food. I must say, as well, that we acknowledge at once the increase in food prices in Canada has been an important factor in increasing the general price level in this country. What interested me in the speech of the leader of the NDP is that at one point he spoke with accents of admiration about the work of the Food Prices Review Board, and the only criticism he had was that this government had not given to the Food Prices Review Board the power to roll back prices.

Then he went back to the old argument that the reason food prices had gone up in Canada was a higher profit margin being taken by the vendors or the processors of particular foods. I think it is fair to remind him of the speeches he and other members of his group made in one of the two previous debates we have had in the last four weeks on this subject. They said that the Food Prices Review Board had failed in its duty, having examined the facts and found that increases in food prices had not been due to higher profit margins, and they are now saying that the board did a good job and we should be taking action, just as the board recommended, for the purpose of rolling back prices. The leader of the NDP asks why there is not some provision in this particular bill for the kind of scrutiny of food prices as existed with the Food Prices Review Board and, what is more, he said it should have the power to roll back prices. I think it is fair to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that those powers are in Bill C-73.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is why I must agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he referred to this as being a particularly arid exercise—those are not his words, but mine—to be having a debate on an opposition day on this question when the very powers the hon. gentleman says we should have are in fact in a government bill which is before a parliamentary committee at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This is a measure which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues opposed at second reading. He now asks for the powers we have put into this bill for the Anti-Inflation Board, which are those he opposed in his vote at second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I acknowledge that the leader of the NDP has a difficult point to make and a rather difficult brief to carry. He cannot acknowledge the fact that over the past 18 months or two years the government has been making very substantial appropriations of funds and has kept prices down for Canadians with regard to the commodities he referred to, food, housing and energy. He cannot acknowledge the fact that there can be, and is, a problem for the economy as a whole if not only profits and rents but wages and salaries go up, and in that sense he has put himself in a difficult position. While recognizing and having sympathy with the difficulty of the position he is put into, perhaps it is for this reason that most hon. members of the House will not have found his presentation this morning to have been very convincing.

I was interested in his remarks on the question of professional income. I have had occasion to refer to this in the past. He said that in other nations where they have put into effect a prices and incomes system, they have also taken effective measures for the purpose of controlling professional incomes. Let us consider one example. Have they done that in the United Kingdom? After all, with a Labour government, a socialist government under Prime Minister Wilson, in Britain one would assume that if the hon. gentleman were making a reference, he would refer to the spiritual godfathers of the New Democratic Party in Canada. What is the situation? While the socialist government in the United Kingdom has put a £6 per week maximum on the income of the ordinary workingman, it does not control professional incomes at all.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I acknowledge the validity of the point made by the leader of the NDP with regard to the fact that the question of professional incomes is a vexed one for our community, and that while in terms of gross national product the amounts which may be involved are not significant from the standpoint of the test of fairness and equity, it is important that not only should the wage-earning man see that he is being dealt with fairly with regard to his own income, but he should also have the assurance at the same time that the self-employed professional will be controlled.

• (1420)

Indeed, all the ten provincial governments agreed with us in this regard. They also agreed that the best means of doing so—given the fact that those professions are self-governed within each province—was a three-way arrangement with respect to controlling professional incomes. It should be the responsibility of the province, with the professional associations there, to work out an effective limitation on billing practices with the understanding that the federal level would impose a requirement on them to file a statement of professional income and monitor such statements to determine if the income exceeded the guidelines.

As I put the matter to the leader of the New Democratic Party yesterday, this bill provides that while a professional will be entitled to go up to the maximum of $2,400 on professional services over his present income, he will be subject to the scrutiny of the Anti-Inflation Board, as will everybody else. In the event of an excess, the administrator will be able to take back from him anything over the permitted amount. There can be question of approach and timing such as was raised by the Leader of the Opposition. We may disagree with them, but I think we should be exempt from this kind of argument where we are told something is not in the bill when it is, as is indicated by the proceedings before the standing committee.

At the end of his remarks, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby took exception to the fact that if firms or individuals are successful in improving their productivity, these flexible guidelines make it possible for them to enjoy the benefits. From the standpoint of the Canadian economy as a whole, I cannot imagine any advantage in a system which fails to reward productivity. The improved productivity of individuals or groups of workers or firms which therefore improve the resource base for us all, is obviously in our interest. Amongst other things, it enables us better to look after those at the lower end of the income scale who are not in a position to improve their productivity.

The leader of the New Democratic Party also referred to the exemption for reinvestment as an exemption that would enable firms to go ahead and increase their prices. I think I persuaded him in private, and I hope I can persuade him in public, that the exemption he is referring to is with respect to the possibility of reinvesting those funds arising from export profits which have been taken from exporting firms by way of specific levy and held in public account, and will be repayable to the firms upon their establishing to our satisfaction that the funds are to be reinvested in productive enterprises in Canada. It is not true that a firm will be entitled to put up prices to domestic and foreign customers because it seeks to invest in export industries.

I should like to go back to some of the basic principles which I had occasion to set out in earlier debates on this question. We know that the administration of this kind of program, indeed of any kind of control program, on an economy and a system of society as complex as ours is not going to be easy. We would acknowledge, and I have been happy to quote the term used by the leader of the opposition, that inevitably a system of this kind which strives to set fixed standards on various groups of people is going to account for some rough injustice, if you like, or at least will achieve only rough justice between various groups.

We believe that a large number of Canadian people think it is important at this time that we all restrain the demands on our available resources; that Canadians generally accept the fact that the rate of inflation we have known resulting from real costs coming into Canada, and also the self-generated ones, are costs that we cannot continue to impose upon ourselves. We have to take action to restrain the rate of inflation at this time, and I believe, and I think my colleagues have found, that there is a broad measure of support for this particular program in the country.

There is no doubt about the fact that one of the difficult areas is pricing. It is perfectly true that, while the wage settlements coming forward, which in our country on an annual basis are numbered in the hundreds or thousands, may effectively be scrutinized and controlled in advance, the many retail transactions occurring in Canada, numbering in the hundreds of millions, cannot effectively be scrutinized. We acknowledge that. In many cases, at the retail level it will be difficult to put advance controls on pricing, but we insist that we can exercise effective control over certain commodities and require advance notice of price increases. Over the retail sector as a whole, we can put on effective controls with regard to the mark-up across a whole range of commodities that turn up in the food basket.

In talking about the control of corporate profits—and that in itself is an effective control on the price of things that some groups of Canadians have to buy—I can refer to the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission on Monday, November 3, 1975, with respect to the British Columbia Telephone Company. This is evidence of the fact that the cost of services to Canadians can be effectively controlled. The decision of the CTC, specifically founded upon the government's guidelines, reduced by 28 per cent the amount which, but for the guidelines, the CTC would have given that company on its rate application and, going into the executive suite, it reduced by $1.5 million the amount of compensation the senior officials and managers of that company could have expected. We think that what happened with the British Columbia Telephone Company will happen again and again in the months to come. We acknowledge that there will be difficulties with individual prices in the supermarket but we think the program can be effective in reducing prices in Canada, and over time will be seen to be effective in doing so.

My colleagues will be participating in this debate, Mr. Speaker. In the course of the next three weeks the committee discussion of Bill C-73 will be completed and it will be back in the House. There have been proposals in this debate and in committee for amendments. Indeed, we have put some amendments before the committee and I shall be looking for those and some points that members have made, and will be prepared to consider them.

I would stress, again, the importance of taking action now to restrain the rate of inflation in Canada, taking action through the measures we have put forward to assure those Canadians who want to co-operate with the program that with their support and with the sanctions put forward in the bill, they will be rewarded by a lower rate of inflation and individual groups will not be able to take advantage of the situation. In the weeks to come, we hope to find that kind of support so that the program can be put into operation and all can enjoy the benefits of the kind of restraint that we believe is in the national interest.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, much ink has been spilt and much has been said about the inflation issue. We note that the problem is far from being solved. The motion under discussion todays shows that some people realize that the distribution is far from fair for professionals and wage-earners in Canada.

I will take this opportunity to point out that in my opinion, there are three economic causes behind inflation: First, taxes, second, inadequate wages for the level of prices and, third, deficient total purchasing power in the country. Inflation is an economic phenomenon. Therefore it has economic causes. However, inflation appears in one sphere of human activities. We also find a psychological cause which we feel is specifically due to the economic conditions in our present economic system. On one hand, wage earners as a group ask for salary increases either to make both ends meet or to provide for amenities. On the other, industrialists, manufacturers or merchants, still as a group, are seeking to increase their prices, either to balance their budget or boost their profits: in either case, we see a race for money which is growing harder and relentless. This race is a normal manifestation of human selfishness relating to any rare and necessary time.

Let us look at some concrete examples: the air we breathe is what is most important for man. Without this air, man cannot live for more than a few minutes. It is a matter of life and death of a primary and immediate importance. Yet, men do not struggle between themselves to stock this air we breathe. Providence has given us plenty of it. There is no shortage of this commodity, therefore no selfishness. Here is another example: at the outset of the war, the federal government called for restrictions and rationing.

We immediately witnessed struggles and selfishness not so much about money which was then relatively abundant, but mostly about ration coupons and rationed goods. It was a normal reaction of human nature in front of a product both rare and necessary.

Therefore, when we see on the one hand salary increases and on the other price increases, we are witnessing a human reaction in front of a rare and necessary thing. In a situation of this kind, we believe that far from stirring inflation a stronger purchasing power can only temper it and even cancel it, providing this added power will be achieved within scientific standards.

In a free society, any attack on currency is serious because it affects the measure of values in exchanges between human beings, which is the very basis of economic life. The people most responsible for currency devaluation which affects our daily life are those who govern us. The leaders of big labour unions who each year reactivate the mechanism of pressures aimed at improving their members' wages contribute in speeding the inflation spiral, but most efficient of all in bringing about the constant devaluation of money are the men who make decisions about taxes and taxation rates of all kinds, occasional interest rate increases, taxes to which we are subjected and which create the public activities to be financed with those same taxes. Any tax is inflationary. It is quite important to stop and think about taxes and taxation. Any tax is inflationary. That is a common truth that should be reiterated untiringly. The pressures causing the ever escalating wages must be removed but the government need not legislate in that regard if on the other hand it does not stop expanding its tax demands that bear upon wage earners, producers and retailers.

For instance here is our Liberal administration which, taking its courage in both hands and rejecting the laisser-faire principles proclaimed in the past, declares a temporary freeze on wages and prices while at the same time leaving the tax system intact, a sure way to trigger new price and wage increases. We realize that with such cost of living increases, money becomes worthless, but people keep on buying and their problems multiply. They are buying on credit, using their Chargex credit cards or some other cards, and making more debts.

I should like to quote from an article published in the Friday, December 13, 1974 edition of Le Devoir by Mr. Velk, an economist who is a member of the McGill University faculty and a former adviser to the Federal Reserve System. He is serving now as an economic adviser to the U.S. Congress Joint Commission on Economic Affairs. I feel it is particularly appropriate at this time to quote this article entitled: "Bankers' extraordinary powers during the inflation crisis".

Hon. members have a tendency to criticize and mock Social Crediters for their statements on banking power. Although Mr. Velk who is unknown to me is certainly not a Crediter, I should like to quote from his article. Anybody can check this. Quote:

> Our present economic difficulties arise from two main factors, which are the rediscovery by international bankers of the secret of producing money, and the colossal increase, at the international level, in the number of payments made through banks—an increase that is partly due to higher prices induced by the state cartels of raw material producing nations.

● (1440)

Obviously it is difficult to make a just distribution of riches in a society controlled by finance. We live now in a world where scandals of all kinds are brought to light; we see exaggerated expenses. In such a social climate, priorities are sometimes disturbed.

Governments, ministers, members of the House, union leaders, organized crime, everybody is into it. But in the meantime, the real problems of the control of a few people over the cost of living and the monetary and financial power remain unclarified and continue to thwart people. The real scandal lies there: in the discretionary powers of the chartered banks, in their alliances with governments, in their control over food, in their financing of production and consumption.

We live in a society of imbalance and suspicion. Our social tendency is individualistic: every man for himself. Many people in the low-income bracket are not unionized. Many union members contribute nothing to their unions. May I be allowed to remind you, without meaning any harm, that the great experts of other colours would have us believe that the Social Credit Party is dangerous, that it would create inflation, that our money would be devalued. That is precisely what we are experiencing now; yet, the Social Crediters are not running the country.

If we are to get the upper hand on the situation, straighten it out, make it more humane, more respectful of man's work, we will have to join forces, regroup ourselves in the monetary field as well as in the working world, or that of food production: and for that, through the government, control the issue of money and credit.

When goods are lacking, production is blamed. When there is no work, we blame it on the workers. But there is no lack of production or work in our society. Production has its problems, indeed. But there is really no problem, what with the subsidies of all kinds granted to companies to open a new plant or expand existing facilities. The problem is to sell their production. The workers want to work.

A very low percentage of workers seem to hesitate. You have only to listen to people to realize this. The problem is that they cannot buy the produce of their work with their earnings. Then, where is the problem? Among workers? No. Is it their production capacity with automation which is in our society to last. No, the problem is not here either. Where is it? In the means of exchange of products? In money? We should subdue finance and let people be free. Why are there slowdowns, rotating strikes, legal or illegal? Because of a lack of purchasing power in general, sometimes to get better working conditions but in particular it is to improve the purchasing power.

With inflation protected by governments, because it is sometimes paying, the worker, despite better wages obtained after long struggles, buys less than five years ago with more money. If we go without butter, it is not because farmers do not produce enough. On the contrary, they complain because they get stuck with surpluses. They have to waste and destroy it. Most ridiculous, we import huge quantities from other countries. If we go without eggs, it is not because hens stopped laying nor because the producer does not work enough. On the contrary, eggs are destroyed. If we do not have enough meat, it is surely not because there is not enough beef in the country.

We witnessed last fall—and it nearly happened again this year—the killing of slaughter cattle that producers could not sell on the market at decent prices. The producer is loosing money with his production, and consumers are short of money to buy that same production. If men, women and children only have rags on their backs it is not because sheeps do not give wool or because cotton plantations do not produce anymore. In addition to natural cotton and wool clothing, the human mind even managed to produce clothing made of nylon, rayon and other synthetic fabrics.

If families live in cramped quarters in slums it is not because there is no more wood, no more stone, no more cement or no more steel to build new houses—we have the building materials—it is not because we lack manpower—we have too much of it, we controlled it with working permits to protect the jobs of those who were already employed.

There is no lack of production; on the contrary, there are unemployed who want to work, at least the very great majority of them. In our system the unemployed are excess help; we do not know what to do with them. We retrain them; we overhaul the retraining system. We tell them to take courses, we pay them to do that and during that time they are not included in the unemployment statistics. We do not know what to do with the unemployed or unemployment. People are being given nearly as much to stand idle as to work, and that sometimes discourages the worker. Want of cash, of money, when we could produce but not buy. Want of cash, of money, during the war when money was ordering the destruction opposing peace. Want of cash, of money, after the war when prices were running, going up, before our incomes, our wallets. Want of cash, of money, today when plants send their workers back home because of unfilled orders in spite of a multitude of unmet consumers' needs and in part because of uncontrolled imports conditioning our industries.
